When the survey was started it was hoped it might be completed in time to give complete information to the special session of the legislature. Deep snow interfered in some sections, and the canvass was delayed by sickness and absences in others.

"However," Secretary Groom says, "we feel we have a remarkably accurate cross-section picture of the entire State. The percentage of later reports indicate that there would be little change, except the increase in totals, if we had a check on every single serviceman in the State."

LEGISLATURE EXPRESSES THANKS

The North Dakota Legislature passed a joint resolution in appreciation of the survey as a service to the State.

"The contribution the Greater North Dakota Association is making through furnishing this reliable statistical data upon which to build our future land policy for the returned soldier is one of inestimable value," Gov. John Moses declared.

And Governor Moses signed a bill passed by the special session under which State departments and political subdivisions are required to retain farm land owned for returning servicemen until July 1, 1945, or until after the regular legislative session has been able to adopt a more comprehensive land-for-veterans program.

Returns are still coming to the office of G. N. D. A., where they are tabulated like election returns, showing the status by townships and counties and the total for the State.

"Newspapers in each county have been given individual county returns to date," Groom says, "and when complete figures have been secured we will have a record which it is felt will be of special value to the regular session of the legislature which will meet next January to make plans to aid returning soldiers. It will aid various communities in post-war plans."

Groom reports great interest in the survey. Post-war planning organizations of several States have written for the questionnaire, and for the printed forms used in the tabulations. It appears the G. N. D. A. plan will form the framework for at least three other States seeking information as to the desires of the returning serviceman.

CANVASS FIGURE TOTALS

Below is a summary of the North Dakota survey:

1. Number of married men, 1,300.
2. Number of single men, 4,985.
3. Number on farms when called, 5.039.
4. Number farming on own account when called, 1,575.
5. Number wanting to farm when discharged, 5,523.
6. Number who prefer mixed farming, 4,874.
7. Number who prefer power farming, 609.
8. Number who prefer dairy farming, 40.
9. Number who own land, 676.
10. Number having no land, 4,847.
11. Number having some stock and equipment, 1,554.
12. Number having no stock or equipment, 3,969.
13. Number having plans made for farming when discharged, 945.
14. Number wanting to buy land, 3,393.
15. Number wanting to rent, 2,130.
16. Number wanting land with buildings, 4,604.
17. Resources: Cash, bonds, real estate—average per man, $1,050.

The United States Housing Act and Its Operations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech I delivered before the National Association of Home Builders of the United States, May 9, 1944, at the Statler Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

In 1939 I made a rather exhaustive analysis of the operations of the United States Housing Act. You will recall that the United States Housing Authority came to Congress at that time with a request for an authorization to issue additional obligations to the amount of $800,000,000. The additional authorization requested would have brought the total authorizations up to $1,600,000,000.

It asked for a change in the Housing Act providing for annual contributions aggregating not more than $45,000,000 per annum in addition to the contracts theretofore authorized by the United States Housing Act.

Notwithstanding the fact that the United States Housing Authority did intensive lobbying in Congress to induce the acceptance of its request, it failed in that endeavor. Though its bill passed the Senate, it was defeated in the lower House by a decisive majority.

We might review a few of the more important points that were brought out in that analysis. The propaganda put out by Mr. Nathan Straus, Administrator of the United States Housing Authority, was that:

"Ours is a decentralized program in which the responsibility for carrying out housing programs rests not with the United States Housing Authority but with the communities themselves. * * * The United States Housing Authority program is entirely decentralized. The United States Housing Authority cannot turn a single spadeful of dirt or lay a single brick. It is purely a financial assistance agency, which makes loans and subsides to local public-housing authorities."

This was shown to be completely false. Instead, that program is in every sense a Federal program and completely centralized in Washington.

The United States Housing Authority instigated the enactment of laws to set up State housing bodies, and further instigated the State legislatures to pass enabling acts to create the so-called local housing authorities. In fact, the United States Housing Authority initiates, directs, and maintains complete control over every act relating to the development of the housing project down to and including a requirement that the rents of the occupants of the dwelling units must have its approval before they can be put into effect.

I followed the operations of this public-housing scheme very closely when an attempt was made in 1938 to locate one of its projects in the city of Marion, Ohio, my home town. I was mayor of Marion at the time that took place. Marion residents one evening picked up their daily newspapers and read in large headlines that Marion had been granted a million dollars by the United States Housing Authority for the building of a Federal housing project. Diligent search and inquiry revealed the fact that there had not been even the slightest demand on the part of anybody in Marion for any Federal-housing project. It was an election year and it had become generally known that I might be a candidate for Congress. I accepted the challenge and began informing our citizens of the real nature of the Federal proposal. Our city council not only refused to pass enabling legislation for the building of the project but it actually passed a resolution declaring that the city of Marion would have nothing to do with the proposal.

Armed with the power of eminent domain the United States Housing Authority tentatively drove its stakes setting off an area in the city of Marion for the location of its proposed housing project. The residents of that area were given to understand that they might at any moment be driven out of their homes onto the streets to make room for the project.

Opposition developed by the families in the area against the proposed action of the United States Housing Authority in trying to foist its will upon them. On one of the streets within the area selected for the location of the project 55 percent of the families owned their homes free of debt. I was personally acquainted with a great many of the families living in that area, having attended many of them at their bedsides in cases of illness and having assisted many of their mothers in bringing their babies into the world. So far as I could see, the moral character of the people living in that area compared favorably with that of those living in any other area of comparable size in the city. Some of the houses they lived in were not of the most desirable kind, but by no possible stretch of the imagination could the area be considered as a slum area or the families living in it as slum dwellers.

Think of the people living in that section picking up their daily newspaper one evening and finding themselves referred to as slum dwellers. Further, that a slum survey for Marion filed with the State board showed that social diseases of various forms were found in that area, and that desirable tenants had gradually withdrawn from there until a low class of occupants had almost destroyed the livability of the structures and that—

"Among the comments made in the introduction to the survey were that * * * persons are living below decent levels in regard to sanitation and moral environment. * * * A low standard of living has been continuing for many years * * * and will, without a doubt, to the detriment of the city and community in general unless action is taken."

When the persons who were responsible for that malicious attack were driven by a self-respecting and righteously indignant people into an indefensible position, what do you suppose they said? Exactly what was to be expected: "We just followed instructions from Washington."

Not only were the people in the area affected opposed to the housing project but also the citizens of the community in general. Mass meetings were held to protest against it. At the same time agents of the United States Housing Authority were working secretively to overcome the opposition and propagandizing our people with their stock in trade, namely, falsehoods and deceptions.

Then the State housing board stepped into the picture, at the instigation no doubt of its creator, the United States Housing Authority. Using the high-handed and dictatorial procedure that is natural to this Federal-housing scheme, the State board ordered a public hearing to be held at Columbus, Ohio, for the purpose of determining whether Marion should or should not have a Federal housing project. Then the real meaning of the word "authority" became apparent. Citizens of Marion were to learn that it was not up to them to determine whether or not they should have a Federal housing project. The State housing board gave us to understand that it and not we would decide that question.

A group of representative citizens of Marion attended that hearing to protest against the project. Another group, headed by the local agent of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, also attended and urged the building of the project. The State housing board was very partial to the group favoring the project and extended to them every courtesy and consideration. On the other hand the board treated with contempt the plea of those of us who were opposing the housing proposal, heckled and cut us off time and again.

Well, the long and short of it all was that the United States Housing Authority did not construct one of its projects in the city of Marion, Ohio. Political calculations went awry somewhere.

One of the deceptions that is deliberately fostered by the public housing officials is that local housing authorities are independent bodies, that they arise out of local demand, that they are primarily responsible to the communities in which they are located, etc. The fact is that local housing bodies are nothing but dummies of the United States Housing Authority. The trust indenture that secures the bonds sold to local banks to raise what is erroneously called the local contribution to the development cost leaves no doubt as to who is boss over the local housing project. The local housing authority is by law not responsible to the community in which it is located for anything pertaining to the project. In fact the law of the State of Ohio, which is representative of the other State laws relating to this subject, provides that "the governing body, chairman, and counsel of the housing authority shall perform the duties of the municipal council, mayor, and solicitor respectively, * * * and the members of the housing authority shall, and are hereby authorized, to exercise and carry out municipal corporations by the laws providing for such corporation proceedings."

Further that "an authority created under this act shall constitute a body corporate and politic, * * * shall have the following powers in additional to others herein specifically granted."

In fact, the local housing authority is a municipality within a municipality and is owned and controlled by the United States Government as completely as the arsenals of the Army and Navy.

These public housing projects are exempted from taxation though their occupants receive all the benefits of the schools, police and fire departments, and other municipal facilities. This, of course, throws an extra burden of taxation upon the other citizens of the country. Through some mysterious social benefit which we are told will flow out of the housing projects taxpayers are supposed to be repaid with compound interest.

But the capital deception of the Federal housing program is the false impression which its operators give out that the United States Government lends money to local communities to build these housing projects. The United States Government does not lend to the local community one red cent to pay for the development cost of the housing projects nor does the local community pay any interest on their capital cost. All false propaganda to the contrary notwithstanding, the Federal Government pays the full amount of the capital cost of all housing projects constructed under the United States Housing Act of 1937. Although my analysis of the operation of that act in 1939 exposed completely the deception that the housing projects were being financed by local communities as alleged by the public housing officials, they nevertheless continue to propagate that deception. In that analysis I showed that the annual Federal contributions were sufficient to more than pay for the development costs of the projects. The amortization tables of George Holzman, which are regarded as standard, were used for making the computations upon which my statements were then made. I shall be able this evening to show by the use of those same tables, and figures supplied me very recently by the Federal Public Housing Authority, that to be as true today as it was then.

As of December 31, 1943, the Federal Public Housing Authority had completed the construction of 557 housing projects at a total cost of $752,409,000. This does not include the W. P. A. low-rent projects. Three hundred and thirty-seven of the projects are currently operated as low-rent houses. Forty-five low-rent projects have been transferred to war housing. One hundred and seventy-five war-housing projects have been built under Public Act 671, the defense amendment to the United States Housing Act.

Annual Federal contributions will be needed in the year 1944 on the 337 low-rent projects and the 45 low-rent projects transferred to war use. Although no contributions have been needed to date on any of the Public Act 671 projects two or three of them may need contributions before the end of the fiscal year 1944. The annual Federal contributions that will be needed in the year 1944 on the 337 low-rent projects and the 45 low-rent projects transferred to war use average 2.2 percent of their development cost.

The projects constructed under Public No. 671 do not enter into my computations, but only the so-called low-rent housing projects constructed under the United States Housing Act.

The immediate funds for the development cost of the housing projects are derived from two sources. The Federal Public Housing Authority, through its dummy, that is, the local housing authority, raises 33 percent of the development cost by the sale of bonds to banks and others in the local communities where the projects are built. Those bonds run over a period of 15 years and bear an interest rate of 2.08 percent.

The Federal Public Housing Authority furnishes the remaining 67 percent by the issuance of its own obligations and obtaining the funds directly from the United States Treasury. These funds are borrowed from the Treasury for a period of 59 years. The Federal Public Housing Authority makes the claim that it pays 1 percent interest annually to the Treasury for the use of this money.

Now, let us assume a Federal housing project costing $1,000,000 and see how all this works out. The dummy of the Federal Public Housing Authority, that is, the local housing authority, raises $333,000 of the cost by the sale of bonds to local banks and the public. Those bonds,, as stated run over a period of 15 years and bear an interest rate of 2.08 percent. The $333,000 amortizes at 2 1/12 percent interest over the 15-year period at $390,962. It should be noted that 2 1/12 percent is higher by a very small fraction than 2.08 percent, the actual interest rate given me by the Public Housing Authority as applying to those bonds. Two and one-twelfth percent was the nearest figure to 2.08 percent given in Holzman's amortization tables.

Remember we stated that the Federal Public Housing Authority claims it pays 1 percent interest per annum on the money it borrows from the Treasury. Accordingly the $667,000 which the Authority furnishes for the development cost of the million-dollar project would amortize over the 59-year period at $886,236.

Therefore, the grand total amortization charge on the development cost of the million-dollar project would be $1,277,295.

Let us now see about the annual Federal contributions and the part they play in this financing. The average annual contribution rate that is currently being paid on the development cost of all so-called low-rent housing projects constructed under the United States Housing Act is 2.2 percent. At this rate the total amount of contributions that would be paid on a $1,000,000 project over the 59-year period would be $1,298,000.

Therefore, since the total amortization cost on the million-dollar project would be only $1,277,298 it is seen that the annual Federal contributions would be more than sufficient by $20,000 to fully amortize the development cost of the million-dollar project.

Let me repeat that all of my computations are based on data furnished me in writing by the Federal Public Housing Authority within the last few weeks.

So it will be seen that the 1-percent interest which the Federal Public Housing Authority claims it pays on the money furnished to it by the Treasury is actually paid out of the annual Federal contributions, which are furnished by the Treasury itself. It is seen, therefore, that the lower this rate of interest is the less need will there be for annual Federal contributions. In 1939 when I made my study of the operations of this housing problem the United States Housing Authority, now the Federal Public Housing Authority, told me it was paying 1⅜ percent interest on the funds it obtained from the Treasury. So whatever reduction may have been made in the annual contributions can be accounted for in part by the lower interest rate the authority claims it pays on the funds it obtains from the Treasury.

The United States Housing Act provides that no matter how high the development cost or how low the rents may be on the projects, or how inefficient they may be operated, annual Federal contributions can always be made ample to pay their capital cost and interest charges thereon. It is specifically written into the act that all amortization charges are a first lien on the annual Federal contribution.

The United States Housing Act is a grossly dishonest piece of legislation. It shows unmistakable evidence of having been deliberately written with the view of deceiving whom it could. Certainly it cannot be said that the housing act has failed in achieving that purpose.

Just to give you some idea of the juggling that is practiced in the operation of the act, let us briefly run through some of the transactions, not exactly as they appear on paper, but rather in accordance with the ultimate facts.

First, there is the machinery for operating the scheme. At the top stands the Federal Government. Next comes the Federal Public Housing Authority, which is but an agent of the Government, though an important one. Next in order come the housing bodies of the individual States, which, as stated, are creatures in fact of the United States Housing Authority, alias the Federal Public Housing Authority. The State housing boards are, however, largely passive bodies. Finally at the lowest level we find the so-called local housing authorities, also creatures de facto of the United States Housing Authority. As previously mentioned, the local housing authorities are nothing but dummies of the Federal Public Housing Authority.

Let us again assume a housing project costing $1,000,000. The Federal Government through the Treasury raises $667,000 of this amount through general taxes, pay-roll taxes, the sale of bonds to the public, Government printing-press money, and so forth. Having thus raised the $667,000 the Government turns around and lends this amount back to itself, that is the Federal Public Housing Authority, for an indefinite period at 1 percent interest.

Then the Government turns around the second time and relends back to itself, through the local housing authority, the same $667,000 for a period of 59 years.

Next the Government borrows through its Federal Public Housing Authority and local dummy the remainder of the capital for the project, $333,000, by the sale of bonds to the banks in the community where the project is to be located which run over a period of 15 years at 2.08 percent interest.

Next the Government over a period of 15 years raises, in the name of social uplift, through general taxation, social-security taxes, the sale of bonds to the public, printing-press money, etc., $390,962 to pay back with interest the $333,000 it borrowed originally from the local banks.

In addition, the Government raises, also in the name of social uplift, over a period of 59 years in the same ways $866,236 which is handed over to the Federal Public Housing Authority, which in turn is thence passed on to the local dummy, which in turn shuttles it back through the Federal Public Housing Authority to the Government itself in payment with interest of the $667,000 which it originally raised to finance development cost of the housing project and $20,000 besides.

We have, of course, touched only a very few of the high points. It would literally take hours to go through all of the shuttle and zigzag manipulations that are practiced.

I am of the opinion that there are plenty of laws on the statute books which prohibit private individuals from doing some of the things that are practiced in the operation of this housing scheme.

The money cost of this Federal housing program is very important to taxpayers. However, that is not the most serious part about it. The really challenging part about this scheme is that it is purely communistic. State ownership of the home, the cradle of civilization, is communism incarnate. Where the state owns the homes it owns the families living in them.

Karl Marx in his Communist Manifesto, said:

"The theory of Communists may be summed up in the single sentence: Abolition of private property."

And to have no doubt about what he meant he added:

"You reproach us with intending to do away with your property. Precisely so: That is just what we intend."

What Marx meant was not that communism was the abolition of property as such, but only the private ownership of property, and, of course, concomitantly its expropriation by the state.

The amount of communism that is involved in this public housing scheme is measured by the number of homes it places in the ownership of the state. There can be no escape from this conclusion.

Furthermore, as state ownership of homes takes place there must be a loss of private ownership of homes and other property in an amount at least as great as that taken over by the state.

This follows because the state has no resources except those which it obtains from the industrial group that produces the necessaries of life. The millions drawn by the state from the industrial group for the construction of houses are no longer available to that group for financing homes they can call their own as well as other private enterprises.

How far would this housing program go in communizing the Nation? The promoters of the scheme envision initially the building of from 4,500,000 to 6,500,000 houses at a money cost of from fifty to one hundred billion dollars. What would be left to be privately owned at the completion of this colossal undertaking? To pay for the cost would require the Federal Government to confiscate at least an equal amount of privately owned property involving our homes, farms, factories, bank deposits, social-security funds, investments, insurance policies, pension funds, et cetera. Karl Marx would smile in his grave if he could be apprised of this Federal-housing scheme.

State ownership of homes cannot possibly add to the sum total of human happiness, unless it be true that the state is endowed with those divine attributes which have up to now been denied to every individual human soul, namely, omniscency, omnipotency, and omniparency—infinite wisdom and power and the source and origin of all.

There are hardly many who believe the state has attained to any such godhood as this. Indeed, there is no reason to believe that the nature of the state is any different today than it always has been, and up to now it has been just about the worst of man's enemies.

The founding fathers realized this. The entire fabric of the Constitution was designed specifically to keep free the spirit of individualism and to protect us against the encroachments of the ever present cruel state.

We should distinguish between government and the state. True government protects men in keeping and enjoying the fruits of their labor. The state exists by expropriating the produce of others.

Gentlemen, if we would avoid the calamity of a totalitarian state and restore the heritage vouchsafed us by our forefathers, we must take courage and willingly sacrifice. This monstrous housing scheme is but a part of the challenge of communism.

The United States Housing Act, together with all public housing, should be abolished forthwith. The houses already constructed should be liquidated along with war surplus commodities. Every phase of home building should be left to private enterprise. There just is no such thing as compromising with communism. Either communism will destroy us or we will destroy communism. There is no other alternative.

The Cabaret Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER A. LYNCH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a joint resolution to reduce the tax from 30 to 15 percent on hotels, restaurants, and night clubs where entertainment is given to the patrons. Since the imposition of the tax, effective April 1, it has become obvious that within a short time the Government will receive less revenue with a 30-percent tax than with the 5-percent tax, as provided previously. Already many night clubs have closed, and hotels and restaurants that formerly paid the 5-percent tax, where entertainment was given, have now abolished the entertainment with the result that the Government does not even get the 5-percent.

I have in my possession a statement of the income of many hotels, restaurants, and night clubs that furnished entertainment to their patrons with their meals, and it shows a falling off in business for these concerns from 27 to 75 percent. Besides the loss of direct revenue from these diminishing returns, there is the further loss of revenue in income taxes not only of the concerns themselves but also in income taxes from their employees and other affiliated businesses.

It was never the intent of Congress to tax the hotels, restaurants, and night clubs out of business, but that will be the result in large part if the 30-percent tax is retained. I feel that 15 percent is the highest tax that can be imposed and at the same time permit this type of business to continue.

Anniversary of the Polish Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks of Archbishop Edward Mooney at the conclusion of the pontifical Mass he celebrated in Blessed Sacrament Cathedral, Detroit, May 3, to mark the anniversary of the Polish Constitution of 1791:

It is entirely appropriate that Americans of Polish origin or descent should keep alive the memory of the Polish Constitution of May 3, 1791. The Cambridge History of Poland records that "posterity joins with the best contemporary opinion in regarding the constitution of the 3d of May as one of the greatest achievements in Polish history." It was hailed by Edmund Burke as the "noblest benefit received by any nation at any time." This charter of ordered liberty was, indeed, swept away in the unprovoked aggression of Prussia and Russia which ended in the second partition of Poland in 1793, and its extinction as an independent country in 1795. But the light of liberty kindled served as a beacon for Polish patriots during the long night of oppression that lasted for 125 years until the restoration of the republic after the First World War. In the present dark days of indescribable oppression and suffering which the Nazi and Communist aggression of 1939 brought upon Poland, the memory of the historic document that made Poland a pioneer on the continent of Europe in establishing freedom under law may again serve to inspire her people and rally the friends of freedom to her cause.

It is appropriate, too, that this commemoration should gather us round the altar to pray for the cause of freedom and religion in the homeland of your fathers. For on May 3, 1791, the king and members of the Diet who had adopted the epoch-making charter marched in procession to the Church of St. John in Warsaw, pledged anew their allegiance to the constitution before the altar and intoned a Te Deum of thanksgiving for the accomplishment it marked. I gladly take this occasion to assure the hundreds of thousands of Catholic Americans of Polish descent whom you represent that other hundreds of thousands of your brothers in the faith in this diocese join in your prayers that our victory will bring justice for Catholic Poland, and share your concern for the sufferings of your far-off kinsfolk and for the future of faith and freedom in the martyred homeland. They acclaim your proud boast that Nazi terror has failed to create a Polish Quizling to serve its destructive ends, and they echo your hope that Communist cunning will not succeed in setting up a Polish puppet regime to further designs that would be ominous alike to Catholic faith and human rights in Poland, the historic bulwark of Christian civilization in eastern Europe.

In the peace which, please God, our victory will bring, it may well be that the case of Poland, as so often before in history, may be the test whether right or might will prevail in the councils of the nations. A just and durable peace can be built only on moral principles that are rooted at least in the natural law implanted in the heart of man by God, our Creator. In the application of these moral principles two points stand out. One is international cooperation as against the selfish prosecution of merely national purposes. This implies the solution of questions in dispute between nations by discussion and agreement rather than by unilateral fiat. It is of record that Poland's recognized government stands ready to submit to this kind of peaceful settlement an important question presently at issue and even, in the interest of the common good, to defer the settlement of that question until the day of victory over a common foe.

Another point that stands out in the application of moral principles to international relations is fidelity to the plighted word. In this regard Poland's case is clear and may well determine whether in the post-war settlement we are going to descend from the lofty idealism of the Atlantic Charter to the cynical realism of the Congress of Vienna. That way lies not peace but only another interlude between wars.

Thank God our own country, despite the persistent propaganda of unmoral realism on the part of certain columnists and commentators, has made no commitments which prejudice the settlement of disputed issues on the basis of moral principles. In a recent statement (March 24) on foreign policy President Roosevelt said: "The United Nations are fighting to make a world in which tyranny and aggression cannot exist; a world based upon freedom, equality, and justice; a world in which all persons regardless of race, color, or creed may live in peace, honor, and dignity." If the spirit of that pledge is kept, the cause of Poland is safe. If the spirit of that pledge is not kept, the cause of stable world peace is desperate.

The Murray-Wagner Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I enclose a speech given recently before the Lions Club, of Waterloo, Iowa, by Dr. Thomas F. Thornton, also of Waterloo, in regard to the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bills, S. 1161 and H. R. 2861:

The Murray-Wagner bill (S. 1161; H. R. 2861) was introduced in Congress June 3, 1943, by Senator WAGNER, of New York, and Senator MURRAY, of Montana, in the Senate, and by Representative DINGELL, of Michigan, in the House of Representatives. In the Senate it was referred to the Finance Committee, and in the House to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The features of this bill plan a vast expansion of the Government social-security program to include unemployment insurance, sickness, disability, and maternity benefits, death benefits, old-age retirement, and State medical, laboratory, and hospital care. It is estimated that these provisions of the bill would add another 25,000,000 to the 37,000,000 people now carrying social-security cards, increasing the number to 62,000,000; and that they, together with their dependents, would make at least 110,000,000 people coming under the provisions of the bill. This bill to introduce totalitarian medicine in the United States by requiring 110,000,000 people to take out Government sickness and accident insurance, and whether they want it or not, seems to have been planned without any consultation with representatives of either the insurance companies or the medical profession. Inquiry by the American Medical Association of reliable sources in Washington indicates the probability that the actual designers and authors of the bill included I. S. Falk, Director of the Bureau of Research and Statistics of the Social Security Board of the Federal Security Administration; Mr. Wilbur J. Cohen, technical adviser of the Social Security Board; and Senator WAGNER'S secretary, Mr. Philip Levy.

In addition to the extension of the various phases of social security, the bill makes provision for the Government to furnish general medical, special medical, laboratory, and hospital benefits for more than 110,000,000 people in the United States.

It makes the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service (whoever he might be) a virtual Gauleiter of American medicine by placing in the hands of this one man the power and authority to:

1. Hire doctors and establish rates of pay.
2. Establish fee schedules for services.
3. Establish qualifications for specialists.
4. Determine the number of individuals for whom any physician may provide service.
5. Determine arbitrarily what hospitals or clinics may provide service for patients.

The bill provides for tax payments from, and insurance benefits to:

1. Practically every employed person in the United States.
2. Every self-employed person.

The bill provides that:

1. Section 960: Every employer shall pay a tax on wages paid to individuals up to $3,000 a year of 6 percent.
2. Section 961: Every employee shall pay a tax, deducted from wages on earned income up to $3,000 a year of 6 percent. (For the average person earning $2,400 a year, this deduction would amount to as much as, or more than, his income tax.)
3. Section 963: Every self-employed individual shall pay a tax on the market value of his services up to $3,000 a year, of 7 percent. (Under this would come the farmer, professional men and women, the small independent businessman, filling station owners and operators, barbers and cosmetologists, etc.)
4. Section 962: Federal, State, and municipal employees (under certain conditions) shall pay a tax of 3½ percent.

It has been estimated in editorials in such newspapers as the Chicago Daily News and the Washington Star that the passage of this bill would, at least for the present, accumulate deductions from many workers' wages of 20 percent for income tax, 12 percent for social security, a total of 32 percent, and in addition whatever is being deducted for War Bonds and other plant programs. It is, therefore, apparent that up to 50 percent of a man's salary might be deducted. Yet the C. I. O. and A. F. of L. are back of this program 100 percent. Obviously, labor can be expected to ask for and get a 6 percent raise to cover its cost for the program, hence passing this on to the public.

It has been estimated that the total annual income from this bill would be over $12,000,000,000, and that $3,000,000,000 would be placed in a separate account known as the Medical Care and Hospital Account. In considering figures of this magnitude it is well to make comparisons against familiar equals. For instance, the average annual total income of our Federal Government for the 10-year period of 1924–34 was $3,541,000,000. In the year 1938 the total expenditures of the French Republic and its vast colonial empire totaled $3,130,000,000. This staggering sum is the amount which is to be spent annually on medical and hospital care alone. And the remainder of the revenue from this bill alone, or three times the previously mentioned $3,000,000,000, namely $9,000,000,000, is to be spent on expansion of social security. To what astronomical figures the total annual cost of our Government would soar is unpredictable.

While the actual plans for allocation of this $3,000,000,000 are not made public, the Surgeon General could do the following:

1. Allocate 20 percent for administrative cost, $600,000,000.
2. Hire every effective physician in the United States at an average salary of $5,000 a year, $600,000,000.
3. Buy every available bed in every non-government-owned hospital (368,046) 365 days each year at $5 a day, over $650,000,000.

4. Pay $2.50 for each Government-owned hospital bed a day (1,051,781) 365 days a year, over $950,000,000.

5. Spend for drugs and medicines, over $150,000,000.

6. Assume the total costs of operating the 66 accredited medical colleges in the United States, over $21,000,000.

7. Pay 20,000 additional medical students $700 a year during the training period, $14,000,000.

8. Spend for other research each year, $12,000,000.

This bill would establish a national advisory medical board and hospital council appointed by the Surgeon General. The council would be purely advisory, as all authority and power are vested by the bill in the Surgeon General. The manner in which these advisory councils function in a bureaucratic government is well illustrated by the advisory committee of the Children's Bureau in the recent adoption of provisions for administration of emergency medical maternal and hospital care to the wives of enlisted men. There are on this advisory committee a few physicians, but none of them are in practice, being either Federal employees or faculty members. The physicians are so far outnumbered on the committee by social workers and Federal employees that they have no voice whatever in its deliberations. When the emergency maternity and infant-care program was completed, the Children's Bureau called the advisory committee into session, presented the plan to it, and asked it to approve it without revision, objection, or comment. In other words, "Here it is, for the sake of the record, approve it." And so a maternity and infant-care program affecting every serviceman's wife and involving the expenditure of millions of dollars was put into effect without counsel of any practicing physician or his representative national organization.

The Surgeon General could be a medical czar.

1. Physicians might practice only by the grace of the Surgeon General.

2. Patients might select their own doctor if he or she met the Surgeon General's standards, or if the physician's quota was not full.

3. Payments would be made to the physician by the Government according to a fee schedule established by the Surgeon General regardless of quality of service rendered.

4. The Surgeon General would pay the physician according to a fee schedule, on a per capita basis, or salary basis, or a combination or modification of these bases.

5. The Surgeon General would publish a list of institutions found by him to be participating hospitals, and his would be the only O. K. required.

6. He would also, within certain limits, determine the payment for each day of hospitalization, and on his agreement or disagreement would depend the medical care and hospitalization of more than 110,000,000 people in the United States of America.

Furthermore, the bill contemplates bringing dental, nursing, and other needed benefits under its authority in the near future. The bill gives the Surgeon General and the Social Security Board the task of ascertaining the most effective methods of providing dental and nursing care; and contemplates that they will report the results of their findings, with recommendations as to legislation, not later than January 1, 1946. The Wagner-Murray bill is being sponsored by powerful interests. President William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, says that "it is the fruit of a 5-year study by experts on the staff of the American Federation of Labor, which will give the proposed program full sponsorship and support," and the social reformers and bureaucratic politicians will do their utmost to secure its passage.

The proponents of federalized medicine have often charged organized medicine with being "reactionary," and of disapproving any plan to further the extension of medical care. The medical profession, proud of the ideals of its heritage, and of its long record of gratuitous public service, has too long remained contemptuously silent. What are the actual facts?

The physician's creed of the best professional service to each patient regardless of race, creed, or ability to pay is almost too well known to bear mentioning, yet it should be emphasized. The medical profession has always made every effort to raise the standards of medical care. It has insisted on increasing educational requirements to keep pace with the broadening knowledge of medical science. It has attempted to protect the public from quackery by elimination of low-grade schools and diploma mills. It has attempted through the machinery of the American Medical Association to study and assist in the establishment of plans for the further extension of medical service to the public. To be more specific, the Bureau of Medical Economics of the American Medical Association acts as a clearinghouse to study and make available all types of plans for the group extension of medical care. These plans are available to all State and county societies. The recently formed committee on medical service and public relations is actively encouraging formation and operation of such plans. The committee on industrial health has a very active national campaign to reduce industrial hazards.

What has American medicine done? It has been estimated that the physicians give, in normal times, approximately $1,000,000 per day of medical care to the indigent. The Murray-Wagner bill does not cover the indigent. County funds for medical care of the indigent must still be raised by local taxation. Under the American system, American medicine and American doctors have developed the most effective and the most widely distributed medical care that has ever been provided for any comparable number of people anywhere at any time. In the last 150 years the average life expectancy has been nearly doubled from 35 years in 1790 to almost 62 years today. This is an increase of 12 years since 1900. In the last 40 years the national death rate has been lowered 695 per 100,000. Typhoid fever, smallpox, and diphtheria have been conquered; pernicious anemia, tuberculosis, diabetes, and many lesser ailments are being brought under control. The miracles of sulfa drugs and penicillin will be reflected in further increases in life expectancy.

It might also be worth while to examine the record made by American doctors in the war. On September 25, 1943, Lt. Gen. Mark Clark, of the Fifth Army, wrote a letter to Maj. Gen. Norman T. Kirk, Surgeon General of the United States Army, eulogizing the medical units of his army for their "devotion to duty under the hazardous and trying circumstances of the landing in Salerno Bay. Many wounded officers and men who will eventually be restored to full health would have died but for the effective work of the Medical Corps. The beach medical service was superior. The whole performance of the Fifth Army medical service has been most heartening to me and has been of incalculable aid in the operation." Between 80 and 90 percent of all soldiers wounded in battle get first-aid treatment within an hour. The death rate in the last World War ran between 15 and 16 percent, but in this war it has dropped to between 2½ and 3½ percent, due to the medical care being rendered. Parents all over the country may rest easier knowing that their sons in service are receiving an extraordinarily high type of medical care, from the camps in this country clear up to the front lines of every battlefield.

The Wagner bill would scrap this system for federalized medicine, in which the physician would have little incentive to develop his skill. As in all centrally controlled organizations, efforts to economize by standardization would result in loss of initiative. It is conceded that should some personal request be made it might be met by the answer that "this is Washington's ruling." The tendency for advancement to depend on pull and political influence instead of professional ability would probably be evident. Such a regimented profession would have little attraction for the alert, enterprising youth. The more brilliant minds would be attracted to fields of endeavor where rewards are more commensurate with ability.

If medicine does not approve of federalized control, what then does it offer? First, the maintenance of the free and competitive system of the practice of medicine which has been responsible for our most enviable record; second, it offers maintenance of active national, State, and county professional societies to stimulate professional attainment and further educational standards. It offers an increase and further correlation of the activities of the allied professions of dentistry, nursing, medicine, pharmacy, and veterinary medicine, and thus a continued improvement in public health. It has pledged itself to further the extension of medical care to the low- or medium-income groups. This is best achieved by the organization of nonprofit, public-service plans for medical service based on prepayment of medical care, much like the blue-cross plan for hospital care. Such plans should be in accordance with local needs, developed by local authorities, and administered by the community concerned. In other words, a type of medical service should be developed to fit the community instead of fitting the community to a national plan. Plans such as these are now functioning actively in New Jersey, New York, Michigan, Washington, California, and other States. They represent a type of medical service which offers free choice of physicians, low cost to the public—no $12,000,000,000 per year to be raised by taxation—and stimulus to the physician to develop his ability.

In the last analysis, your answer to whether you want federalized high-cost medicine must be a personal one. When the time of critical illness comes to you or to your loved ones, as it must come to everyone, do you want a Government doctor on the job or do you want your own doctor there? The decision is yours. If you want your own doctor, let your Senator and your Congressman know that you will approve of his efforts to defeat the Wagner bill.

Address of Governor O'Conor, of Maryland, at Dedication of Pulaski Highway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, I include a speech by Governor O'Conor at the dedication of the Pulaski Highway in Maryland, and a letter from the Polish National Alliance of Baltimore.

On May 3 Polish people all over the world celebrate Constitution Day. After years of yearning to be free, years of internal turmoil and political strife, the Polish constitution was adopted. It was patterned after our Constitution, which had been adopted only a few years before.

A strong bond has always existed between the United States and Poland. Both countries have much in common. Both are liberty-loving nations. Both have fought in the past for freedom's cause. Both are fighting today for the preservation of that liberty. General Pulaski fought that our Constitution might come into existence and it is therefore fitting that Americans should today fight to restore Poland to its former independence and liberty.

Poland's Constitution Day has frequently found that country torn and pillaged by forces that detest liberty and all that liberty stands for. However, physical properties may be destroyed and man-made institutions crumble, but the spirit of such a brave people can never be crushed. Ignoring overwhelming odds, refusing to submit to the yoke of tyranny, the Polish people have preferred to die fighting for honor, rather than live in dishonor.

I considered it a great honor to be present on that occasion in paying tribute to General Pulaski. I hope that the day will not be far when this Pulaski Highway will be extended to Savannah, Ga., where Pulaski died as he lived—a hero.

Governor O'Conor's address follows:

Every Marylander will join wholeheartedly this afternoon with our fellow citizens of Polish birth or ancestry in paying deserved honor to the memory of a gallant son of Poland, Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski. Dedication of this highway as the Pulaski Highway will serve as a perpetual inspiration to the members of the splendid Polish colony within our State, and as a perpetual reminder to all the people of Maryland of the signal services rendered to the cause of liberty by General Pulaski.

He gave his life to help establish American independence. That, after so many years, the State of Maryland should so honor his memory is evidence, indeed, of the lasting esteem in which he is held by Americans of every racial extraction. Justly fitting is it, therefore, that here in Maryland, where General Pulaski was authorized by the legislature to recruit his famous Pulaski's legion, the first section of highway should be named for him. Because his services to his country covered a territory extending from New York to Georgia, where finally at the siege of Savannah he received a mortal wound, I sincerely hope that eventually there will be one continuous Pulaski highway stretching from the Hudson to the deep South. It is gratifying, indeed, that Maryland has shown the way in this regard.

Our own American patriots of the Revolutionary War have always been accorded the acclaim they so richly deserve. Theirs was a fight, however, for their own homeland. They were defending their loved ones, their possessions, against what they considered the unjust aggression of a country across the sea. Theirs was the primary urge for self-preservation, and they fought to the death for love of this new land, for the development of which they had struggled and suffered.

With General Pulaski, however, it was not a question of defending loved ones, or of preservation of his own country. He came to America, a strange country, through his own free will, and out of the gallantry of his nature, to aid a desperate cause—to fight for an ideal. To him the ideal of freedom was all-important. Even though the American settlers who sought to be freed from oppression were of another race, they had his sympathy. In the nobleness of his nature, to sympathize was to act, and he gave to the cause of the struggling American Colonies the utmost gift that any patriot has to offer, his very life.

Under such circumstances, is it to be wondered that the American people have always given special honor to General Pulaski and that little band of foreign patriots who not only helped with their personal services and means in our war for independence, but who, far more important, furnished a fresh inspiration for America's tiny Army fighting against such tremendous odds?

The debt owed by America to General Pulaski, therefore, is one that can never be repaid. That, in this dedication today the people of Maryland are seeking to perpetuate further the memory of his gallant deeds, is a tribute not alone to the brave man himself, but is a tribute likewise to the many splendid citizens of Polish birth or extraction who throughout the years and today have made so vast a contribution to the progress of our State in peace as well as in war.

From this day forward, therefore, throughout the years to come, the name of this gallant son of Poland will be inscribed on the records of the State of Maryland. Enrolled under a decree of the Maryland Legislature, Pulaski Highway will endure and serve continuingly to do honor to the general who did so much for America and to remind the people of Maryland of the many other compatriots of General Pulaski who constitute today so fine a group within our citizenry.

Proper is it, likewise, that these exercises, honoring an immortal son of Poland, should take place on Polish Constitution Day, a day replete with meaning and throbbing with promise to every loyal Polish heart. Americans rightly value to the fullest the American Constitution, with its extraordinary grant of privileges to all enrolled in its citizenry. Proud and happy are we because of the unbroken span of years throughout which our forefathers have lived and prospered under it, and have fought and suffered to strengthen the bonds of that great Constitution.

Little of such consolation has been available to the citizens of tragic Poland. Established as a national entity back in the years following our own War of Independence, the people of Poland, through their national Parliament, after 3 years of tumultuous debate, adopted a constitution on May 3, 1791, that paralleled in many respects the American Constitution ratified by the American Congress just 4 years before.

Hardly was the ink dry on the confirming signatures, however, before subversive influences in the nation, with help from outside the country, brought to naught all the good that had been accomplished, and Poland, after a period of dissension and internal struggle, disappeared in 1795 from the European scene.

With this partition of Polish territory, the Polish people, after their brief enjoyment of constitutional integrity, had but a memory to cherish for more than a century of troubled existence. Following World War No. 1, the restoration of Poland, resulting from the Treaty of Versailles, brought a revival of the constitution of May 3, 1791, and for a few welcome years the people of Poland were privileged to know the happiness of democratic self-government. The Nazi blight struck again, however, and first one and then another enemy nation descended upon Polish territory. Once again the benefits of constitutional government were lost. Once again stark tragedy engulfed the Polish Nation.

Surely no other people in the world could sympathize more deeply with the people of ravaged Poland than we who throughout all our lives, and throughout all the course of our national history, have known the priceless benefits of free, constitutional government. Today as we gather here in free assembly, to pay homage to a gallant man who gave his all in the cause of freedom, let us give voice to the hope that, in God's providence this horrible war may soon be brought to a conclusion, the only conclusion possible if justice is to be preserved upon the earth. That conclusion is victory, victory for the united forces of democracy and freedom, victory against a brutal foe whose every policy and action have sought to destroy the meaning of freedom and democracy throughout the world.

As we ponder Poland's plight, let us be resolved likewise to cherish with renewed fervor our love of America and all for which she stands. Let us work and pray unceasingly that, through the gallantry of the millions of fine Americans now fighting on many fronts or tensely awaiting the invasion that will free all Europe from the slavery imposed by Hitler and his hordes, freedom again may be brought to the unhappy people of Poland. May God grant that, once again established among the free family of nations, the Polish people may for all the years to come progress in peace and happiness toward that ideal of government envisioned by their great Parliament in the Polish Constitution of 1791.

As the chivalrous General Pulaski gave unstinted devotion to the cause of the struggling American Colonies in those dark days of the struggle for independence, so may the Almighty rekindle in General Pulaski's native land a flame of freedom that will never be dimmed. May the people of Poland be privileged to know soon again, and in fullest measure, the joys of that national and individual liberty which General Pulaski gave his life to help achieve here. And may this Pulaski Highway be for all time a shining symbol of the brotherhood of freedom that binds in closest friendship the land of his birth to the country of his adoption.

COMMUNITY 142, POLISH
NATIONAL ALLIANCE,
Baltimore, Md., April 27, 1944.

Hon. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, Jr.,
Congressman of the Third District,
Baltimore City, Md.

DEAR SIR: Council 142 of the Polish National Alliance has passed the following resolution:

On the 3d day of May 1791, the Kingdom of Poland, already reduced by the tripartite partitions, unanimously adopted a new constitution which provided for liberty and equal rights for all men. What other nations and people did with bloodshed, Poland with her long tradition of tolerance accomplished by peaceful means.

In these critical times, when not only Poland but the whole world is fighting against the dark forces of oppression and totalitarianism, it is fitting that this date be commemorated by us in the United States.

The Poles, always ready to support the democratic cause, were again the first to stand against the enemy of freedom. Again they followed their motto: "For your freedom and for ours."

Could you, sir, on the 3d of May call this fact to the attention of the American Senate? It is our duty as Americans to remember an ally who, though faced with insurmountable obstacles, would rather die than surrender.

The constitution of the 3d of May is another monument that testifies to the democratic spirit of Poland.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANK GREGOREK,
President.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. TOM STEWART

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TUNNELL] before the seventh annual conference of the seaboard region, Mizrachi-Zionist Organization of America, Beth Tfiloh Synagogue, Baltimore, Md., April 30, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The difficulty for myself in addressing an audience of persons belonging to your great organization is that I realize that no matter what I may say, it could be better said by my audience. It would be useless for a person in my position to attempt to numerate to you either the doctrines or the hopes of your organization. You know these better than I do.

I might say at the outset that those of us who have studied the Bible must respect it as a history, a textbook, an incentive to greater accomplishments. Perhaps 90 percent of the population of the world believe in a supreme being. However, it is only those who have studied the book, which you call the Bible and which we call the Old Testament, who know the true God. The followers of Buddha believe in some sort of eternal life of happiness. The Mohammedan believes in Allah, and he believes in future rewards and punishments. The American Indian believed in the happy hunting ground where he could live forever in a land where he could pursue the sort of life for which he believed himself to be adapted and which he enjoyed. The heathen believes in a supreme being of some sort. He believes in what we call miracles. He believes in the setting aside of the natural law for his benefit. But the followers of all false gods failed to recognize their gods as the creators of the universe, the creator of man himself and the supreme being in the spirit world. When Jehovah selected from among the sons of man, Abraham to be his friend, He designated the man through whom contact with the true God was to be made possible for mankind.

It has always been my theory that you can judge an organization, a nation, or the individuals which compose either or both, by their accomplishments. A number of years ago I was in the valley where Salt Lake City was built. I looked at the desert surrounding that city. I walked on its streets. I saw its beautiful buildings, the wonderful temple built there by the Mormons, and I said that no organization that was bad could have accomplished such wonders. The Mormons have transformed a desert into a garden. The record of an organization either justifies its existence or fails to do so. The unanimous judgment of large bodies of people can usually be trusted. The judgments of generations of people are usually right. I can think of no greater accomplishment by any organization or by any people than that of preserving the traditions of the true God and passing down these traditions to those of other races and other beliefs.

What has been the general effect on mankind of these beliefs? I have never heard any man or woman question or contradict the moral teachings of the Bible. There are those who have different ideas as to the Deity. There are those who deny the existence of a God. I have never known any man to contradict the teachings of the Bible as to the moral law. I once knew an atheist who said that there was no God. However, he said the Bible was a good book to live by. He was a Bible student. The moral teachings in the Bible are the basis for the moral teachings of much of the world. I have been told that the moral teachings of Confucius and the moral teachings of Mohammed are largely in harmony with Biblical teachings.

Be that as it may, the world has been more widely affected by the teachings of the believers of the Bible than by the teachings of any other organization or sect in the world's history. But the consolation to the world furnished by your organization goes much further than the moral law. Since man's birth there has been no greater blessing than to give to him an explanation and a history of his origin and development, his creation, his existence, and his future state. These have been preserved and passed on to the world through your people and your teachings. I say these things not as a means of furnishing information to my audience, but as an acknowledgment to my audience of my own realization of those facts.

My observation has been that people are remembered in proportion to the efforts that they have made for others. I once knew a man of quite some prominence. He was 4 years a Member of the House of Representatives at Washington. I heard one of his constituents say that that particular man could have had anything within the gift of the people of the State if he could just once have thought of somebody else except himself. As we look back on the lives of those who have attained prominence in our Nation, and whose memories are revered, I first think of Washington. I think of that palatial mansion at Mount Vernon. I think of the comforts and conveniences that surrounded him there. I am told that he had under cultivation 2,700 acres of land. His name was respected throughout America. His honesty was recognized throughout the world. We are told that the products from his estate in Virginia were accepted in the West India Islands without inspection. He was a ruler in his neighborhood. He was monarch of all he surveyed. Yet he gave up in the prime of his life the pleasures, conveniences, and even the necessities which he was financially able to procure at his home, and devoted himself to the interests of his fellow Americans in establishing in America a government based on a new principle. He believed that all sovereignty originated and remained in the average man. He established on the Western Continent a democracy, and that democracy has spread to a large part of the world, and even today men are fighting on dozens of battlefields to make permanent the principles of democratic government.

I think of Robert E. Lee with his palatial mansion at Arlington. He was the only man whose military operations were so widely recognized that he was offered the command of each of the armies in our great Civil War. Yet he gave up the comforts and satisfaction of a life of ease to fight for what he thought was right. He fought for his beloved State of Virginia.

I think of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, who left his homely surroundings in the State of Illinois to come to Washington, the seat of struggle between the great contending elements in American life, that he might struggle for the permanency of the Union. From the struggles and privations of George Washington a world has learned the benefits and blessings of the democratic form of government. From the military lessons taught by Robert E. Lee, the world is still studying military strategy. Through the efforts of Abraham Lincoln and those who believed as he did, the Union was preserved and slavery in the United States was abolished. These men are remembered and will ever be remembered for the sacrifices made by them for others.

In studying the history of your organization, I think of the blessings you are trying to afford to others. I think of the virtues represented by your organization. First, and underlying all your efforts, is the desire to furnish a home to a persecuted and downtrodden people. You in America are, for the most part, in a position where you could live at least in comfort by your work. You have taken upon yourselves the burden of your people. You are sacrificing your time and efforts for the benefit of less fortunate people. I have read of some of the work of your organization. You have tried to surround those who accept the blessings of this home in Palestine with the things which you believe to be necessary for their comfort, their strength and their refinement.

First, as is natural, I see that you have established synagogues in Palestine. You have properly emphasized the importance of the permanency of religion among your people. If Palestine is to become the land of promise, it must remain the land of the religion of the true God. If this land of promise is to be inhabited by people justifying the efforts that are made for them, they must be a physically strong people. In addition to the exercise which they would have in the development of this country, I see that your organization has made possible the first religious gymnasium, formerly in Jaffa and now in Tel Aviv.

Your organization has been instrumental in establishing 130 public schools and kindergartens in Palestine. They have established teachers' seminaries that these schools may be properly manned with an educated force. Girls' technical schools have been established, and are being maintained. Seventy percent of the stock of a banking institution has been subscribed through your efforts in America.

The only religious Hebrew daily newspaper in the world has been established in Palestine through the efforts of your organization. Linotype machines and other means of economical printing have been introduced in that land. Eighteen thousand trees have been set out in Palestine. Palestine, which is about the size of the State of Tennessee has a population of 1,600,000. This has greatly increased since the Zionist movement started. The Hebrew population has multiplied several times. Even the Arab population has greatly increased. Roads, universities, schools, agricultural production, as well as manufacturing, have greatly increased during this period. Why has all this development taken place? Why has this money been raised? Why have these sacrifices been made? In order to give a complete answer to these questions, it would be necessary to describe the persecutions of Poland, of Germany, and to a great extent all eastern Europe.

A comprehensive discussion of this question would involve the whole Nazi movement. It would involve the psychology by which Adolf Hitler has made himself the master of Europe. His appeals to racial prejudices, his animosity displayed toward the whole world, and particularly against the Jews, the mass murder of the Jewish people, is something which has not been equaled in barbarity since the Middle Ages. The fact that the Jewish people had many centuries ago been scattered from Palestine throughout the world, the fact that the Jewish people have no national home which they can call their own, the fact that they represent a minority in almost all of the jurisdictions of the world, the fact that as to their individual activities they have been successful, the fact that Palestine was not only the place of their greatest national development, but that it was also the home of their ancient temples and their ancient rulers, all these facts show their incentives. But their ancient defeats and their intelligent triumphs caused a widespread demand that Palestine should be made a national home for refugees from persecuted areas throughout the world. In line with this demand, the world heard the Balfour Declaration. This declaration was issued by the British Government on November 2, 1917, and pledged the British Government to use its best endeavors to facilitate the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, but providing that nothing should be done which would prejudice the civil and religious rights enjoyed by Jews not in their country.

The American Congress approved this declaration. The declaration was almost unanimously acclaimed. The great movement was begun. However, as in all great movements, there was a difference of opinion. Many Jewish people do not approve of the Zionist movement. The Moslems of Palestine either are or are supposed to be antagonistic to the Zionist movement. The Moslems own a very large percentage of the land. However, they have never refused to sell that land to the Jewish people. The movement was proceeding in a fairly satisfactory manner until the British Government issued what is known as the white-paper declaration. By this declaration, the great migration of the persecuted Jewish people from many lands was stopped on the last day of March 1944. To the Arab population of Palestine there is little sentimental value to Palestine. To the Jew it is the home of his fathers, the promised land to the chosen people of his faith. For fifteen hundred years his people dominated the land of Canaan. Since the Balfour Declaration, and since Great Britain assumed the obligation to maintain peace in Palestine, there lies the great weight of that obligation upon Great Britain. Great Britain, at the conclusion of this war, should take steps to meet its obligation to the Jewish people.

By the Balfour Declaration, Great Britain encouraged the Jewish people throughout the world to expect that a home would be made in Palestine for its people. The Zionist movement demands, and has a right to expect from Great Britain at the termination of this World War a home in the land of its fathers. This accomplishment will be a victory for those who seek to establish a home. It will be a victory for those who seek to establish a religious capital for the Jewish faith. It will establish a home for those who now have no national home. It will end barbaric slaughter of Jewish people, and will result in the development of Palestine to an extent that will gratify and be pleasing to the Jew, as well as the gentile, to the faithful followers of Allah, as well as to every believer in national integrity and racial fair dealing. We, both Jew and gentile, shall see the ancient shrine of our religion revived, renewed, and revitalized.

Administration Foreign Policies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an ddress on the subject Are Administration Foreign Policies Making More Difficult the Formation of a Post-war Peace Organization of Nations? which I delivered in Cleveland last Saturday evening to the War Veterans Republican Club of Ohio.

I also ask to have printed, following the address, two editorials commenting on it, one from the Scripps-Howard papers, and one from the Cleveland Plain-dealer.

There being no objection, the address and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARE ADMINISTRATION FOREIGN POLICIES MAKING MORE DIFFICULT THE FORMATION OF A POST-WAR PEACE ORGANIZATION OF NATIONS?

At this moment, when American boys are anxious waiting to be conveyed across the Channel onto the continent of Europe, or perhaps are actually on their way, it is right that we think through clearly the reasons why for the second time in 27 years we invade the continent of Europe. The thought and sympathy and deep concern of our entire people go with those men, many of whom may be wounded or lost thousands of miles from their homes. Why, it is asked, are they making this tremendous sacrifice?

Obviously the invasion is undertaken because the military authorities believe it is the best way to inflict an overwhelming defeat on Hitler and Nazi Germany. As I see it, our purpose in this war is to assure the freedom of the people of the United States and bring about a world condition in which they may work out, without invasion or threats of invasion by foreign nations, the destiny of the American Republic here at home. We are not fighting to spread the "four freedoms" throughout the world, although we hope that national and individual freedom may be promoted by our victory. We are not fighting to establish democracy throughout the world, though we hope that a victory over Germany may show the strength of democratic government and establish nations less likely to disturb the peace of the world. We do not and cannot undertake a crusade to spread the ideals which we approve without admitting the right of others to crusade for their ideals. A world of crusaders would be a world perpetually at war. We fight this war for the same reason we fought the Revolutionary War: "To secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

To accomplish that purpose the first step is to inflict overwhelming defeat on the aggressor nations which set out to conquer the world. Nothing will discourage aggression in the future so much as the complete punishment inflicted by modern war on a defeated nation. After the present bombing campaign and the occupation of Germany it will be many years before any nation can again convince itself that it can defy and conquer the world. We invade Europe to inflict a crushing defeat on Germany because that is the best way to prevent the recurrence of German aggression. I believe, myself, that it is two-thirds of the job. Even if we should fail temporarily in our plans for a future peace organization it will be long before anyone again would dare to challenge the United States of America.

The second step, however, the formation of a peace organization, is just as essential for complete success in this war. I believe that military victory over Germany is a necessary prerequisite to any hope of setting up an association of nations with any chance of success, and we can only assure permanent peace and liberty in this country by the formation of some kind of association of nations to maintain the peace of the world. There has been tremendous debate on this issue, but there is also substantial agreement. The Republican Post-war Advisory Council at Mackinac pledged our party to responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression and to attain permanent peace with organized justice in a free world. The Moscow Declaration, approved by Secretary Hull, and the Connally resolution, adopted by the votes of an overwhelming majority of Republican and Democratic Senators, both recognize the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Ohio on Tuesday will give an overwhelming vote of confidence to John Bricker as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States. On April 26 he endorsed the Mackinac Resolution and stated his belief that the United States must take her place in a cooperative organization of sovereign nations, bent upon peace and supported by the will for peace among their peoples. Secretary Hull, Mr. Dewey, and other leaders of both parties agree substantially on the general principles of such a cooperative organization, that it shall not be a world state, that it shall not be based on exclusive alliances, but that like the old League of Nations it shall be based on the sovereign equality of all states, with more definite commitments to check aggression. A committee of Congress containing representatives of both parties is now working with Secretary Hull on the draft of a detailed covenant to carry out this policy.

There is not much use in debating it further until we can discuss the details, and that is probably another year. There is too much tendency on the part of our newspapers and commentators to belabor the issue, test every public man by his method of expressing general approval of the proposal, and so concentrate the spotlight that we can't see what is really going on in the dark field of foreign negotiation. The danger to the accomplishment of a League today does not come from so-called isolationists or any unwillingness on the part of our people to go ahead. It comes only from the demands of England or Russia and failures in our own current foreign policy.

First, a peace organization must rest on the firm foundation of organized justice in a free world. There is not much use in talking about an organization based on the sovereign equality of peace-loving states, unless we can be sure that such sovereign equality exists before we start. If we are going to abide by the decision of some international body on the question of what constitutes aggression and who is an aggressor, we want to be sure that England and Russia, at least, as well as all the other members of the League, are prepared in good faith to undertake the same obligation. It is impossible to expect success in protecting the freedom of independent nations unless we are certain that that freedom exists from the start, to be protected. The failure of the Treaty of Versailles did not rest entirely on the failure of the United States to join the League of Nations. It resulted largely from the unwise terms relating to boundaries and economic relations.

The Atlantic Charter definitely recognizes the essential nature of national freedom as a basis of hopes for a better future for the world. It says, "First, their countries seek no aggrandizement, territorial or other;

"Second, they desire to seek no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned;

"Third, they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them." The policies pursued by our Government up to this time have not encouraged hope that these conditions will be met. As far as we know, our Government has not raised its voice at all in behalf of the freedom of Poland, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, or Lithuania. It seems doubtful whether this basic condition of a successful association of nations was mentioned at Moscow or Teheran. Although we have sent more than $4,000,000,000 worth of lend-lease supplies to Russia to help carry out the first objective, of winning the war, we have apparently exacted no promises of any kind that will help the second objective, of winning the peace, except the very general terms of the Moscow Four-Power Agreement. Of course, this is not a time to determine exact boundaries, but up to this time we have not established even the principle of the freedom and sovereignty of these states. England went to war to protect Poland against Germany. Certainly the war becomes a grim farce if we are unable to protect the essential integrity of Poland against Russia.

Our attitude toward Finland is strangely inconsistent with our general professions for self-determination. We are apparently insisting that they accept a peace with Russia based on the transfer to Russia of large sections of completely Finnish territory, with the implied threat that if they do not do so they will get much worse treatment and possibly be deprived of their freedom altogether. Finland was first attacked by Russia without any provocation whatsoever. Its freedom throughout history has always been threatened by Russia far more than by Germany and naturally in a war between Russia and Germany it took the German side. But we are not at war with Finland any more than Russia is at war with Japan. It is futile even to consider a league of sovereign nations if the world is to be full of small nations governed by foreigners and yearning constantly for the restoration of their liberties. A league to be successful must eliminate political sore spots throughout the world, and not create a new rash even more numerous than those created by the Treaty of Versailles. I still have every hope that the Russians will agree to conditions on which permanent peace may be founded, but my impression is that Mr. Roosevelt did nothing whatever at Teheran even to suggest restraint to Mr. Stalin. Our policy seems to have been based on the delightful theory that Mr. Stalin in the end will turn out to have an angelic nature and do of his own accord the things which we should have insisted upon at the beginning.

Nor has there been any effort, as far as one can see, to suggest to the British a more liberal policy in the Far East to carry out the principles of the Atlantic Charter, and make a sounder basis for peace. It is rumored that when Chiang Kai-shek raised the question of Hong Kong at the Cairo Conference, he was promptly slapped down by Mr. Churchill. Yet, to the layman, Hong Kong would appear to be a Chinese island, appropriately a part of a restored China. Apparently we are about to restore the Dutch East Indies to the Dutch without any conditions as to the freedom of any of those islands, or any arrangement for their determining for themselves their form of government. I believe a successful league of nations can probably be based on the former status of India and the Indies if there is some assurance of gradual independence or autonomy, but I cannot see that we are doing anything to urge even that policy upon our allies.

I do not wish to judge finally any of the problems I have discussed, but I do want to suggest that they are far more important and far more difficult than the theoretical discussion of the exact terms of a covenant of a league of nations.

Furthermore, there are other questions whose sound solution is just as important for ultimate peace. Economic sore spots are as likely to bring about war as are political sore spots. There is general agreement on the principle that every nation shall have access on equal terms to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity. It is furthermore necessary that in some way countries requiring raw materials have markets for their own goods by whose sale they may pay for these materials. Freedom from want for nations is a desirable and perhaps attainable goal, even though it is not attainable for individuals throughout the entire world. Here again we must base the whole plan on freedom and equality of treatment for every nation.

I admit that this whole problem is very complicated and difficult to work out, but, as far as I know, no steps have been taken in that direction at all. As usual with the New Deal, there is in substance only one solution suggested up to this time. That is that American money and American charity shall solve every problem. The proposed international stabilization fund and the proposed international bank are based on the same fallacy. Almost all the real money to go into these funds is to be supplied by the United States. It is then to be distributed by boards controlled by the financially weak and borrower nations. In both cases our initial contribution is limited, but we may advance additional money. Our initial contribution will be promptly exhausted, and we will then be told that unless we come to the rescue the whole plan for world stability will collapse. Like most spending solutions for domestic problems it resembles the pouring of money down the sewer, but it is just a little worse because our own people do not get any advantage from it.

Of course, we should consult with foreign nations as to their needs and sit in on international boards to discuss their problems. Of course, we are interested in helping them to stabilize their currency. But we must reserve our freedom of action to handle our own cash for stabilizing exchange or assisting other countries. I suggest that we first work out an agreement with England as to the relation of the dollar and the pound, and then consider one by one the condition of the other countries. Their currency status is only a result of one feature—their poor economic condition or poor budget policy. The way to deal with the matter is by direct loans in reasonable amount on definite conditions imposed by us. They should be only enough to enable the borrower to import raw materials and other goods necessary for the starting up of its manufacture and its production. Later, when the country has put its own house in order, England and ourselves can consider the question of stabilizing its exchange. The attempt to support exchange as a first step is utterly hopeless and would prove infinitely more expensive.

There is now in session in London a meeting of the Commonwealths of the British Empire. Mr. Churchill's policy of empire preference has been made very clear. The American people certainly never intended to approve the abolition of their tariffs, and will not do so, and they can hardly object to preferential tariffs among the British Commonwealth of Nations; but I think they could object and should object to any empire preferences which have the effect of imposing an export duty on raw materials. Exception to the Atlantic Charter or no exception, a peaceful world will depend on equal access to raw materials, and our Government should be making every effort to establish that principle. We should also be willing to sit down in a conference to determine what kind of modification of tariffs through reciprocity treaties should be negotiated in order to give the poorer nations a better market to which to export the specific goods on which their life depends.

Furthermore, there is evidence that cartels are already being planned by British trade interests, and even by New Deal Americans to control world trade in various raw materials. Clearly this is not in accord with Mr. Hull's principles. The Federation of British Industries has proposed a whole series of quotas, preferential tariffs, import and export controls. Surely there should be in progress today an international trade conference designed, not to increase our trade or British trade, but to remove economic discrimination which might tend to prevent the success of any organization for peace. We can perhaps be prosperous without any increase in our foreign trade, but many other nations cannot be. What has our Government done about this problem, except to propose plans for scattering American dollars around the world? Clearly our Government should be making plans of its own to solve the riddles of international trade, and discuss the details with others.

The real difficulty in Washington is the philosophy of spending which dominates our Government. The only policy we can see clearly is one of loaning money directly and indirectly and indiscriminately to every foreign nation that desires it in a fervor of international love, and with the fallacious idea that it will create a tremendous demand for our exportable goods. Of course this policy amounts to giving away the products of our farms and our labor, for the loans will never be repaid. It means inflation and more debt. It is a grand form of international W. P. A. hidden behind the jargon of reciprocal exchange and international cooperation. The sad thing about it is that charity is even more demoralizing to nations that receive it than it is to individuals who receive it. It discourages the nation from measures which are absolutely essential if ultimately it is to stand on its own feet. In the end instead of creating gratitude to the United States it brings abuse and hard feeling for Uncle Shylock.

There is another policy which threatens the success of any attempt to make peace by world organization. That is the policy of those who say that England and Russia and the United States must rule the world. It is suggested in Walter Lippmann's book, United States Foreign Policy, Shield of the Republic, in which he urges an alliance with England, Russia, and perhaps China. It crops out in the thinking of many editors and commentators and politicians. It is, in substance American imperialism.

Many are advocating that England, Russia, and the United States occupy Germany for a long period, perhaps in three separate zones of influence. The attitude of England today looks rather toward a policy of permanent spheres of influence than it does toward any bona fide league of sovereign and equal nations. Mr. Churchill has suggested that European problems be solved entirely by England and Russia and a 20-year alliance has been made looking in that direction.

My own view is that an alliance policy absolutely destroys the hope for a real or successful league of nations. The alliance, its advocates say, must be so strong that no one can challenge it successfully. It becomes, therefore, the old balance-of-power policy. But the very existence of an alliance inevitably breeds another alliance. It would cut us off from our Latin-American good neighbors. Certainly England and Russia and the United States will have the most powerful military forces in the world for many years to come. Their support of a league as individual members is essential to its success, but the moment they make an alliance they subordinate the league to their own interests and relegate it to a secondary position. They substitute an ideal of force for a rule of law. In effect, a world dominated by a three- or four-power alliance is not a free world. We cannot maintain our freedom permanently by destroying the freedom of others.

The policy is absolutely contrary to Secretary Hull's views. He made it clear in his speech of April 9 that no conclusions of the four nations should be accomplished without the participation of the other United Nations. While emphasizing the importance of the four-power agreement, he has repeatedly used language which excludes the idea of alliances. But there are many New Dealers in power in the Government today who have the same itch to regulate the affairs of the world and of other nations as they have to regulate the farms and the homes and the businesses of the American people. I do not charge these gentlemen with being Fascists, but their philosophy is totalitarian. The world is too dumb to understand, they say, and a small group of "brain trusters" must manage their affairs.

I do not believe the American people will ever stand for such a policy. They want this war won and they want the boys home again just as soon as they can get home. They don't want to run the world and the boys don't want to run the world. They see no reason for occupying Germany longer after every military weapon has been destroyed. If any policing job is to be done in the future it should be done by a volunteer force recruited for that purpose. Incidentally, I don't see any basis for universal military service. The very purpose of this war, and of the peace to be made hereafter, is to prevent a condition in which America shall become an armed camp and be diverted from the progress, the liberty, and the pursuit of happiness for which this war is being fought on six continents. I see no reason why all the men required to carry out our defense and our share in enforcing peace should not be recruited on a voluntary basis if adequate pay and advantages are given. I believe it is important that the President make it perfectly clear that when this war ends it really does end; and that we give up any idea of ruling the world or telling other countries how to manage their own affairs. We do not propose to make the United States part of any world state and have our laws made for us by others. Nor do we intend to make their laws for them. Our plan is founded on the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states. We believe that a successful peace can only be based on that foundation.

Many efforts have been made in the past to insure permanent peace in the world. There is no lack of desire or determination to bring that about. The day for propaganda and pious declarations in favor of international cooperation is over. What we need now is:

First, definite steps to persuade England and Russia to join in making a political settlement which will give freedom to those peoples who are capable of self-government and desire freedom.

Second, a definite plan for world trade which will eliminate economic injustice.

Third, a definite stand against those who are determined that the United States with or without its allies shall dominate the world under perpetual New Deal dictatorship with streamlined W. P. A. and deficit spending. I don't see any indication that the administration is disposed favorably to any of these three principles. I have the highest respect for Mr. Hull's sincerity and principles, but he does not have much to say about these basic policies. There isn't much hope for peace as long as the administration deliberately rejects them.

TAFT STATES THE ISSUE—DEMOCRATS MAY LEARN

If the administration is not careful, the Republicans will take the issue of international organization away from it. Already the G. O. P. politicians are leading the movement for world organization in line with their Mackinac declaration. The recent speeches of Governor Dewey and Governor Bricker are cases in point.

Another is Senator TAFT's address in Cleveland last Saturday. He put the emphasis on action rather than on words. As he said, there is substantial agreement on the need for an international organization of sovereign nations with power to prevent aggression and preserve peace, and the Senate, by overwhelming vote of both Republicans and Democrats for the Connally resolution, has approved the official declaration of Moscow to that effect.

But the rub is that the European powers, despite these pledges, seem to be moving in the opposite direction. They are not permitting the smaller nations to participate in decisions, but are rather setting up spheres of influence for themselves.

"The day for propaganda and pious declarations in favor of international cooperation is over," the Senator said. "What we need now is:

"First, definite steps to persuade England and Russia to join in making a political settlement which will give freedom to those people who are capable of self-government and desire freedom.

"Second, a definite plan for world trade which will eliminate economic injustice.

"Third, a determined stand against those who are determined that the United States, with or without its allies, shall dominate the world under perpetual New Deal dictatorship with streamlined W. P. A. and deficit spending."

TAFT credits Cordell Hull with sincerity, but complains that the Secretary "does not have much to say about these basic policies." We hope and believe Mr. Hull has much more influence than the Senator thinks.

But, certainly, it is high time the administration proves that the Hull policy is something it is fighting for.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer of May 8, 1944]

TAFT POINTS TO THE FACTS

In a thoughtful address which reveals characteristic American impatience with the official platitudes currently fobbed as foreign policy, Senator ROBERT A. TAFT recalls his fellow citizens to that factual view of world affairs which alone will secure the objectives of this war.

Telling the War Veterans' Republican Club of Ohio that "we can only assure permanent peace and liberty in this country by the formation of some kind of association of nations to maintain the peace of the world," the Ohio senior Senator pointed to the widening gulf between our professions and our conduct.

The conduct of the Big Three among the United Nations leads away from that world organization which they proclaimed as their chief war aim in the Joint Four Nations Declaration of Moscow. The Atlantic Charter seems to have been forgotten, the Senator reminded his listeners. In a passage which sums up the view that all those who do not live in a dream world must share, Senator TAFT said:

"The policies pursued by our Government up to this time have not encouraged hope that these conditions (of the Atlantic Charter) will be met. As far as we know, our Government has not raised its voice specifically in behalf of the freedom of Poland, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, or Lithuania. It seems doubtful whether this basic condition of a successful association of nations was mentioned at Moscow or Teheran. Although we have sent more than $4,000,000,000 worth of lend-lease supplies to Russia to help carry out the first objective, of winning the war, we have apparently exacted no promises of any kind that will help the second objective, of winning the peace, except the very general terms of the Moscow Four Power Agreement. Of course, this is not a time to determine exact boundaries, but up to this time we have not established the principle of the freedom and sovereignty of these States. England went to war to protect Poland against Germany. Certainly the war becomes a grim farce if we are unable to protect the essential integrity of Poland against Russia."

Thus the Senator makes clear the discouraging fact which has become increasingly evident to all in recent months that "the danger to the accomplishment of a league today does not come from so-called isolationists or any unwillingness on the part of our people to go ahead. It comes only from the demands of England or Russia, and the failures in our own current foreign policy."

At a time when the administration and the State Department—as far as actions go—seem to have forgotten completely what this Nation stands for in the world, and have joined with the other great powers in what appears to be a concerted effort to smother the small nations, it is refreshing to hear an American statesman say that "It is futile even to consider a league of sovereign nations if the world is to be full of small nations governed by foreigners and yearning constantly for the restoration of their liberties." The American sense of fair play and decency is not dead when such views can find expression from responsible sources at a time when our diplomacy seems bent only on aping the destructive realism of European power politics.

The United States is heading for disaster, internationally and at home, if it goes on with the notion that the Big Four can run the world, thus abrogating any effective world organization; if it thinks it can finance the world back to normal times by a grand form of international W. P. A. hidden behind the jargon of reciprocal exchange and international cooperation. We must cooperate with all nations, not attempt to dominate the world in our own way by manipulating the Big Four, mainly through financial subsidies.

"Our purpose in this war," as Senator TAFT sees it, "is to assure the freedom of the people of the United States and bring about a condition in which they may work out, without invasion or threats of invasion by foreign nations, the destiny of the American Republic here at home." This is a needed reminder. Sometimes it seems we were fighting the war to establish new spheres of influence for the Communist Russians and the British Empire. They have their rights to their objectives, but we should not lose sight of our own. And the way to secure our own is through world organization whch is based on equity for large and small in economic as well as political affairs.

This is the Ohio Senator's view and it is not new. He discussed these problems at great length in his scholarly address before the American Bar Association at Chicago on August 26, 1943. It is well, however, to have them restated as forcefully as was done in the Cleveland address, for it is all too easy to lose sight of the aims of this war.

Anti-Semitism Is an Un-American and Un-Christian Practice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Justice Frank Murphy at the national unity session of B'nai B'rith war service convention, Carnegie Hall, May 8, 1944:

For the better part of 2½ years this land of ours has been dedicated to the winning of a total and world-wide war. To this end we are pouring out ungrudgingly the vast riches of which we are possessed—the fruits of our soil, the products of our mills, and—greatest resource of them all—the lives of American men.

What is our purpose in so doing? Why this unparalleled expenditure of our national wealth?

We talk at length of war aims. But if we look to the root of this discussion, if we search for fundamentals, we come to one primary and elementary war aim which precedes all others and on which all other war aims depend. That war aim is the preservation of the United States of America and all that it signifies. More than all else, we want, and are determined, to protect and preserve this Nation as the founding fathers established it, as our forebears and we have molded it, and as the overwhelming majority of us so dearly cherish it. Only if we succeed in this can we hope for the fulfillment of our other objectives. If we fail in this, we fail in everything.

Military victory seems now a matter of time. We know that the Allied forces are relentlessly closing in on Berlin and Tokyo. But while our armies are saving this Nation on the battlefields of Europe and Asia, we here at home can, and may, destroy it without the firing of a shot. We can lose the war at home, and wreck the United States we have known, by failing to see and tenaciously cling to what is the glory of United States and the life of distinction our country represents.

What is it that we are fighting to save? What is it that the fathers established and that we and our forebears have so long cherished? It is not primarily our industrial system, or our great cities, or our system of communications, or any of our marvelous inventions. These are part of our country, but not the main part.

The essence of this Nation—the one thing that more than any other has made us great in the eyes of mankind—is the principle of individual liberty, the dignity and the equal status of man that underlies our entire political and social structure. Men unrelated in racial origin, drawn from every corner of the earth, and professing every known religious creed, combined their talents and their efforts to create a new world. They brought with them few material possessions, but they did "import" many cultural heritages which have greatly enriched our national life. They came to the new world to shake off rather than transplant the animosities of Europe. This was the goal of those diverse peoples who fled to these shores from the oppression, the bigotry, and the hatreds of the old world.

This deathless heritage was what the fathers sought to perpetuate when they declared in the Declaration of Independence that all men were created equal and were endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, among which were life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. This was what they strove to protect when they wrote into the Constitution the guaranties of freedom of speech and press and religion, and of equality before the law.

And this, fellow Americans, is what our enemies seek to induce us to destroy by our own hand. They strive to set us at each others throats. They work to incite us to bigotry and hatred toward our neighbors. They disseminate the gospel of intolerance. They yearn to divide us in order that we will nullify the victory of our armies by civil war at home.

It is the appalling truth that this war upon our unity is meeting with no little degree of success. The dark specter of bigotry and persecution sweeps like an ugly phantom across the horizon. On every side we see sinister forces at work in this country to array class against class, religion against religion, and race against race. Torrents of venom and hatred, insidious propaganda, and falsehoods are daily being unleashed. Racial and class hatreds, systematically fomented, have led to the destruction of property, the physical torture and even the murder of our fellow men. The object is to substitute the Hitler way of life for the American way. These outrages threaten not merely the lives and property of a few unfortunate individuals but also the constitutional principles upon which this Republic was founded and upon which the freedom of all Americans depend.

Religious and racial persecution has been a pernicious strain in man since the beginning of time and has recurred again and again in different forms. When Saul of Tarsus was persecuting the disciples of Christ and was journeying to Damascus to find them in order that he might bring them bound to Jersualem, he fell to the ground as he heard a voice saying to him: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" These words resound through the ages whenever a wave of persecution arises to engulf a portion of mankind.

The first three centuries of the Christian era were a period of harsh and cruel persecution of Christians. Many were driven to live in hiding in the catacombs. Untold numbers were put to death by unspeakable tortures; some were burned at the stake and others were thrown to the beasts in the Coliseum. In the late Middle Ages the Inquisition in Spain was another manifestation of this deplorable tendency in mankind. After the Reformation, in some countries, there were cruel persecutions of Catholics, and priests were put to death in a horrible manner for celebrating mass.

Unfortunately, some of the hates and animosities of the Old World crept into the new American Continent. In colonial days, in New England, Quakers were heartlessly tortured for their beliefs. The nineteenth century brought the ill-famed Know Nothing Party, which desired to deny political rights to all persons who were not native-born Protestants. Closer to our own time, when the Irish immigrants began to come to our shores in great numbers, they were subjected to oppression in various brutal forms.

It is an inspiring fact that these alien movements were not in the mainstream of the American tradition and proved unable to divert the American people from their devotion to the principles of freedom, equality and fair play. But today, with the world convulsed by war, bigotry, and intolerance are once again abroad in the land. There is no more disturbing manifestation of this trend than the sinister thing we know as anti-Semitism.

Organized anti-Semitism is a weapon of the Nazi revolution. It is the most cunning of all the cunning methods devised by the Nazis to destroy democracies from within. It threatens not only the Jews, but the basic principles of democracy and Christianity as well. We shall win the global war on the field of battle. But if at the same time we accept and become permeated with this portion of the Nazi ideology, we have shall sustained a major defeat. Hitler knows that and has already boasted that the seeds of nazi-ism and anti-Semitism which he has sown will survive military defeat.

We must realize that unless the seeds which Hitler has sown are destroyed now before racial brutality and persecution come into full bloom, the long struggle to create freedom and equality for all shall have been futile. We shall then have capitulated to those forces of evil which use race hatred to achieve their goals of undoing our country, destroying its sense of brotherhood and unity, and undermining its moral and spiritual strength.

That is why, as I see it, anti-Semitism is one of the most challenging and significant problems in America today. And since anti-Semitism is not only contrary to the teachings of democracy but contrary to the teachings of Christ, Christians particularly must unite their efforts to combat it. The organization for which I speak was created for that purpose. It was organized solely by Christians. It is maintained and its activities are conducted solely by Christians, who also finance it completely.

This organization will be militantly opposed to anti-Semitism because of the dangers that it presents to American ideals and to Christian principles. We shall do our work in the American way. We shall not try to deprive those who may differ with us of their right to free speech and press. But we shall energetically and relentlessly oppose by every means at our command their vicious and insidious propaganda. We shall strive through a campaign of enlightenment and education to expose the tragic error of their teachings. We shall carry on the campaign in the market place and in the forum in order that the freedom for which our fathers fought and for which our children are fighting shall not perish from the New World.

To stop the assault upon the Jews, which is really an assault on democracy and religion, is not easy. It cannot be stopped merely by the passage of a statute or ordinance or by the rendering of a judicial decision. The solution lies only in the self-cleansing of our own hearts and minds of racial hatred. That may not be easy, but it is vitally necessary if we are to remain a free, united people.

It would be wise for every American, before permitting himself a single anti-Semitic word, a single anti-Semitic deed, or even a single anti-Semitic thought, to examine his conscience to determine whether such acts or thoughts square with the ideals of individual liberty and the dignity and equal status of man. This must be done if we would preserve this country we love.

What is the nature of the anti-Semitic virus that seeks to poison and destroy the American ideal of equality and freedom? Primarily it consists of assertions and suggestions that Jews are responsible for things that we do not like and that they have traits and qualities that are alien to our way of life.

Unfortunately some innocent and well-meaning people have accepted this historically false and morally wicked propaganda which would make the Jews the universal scapegoat for all that is evil. They forget that the early Christians were regarded as a socially inferior group, as alien traders and agitators, as peddlers and vagrants, and were charged with polluting the blood streams of other people. Everything that is now said against the Jews was once directed against the early Christians, who for 3 centuries were subjected to some of the most inhuman persecutions in the world's history. It is a tragic thing that a religious majority like Christians, who were at one time a minority and the victims of what the Jews now endure, should become witting or unwitting carriers of vicious falsehoods which are not merely anti-Semitic but anti-Christian.

This is not to say that all Jews are without fault. As all intelligent persons well know, there are good Jews and bad Jews, just as there are good and bad Christians, good and bad Englishmen, and good and bad Irishmen. But many of us continue to talk Hitler-fashion about the Jews as if they were the root of much, if not all, of our ills. Our thoughts have become so affected by the poison of anti-Semitism that few of us are completely free of it. Occasionally someone will be heard to say that as soon as the war is over the Jews "will be put in their place." Others seriously propagate the utterly false and un-Christian theory of Aryan superiority and racial purity.

One cannot say or do these things without doing something base and cruel. One cannot say these things without diminishing the spiritual splendor in man. Yet they are being said every day. Unless we eradicate these attitudes and practices respecting racial minorities, there is grave danger that the American principles of freedom and equality will be hopelessly dashed upon the rocks of violent persecution and oppression. Once that happens, the cement of tolerance that has given America her national unity and her moral strength will be broken, and we will become a Nation hopelessly divided. Intolerance may first wreak its vengeance on the Jews, but remember this: It will not stop there. There is every reason to believe that the denial of elementary rights to the Jews would be followed by the denial of elementary rights to other minorities. And in America we are all in one way or another members of a minority group

Anti-Semitism is not only false in theory but futile in practice. It accomplishes no good, while wreaking incalculable wrong. Anti-Semitism, like all other racial hatreds, has never contributed in the slightest to the solution of any problem—economic, social or political. On the contrary, it hinders the solution of such problems by diverting our efforts from the finding of solutions to the making of a scapegoat. It not only falsifies the factual data concerning these problems by exaggeration and distortion, but it removes the preliminary conditions requisite to any practical settlement. For specific solutions of great human problems are conceivable only in an atmosphere of mutual understanding and collaboration. And racial hatred, far from providing such an atmosphere, utterly destroys the state of mind necessary to understanding and collaboration. Having done this, it proposes solutions that are completely futile—such as discriminatory laws and persecutory measures.

Racial hatred, in other words, cannot help us solve our problems. It can only add new and worse problems to the ones we already have.

But the falsity and the futility of anti-Semitism are far from being the only counts on which it must be condemned. Vastly more significant to every patriot in this land is the fact that anti-Semitism is anti-American. In spirit it is a revolution against that lofty ideal of liberty and equality that brought our forebears to find refuge on this continent. It is a reincarnation of the oppression and persecution of the Old World of their day. It is the modern counterpart of the early persecution of the Quakers, and of Know Nothingism. It is the living symbol of everything that the noble men who wrote our Bill of Rights so passionately desired to bar forever from our country. Anti-Semitism is the enemy and antithesis of the inspiring philosophy that has made the United States what it is.

And to all Americans who believe themselves Christians, I say that anti-Semitism is not only un-American, it is anti Christian.

It is impossible to understand how a man can hate or persecute the Jews and at the same time pretend to keep allegiance to the principles of Christianity. The very basis of the Christian faith is a belief in the essential equality and dignity of the individual man. According to the teachings of Christ, the first and greatest commandment is to love God above all things, and the second is like to the first: "Thou shalt love they neighbor as thyself." Real Christianity begets love in the heart of man. It was Christ who first taught men the real meaning of brotherhood, whose gospel was love for every man, woman, and child. And Christianity further teaches that all human beings are neighbors—whatever their race, color, or beliefs. To love one neighbor and not another, to hate and persecute our Jewish neighbors, is un-Christian.

A great Christian leader, Pope Pius XI, once said of anti-Semitism: "It is a movement in which we Christians can have no part whatsoever. Anti-Semitism is unacceptable. Spiritually we are Semites." The true Christian may hate falsehood and sin, but he cannot hate his brother man. He dare not hate or contribute to the persecution of those whose racial background or beliefs differ from his.

But in a larger sense, the true Christian will do more than merely tolerate such persons. In their hour of trial he will rush to their defense, bind up their wounds, and aid them in their search for security and peace. He will not remain aloof in the face of injustice that runs counter to the fundamental tenets of his faith. For in his conscience the true Christian knows that to be silent under such circumstances is to join hands with the forces of evil and forget that Christians themselves were the subjects of discrimination and persecution not so long ago.

This is no remote or academic problem that we face, my fellow Americans. This enemy is already within our gates. The tide is rising. The passions, the prejudices, and the fears spawned by anti-Semitism are mounting constantly. The time to quell them is now.

The battle must be fought and won through appeals to reason and morality in the public forums, the press, the schools, the churches, and the homes. But first, it must be won in the heart and mind of each of us—face to face with his conscience.

I cannot believe that it is our destiny to hate one another. I am convinced that in the heart of every normal human being there is a great yearning for the brotherhood of man. That goal is not impossible if we will but conscientiously strive to be that which is within the reach of all—good neighbors and friends with all our fellow men. Let us then look to the future, not as members of a nation confined in a spiritual and intellectual strait jacket of racism, but as a free people imbued with a respect for the dignity of each individual. Each one of us can be a better Jew, a better Protestant, a better Catholic, or a better citizen, whatever his faith may be. Then we shall be on the right road and the promise of a great free nation will not then have been shattered. America will be, instead, a stronger nation morally and spiritually, a nation wisely prepared to defend itself and able to play its manly part in world affairs with an intelligent and robust sense of justice.

Gripped in this great world struggle, let us ask ourselves, "Why pour out this blood if not to emerge a richer nation, enriched in our own way of life?" Why all this agony, if not to bring forth an America unravished by the hates and lusts of the Old World, an America that is a just power as well as a great one.

Let us hope that it will be so. Let us work together to see that it shall be. And when the task is done, let us walk humbly among men, proud less of our power than of our respect for the rights of all mankind.

Post-War Health—War Diseases Call for Plans Now for Preventive Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, good editorials from newspapermen will no doubt play a large part in our post-war planning. I am always thankful for suggestions we get from men who make a study of our civic needs. Most of our newspapermen have this thought foremost in mind when they sit down to write an editorial. Under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following article which appeared in the Austin Statesman and was written by a friend of mine and a very able newspaperman of the Associated Press staff, Mr. Homer G. Olsen:

POST-WAR HEALTH—WAR DISEASES CALL FOR PLANS NOW FOR PREVENTIVE PROGRAM

(By Homer G. Olsen)

Certainly not the least important of the post-war plans will be a world-wide health program, global conflict having scattered peoples everywhere and pointed up the increasingly difficult problems that lie ahead.

Thus declared Dr. George W. Cox, State health officer, in an address, highlights of which was published by the Journal of the American Medical Association.

Dr. Cox said:

"North American troops in the war theaters may return home contaminated with various tropical and other parasites and disease-producing organisms which are at present not found in sections of North America. Tropical countries will be opened to migration after the war by northern peoples who are not immune to the endemic diseases. We should begin to plan to meet the new public-health programs as they may affect North America, and, at the same time, our humanitarian interests dictate that we contribute to a world-wide health program."

"Since this Nation will probably be confronted with a serious post-war health problem, it appears most highly desirable that we now plan a definite health program along environmental lines so fundamentally sound and attractive that it will be acceptable to individuals, communities, States, and the Nation as a whole," Cox asserted.

Recommending preparation of plans which can be utilized the moment manpower is available to put them into effect, he suggested the program should cover at least in part the following projects:

1. Local health centers with laboratory and equipment to house local health personnel so as to enable sanitation forces to function at maximum efficiency.

2. Plans for water supplies and treatment where needed.

3. Sewerage systems and treatments where needed.

4. Municipal or cooperative abattoirs.

5. Municipal or cooperative oyster-shucking and shellfish-packing establishments.

6. Municipal or cooperative canning or food processing plants.

7. Recruitment and training of more sanitation personnel to carry forward sanitary work not only at home but in the republics to the south and other countries.

8. Planning of drainage systems where such drainage will minimize the mosquito-borne disease problem.

9. Planning of a mutual aid program in rodent control.

10. Planning of a cooperative program of garbage disposal.

11. The planning for the elimination of slum areas and making available adequate housing for the population.

12. The planning of a program which will provide adequate lighting, heating, and ventilation facilities in public buildings but more especially in schools.

13. An advisory program that would be helpful to industries in the elimination of industrial hazards.

14. Promulgation of plans which will insure the farm population safe living conditions patterned somewhat after the Farm Security Administration program which provided aid in the correction of farm water supplies, waste disposal systems, screening, and the like.

15. Setting up short training schools for food handlers, water and sewage plant operators as well as swimming pool operators, operators of food processing plants, such as pasteurization plants, and hygienists for industrial plants.

16. The initiation of immediate steps toward securing an appropriation to the public health service of necessary funds to inaugurate and carry out a direct emergency program of community sanitation, as has already been done in the case of malaria control.

Solution of Post-War Employment in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. O'BRIEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Hon. James L. Whitley, former Member of Congress, of Rochester, N. Y.:

SOLUTION OF POST-WAR EMPLOYMENT IN AMERICA

The solution of the problem will require most careful consideration by our ablest minds. We cannot accept the challenge lying down. World War No. 1 taught us a lesson: In time of war prepare for peace. The consensus of opinion by our military leaders is that the war in Europe will end in 1944 with victory for the Allies, and that the war with Japan will end in the same manner at a later date. After the end of the conflict in Europe, thousands of plants throughout the country will taper down in the production of war implements and the millions of men and women engaged in defense work with millions of ex-service men will await the green-light signal to start the greatest industrial era in the history of our country. As war production declines we should immediately start the production of tools and machinery necessary for civilian production. A Government agency should be set up without delay to make a complete inventory and description of all machinery under Government control. This would permit industry to secure machines for civilian production without delay and save millions of lost manpower hours even before semireadjustment.

REGULATIONS

Steps should be taken at this time to remove every possible obstacle regulating free enterprise, complicated, unnecessary, bureaucratic blanks should no longer be required for every move we make. Business should be given a free hand, subject only to regulations to insure against monopoly, fraud, and unfair practices. Business loosened from red tape will emerge with speed, and millions of idle dollars will find way into many free enterprises.

TAXATION

Taxes will be an important factor in any plan after we emerge from war to peace. With a high debt obligation which may exceed $300,000,000,000, we may expect to have the tax problem with us for some time to come. When the time arrives that taxes may be reduced such reduction should be for the encouragement of private enterprise and to stimulate consumption. There should be no double taxation. A stockholder in a corporation pays his proportion of the tax on the earnings of the company and an additional tax on the dividends received, while a bondholder in the same company is subject to a single tax on the amount received; to encourage investment this discrepancy should be corrected. Income-tax report blanks for the upward of 50,000,000 taxpayers should be simplified. The Government should have only two concerns, the amount of income and the amount of deduction. Two hundred million of manpower-hours would be saved by a simple tax return consisting of two pages; one for a list of all income, the other for exemptions and deductions allowed by law, the difference to determine the taxable income.

AGRICULTURE

The production of food is our most essential industry. At the termination of hostilities we will not only require food for our own consumption but upward of $1,300,000,000 will be required for the distribution of food and supplies for the millions of half-starved people throughout the world. Agriculture will have to expand to meet the demand. Plans by the Bureau of Reclamation are now underway to open up in the Middle West 20,000,000 acres of arid, sagebrush and cactus areas into irrigated farmland. To complete this vast work many thousands will be employed. The Government is owner of a large portion of the lands. I know of no better plan than to allot these farms to our returning veterans and to civilians with agricultural experience; the land to be sold on a time contract with a long-term, low-interest finance arrangement. The operation of farms should be left to the farmer and not the thousands of agents with their orders "No, you can't do this," "No, you can't do that," or "You must do so-and-so."

PUBLIC WORKS

The mere spending of money on public buildings may be laudable but the number of people employed on such projects will be negligible. Unless there is an acute necessity for this class of building the construction should be postponed. Plans and blueprints, however, should be ready in order that the work may be taken up at any tapering off of private industry. Owing to the lack of material and labor our highways have fallen into an alarming state, and the work of many thousands will be required in restoring them to safe condition. The program for the construction of a network of highways throughout all the States should be taken up at the earliest possible date. For several years the War Department and the highway engineering departments of the several States have mapped out a system of highways of 34,000 miles, connecting 550 cities, with a population of 10,000 or more. The National Interregional Highway Commission, in conjunction with the Public Roads Commissioner, has filed its final report with Congress on the vast project. The plan proposes the construction of roads to accommodate all classes of transportation, many similar in width and construction to the Harrisburg-Pittsburgh highway and the recently constructed highways in Westchester County and Long Island in New York State. The program calls for construction costing $750,000,000 annually. If started at once it will go a long way in solving the unemployment manpower and industrial capacity. It might be advisable to charge a toll on trucks, busses, and perhaps passenger cars on the arterial highways, which funds could be used for the upkeep and to amortize the cost of construction, also to prevent unfair competition with the railroads, so essential to our national security.

VETERANS' EMPLOYMENT

Federal, State, and local employment agencies should be set up at this time to aid our armed forces to find their places in civil life. The days of apple selling, shoestring, and pencil peddling by our returning veterans should be only recollections of past wars.

HOUSING

With 10,000,000 men in our armed forces, there is now a shortage of housing which will become more acute when they begin to return. It is estimated that more than 1,400,000 new houses will be necessary to meet the demand as soon as Government restrictions are lifted and building materials released. The $8,000,000,000 necessary for this vast program will provide work for upward of 4,000,000 artisans. Architects should start at this time the preparation of plans for single and multiple dwellings. Rent gouging should be continued to be curbed.

TRANSPORTATION

The railroads will constitute a big factor in the change from war to peace status. There is a probability that after the end of hostilities there will be a tapering off in both freight and passenger service. For upward of 2 years the equipment consisting of 45,000 locomotives and 1,700,000 freight cars has been taxed to the utmost capacity. This vast network of upward of 235,000 miles of roadbeds will require the service of many thousand workers in repairing them and the reconditioning of equipment. The expenditure to restore the roads to their prewar condition and to supply the much-needed new equipment will necessitate the spending of a vast sum of money and assure the employment of many thousands skilled workers. The railroads are in competent hands who know the importance of their tasks and it is safe to assume there will be no delay in converting this essential industry to meet the new demands in peace as it has in war.

In dealing with transportation we should not overlook the motor vehicle. In 1941 the registration of such vehicles, including trucks, busses, and passenger cars numbered 35,000,000. With the limited number of replacements it is safe to say that within 2 years after hostilities there will be a demand for 17,000,000 new cars, a number which will tax the capacity of the automobile and tire industries, working two or three shifts per day.

LABOR AND INDUSTRY

The dominant factor in post-war employment will depend on the attitude of labor and industry. For 18 months after the attack on Pearl Harbor, labor and capital worked together without serious disagreement. Patriotism and fear of public opinion combined to speed war production in every branch of our war industries at a rate and speed beyond our most optimistic expectations. After final victory, patriotism to some extent will be lacking. Plans should be advanced at this time for cooperation between labor and management. Except in time of war, no constitutional law can be enacted to make an employee work against his will or to compel an employer to continue business against his desire. Strikes and lock-outs are expensive not only to labor and industry but also the general public, who, in the last analysis, pays the bill. In times of disagreements there should be no cessation in work.

Disagreements in any controversy involving labor and industry: Provisions should be made for a 30-day cooling-off period, during which time both sides should hold conferences with a view to the meeting of minds; if no agreement is reached during that period, at the request of either side to the controversy, the United States or the State Department of Labor shall designate some disinterested persons to mediate with the representatives of both sides. At the time of final settlement of any such dispute, the terms should be reduced to writing and should run for a specific time, thus insuring labor of its reward and enable capital to make contracts with confidence. The principle of collective bargaining should continue in force.

BUSINESS

The Government owns or has control of several thousand war-production plants extending throughout the States. What to do with these vast holdings in which billions of dollars have been expended will be a problem which should have careful consideration at this time. It is generally agreed that the Government should not compete with private enterprises. The laws which free the Government from the payment of real-estate and income taxes in itself would be an advantage with which no private business could compete.

When the war is won the Government will have on hand many millions of dollars' worth of clothing, blankets, shoes, and other articles of wearing apparel. These should not be thrown on the market to speculators to compete with private business. Millions of people in the enslaved nations, who for 5 years have been under the heel of tyrants should be the source to which much of the undisposed civilian supplies should be distributed.

Uniform policies should be devised by the Government for the prompt settlement of all just claims arising from the cancelations of war contracts. Prompt payment is necessary to permit the investment in private business. Referring such claims to the Court of Claims or other agency would end in long delays which would result in retarding of business to the disadvantage of all. A problem affecting business will be the fair allocation of machinery and material to every industry, large and small; the small business should not be discriminated against, and no industry should be permitted to get a jump on his competitor by reason of such discrimination.

There should be created at this time an organization appointed by the President or Congress, consisting of the ablest minds in labor, industry, finance, agriculture, education, and the white-collar worker. It should be the duty of such organizations to study every phase of the problem and with the cooperation of Congress secure the enactment of necessary legislation to be ready to carry on when the starting gong rings.

In conclusion, America should get busy, as it has so often proven it knows how, and do it now.

The Case of P. X. Component Cases

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. FREDERICK PRACHT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. C. FREDERICK PRACHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am writing regarding P. X. component cases, the distribution of which has been declared so adequate that the senders of packages to our boys overseas have been asked to discontinue sending these packages.

This curtailment is a disservice to our boys, because in these packages people usually send the things the boys actually write home for and the receiving of these packages has done much to keep up the morale and spirit of these homesick boys.

It seems that each company receives a quota of P. X. component cases. Each case comes boxed and it must be accepted "as is." Take it or leave it.

The general complaint from the boys is the utter lack of good sense in making up these cases. To bear this out I shall elaborate somewhat about the various component cases. Take the toilet goods component case. The boys have received so much Barbasol that the name "Singing Sam" causes nervous breakdown. They cannot even unload it to the Arabs. The case here, an overabundance of shaving cream and a dearth of razor blades.

The tobacco component case is designated "assorted." The assortment is mostly Chelseas and Twenty Grands. The popular brands such as Chesterfields, Luckies, Camels, Philip Morris, brands that the boys desire most, are few and far between.

The case of an oversupply of undesirable brands and a lack of desirable cigarettes. And still every Friday and Saturday night a popular cigarette manufacturer gives a quarter of a million cigarettes free for each number sung by a certain singer on these programs.

Pipe tobacco, cigarette tobacco for rolling, and chewing tobacco, the boys report as O. K., but the present generation know very little about the fine art of roll your own, and the art of fancy chawing is practically unknown to them.

The candy component consists mostly of Life Savers and chewing gum. When they get chocolate, it is usually the Cadbury's ration brand. The English give this brand to their soldiers with cigarettes, free. Our PX sells this identical stuff to our boys.

To get a few cigarettes, our boys have to spend their hard-earned cash, for the worthless excess of some manufacturer, who cannot dispose of his wares in the U. S. A.

Mark you, all these things mentioned are paid for by our boys. Not free.

It is a pitiful condition that our boys are played for chumps and fools and forced to like it.

I think this matter should be brought to the attention of your colleagues, and I know that the boys shall appreciate the correction of this condition. Thanking you for any interest shown in their behalf, I am

Respectfully yours,

BRICE MOORE.

Pea Coal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. FREDERICK PRACHT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. C. FREDERICK PRACHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., February 10, 1944.

DEAR SIR: There are too many strikes. I have worked 63 years and have seen many strikes. Most of them could have been settled better if there had been a little justice on the one hand and a little more brains and calm judgment on the other.

In my opinion an honest and free press could give a great deal of help by giving all the facts. A half truth is no better than a lie and one quarter is worse. So here are a few facts. If you are in doubt, I will submit the bills for your inspection. In 1898 we paid $3.50 per ton of 2,240 pounds and the coal was twice as large as it is today. I am referring to pea coal.

I hold no brief for John L. Lewis, but as Josh Billings used to say "facts is stubborn things." There has been a reduction of 10 percent in weight and an increase of 233 percent in price.

1898, $3.50 a ton of 2,240 pounds.
September 1940, $7.95 a ton of 2,000 pounds.
December 1940, $8.25 a ton of 2,000 pounds.
1941, $8.75 a ton of 2,000 pounds.
1941, $9 a ton of 2,000 pounds.
1942, $9 a ton of 2,000 pounds.
1942, $9.50 a ton of 2,000 pounds.
1942, $9.80 a ton of 2,000 pounds.
January, 1943, $10.50 a ton of 2,000 pounds.
1943, $11.20 a ton of 2,000 pounds.
February 1944, $11.69 a ton of 2,000 pounds.

There has been an increase of $8.19 per ton. Please let us know how much was the miners' share and who received the rest of the dough. Please print this so we can learn if the miners were justified in asking for a few crumbs from the rich man's table.

Reserved International Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Reserved International Rights," by Philip Marshall Brown, reprinted from the American Journal of International Law, volume 38, No. 2, April 1944

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

RESERVED INTERNATIONAL RIGHTS

The basic rights of the independence and sovereignty of nations naturally imply corresponding obligations. These obligations are due not only from one nation to another but from all to each. Such rights do not depend solely on the power of any nation to protect itself. There exists a collective community interest that forbids either national self-help or intervention by one nation in the affairs of another.

This collective interest implies a supreme law which, in spite of the lack of effective sanctions, has its own justification and validity. It amounts virtually to a reserved right which no nation may exercise by itself alone.

No nation is free to do as it pleases either within or without its own borders. Violation of the rights of individuals or of states may vitally affect the interests of all nations. A kind of constitutional international law is gradually emerging that defines the rights and obligations of each and every nation. If a nation demands respect for its basic rights, it is obligated to respect certain reserved rights vested in the international community.

The main principle involved in the protection of the collective interests of nations may be formulated somewhat as follows: The international community reserves to itself the protection of rights essential to the safety and the welfare of all. The independence and sovereignty of nations is limited by, and is subordinate to, the general interest of the international community. This general international reserved right includes the following:

I. International security: The present war has become a war in defense of collective security. When it is successfully ended permanent guaranties must be established by the victorious nations, with the adherence of any other nations prepared to assume their international obligations. How this shall be achieved remains an unsolved problem calling for the highest kind of statesmanship.

II. The collective welfare of nations: This includes such matters as public health, essential raw materials, the migration of individuals, namely the unemployed, stateless persons, and criminals, standards of labor, and relief work. These and other cognate matters are gradually receiving recognition as of collective interest and concern. The Atlantic Charter is evidence of this fact.

III. Freedom of the seas: The slave trade and piracy have already been recognized as subject to international action. The use of strategic bases, straits, canals, and other inland waterways will become of increasing importance to the whole international community.

IV. Freedom of the air: There is general recognition of the fact that international aviation, when peace is established, must not be left to the arbitrary control of separate nations. It has become in a spectacular way a collective interest which concerns international security as well as the peaceful intercourse of peoples.

This general principle of reserved international rights finds especial significance when applied to the so-called right of self-determination of peoples. The slogan, which finds too easy acceptance, that no people are fit to govern another people, when critically analyzed, is seen to be superficial, false, and even dangerous in its implications. It has been unjustly used to disparage the achievements of such colonial nations as Great Britain, the Netherlands, and France, not forgetting that the United States also has its colonial responsibilities. The term "imperialism" has come to have a loose and unfair connotation of ruthless exploitation and tyranny that is unwarranted by the facts. Whatever the abuses of imperialism may have been in remote times, it may fairly be claimed that colonial administrations, with rare exceptions, have rendered immeasurable service to the subject peoples and to civilization in general. The proud assertion that the British Empire has been the greatest school for self-government ever created is well founded. Witness the experiences of the American Colonies, and the British dominions, not excluding India, whose vaunted national self-consciousness has emerged under British tutelage.

The sweeping assumption that all peoples are fit to govern themselves and to control their territories and resources in an exclusive manner is based on an inadequate understanding of the great problem of colonial administration. To imply that the more advanced and privileged peoples have no obligations toward the backward peoples of Africa, the Pacific Islands, Malaya, and India is as unrealistic as it is cynical.

The principle of a general reserved international right has special significance with respect to strategic territories and resources. The possession of such lands and raw materials is now being recognized as a collective trust, not only for the peoples immediately concerned but for the entire world community. The exploitation of dependencies, without due regard for the needs and interests of other nations, is rightly to be condemned. There exists the superior claim of international welfare and security. The doctrine of international trusteeship, whether of colonies, mandates, or of national domains, is gradually becoming recognized.

Any strategic base for trade, aviation, military, or naval use is to be held subject to the needs of the whole family of nations. No selfish, exclusive claims may be permitted to endanger the rightful interests of other nations. The Republic of Colombia never had the sole right to control the natural international highway across the Isthmus of Panama. Nor had the United States the right to claim that the Panama Canal should be for its own exclusive use. The Hay-Paundefort Treaty of 1901 was an eloquent tribute to this reserved international right. So likewise the Suez Canal belongs neither to Egypt nor to Great Britain; it is an international highway.

Hawaii, Hong Kong, Singapore, Gibraltar, and other strategic bases, are all outposts for the service and the defense of all peoples. Australia and New Zealand have discovered in the course of the present war that their own security is directly involved in the fate of India. Such bases will have immense significance in plans for post-war organization and security.

The doctrine of reserved international rights need not imply the violation of any of the bascic rights of nations. On the contrary, as in the case of the American Constitution, it should prove to be the supreme guarantee of all liberties, whether national or individual. While various races are emerging from barbarism and feudalism, the community of nations must exercise a collective responsibility for the welfare and safety of all. In some instances this responsibility may have to be assumed by certain of the older nations, such as Great Britain, the Netherlands, France, Belgium, Portugal, and the United States, acting in behalf of the community of nations for the good of all.

The clear recognition of the principle of reserved international rights should help greatly to clarify the thinking of critics of colonial administration. Failure to do so can only lead to confused counsels and unwise decisions. It is a principle deserving much more serious consideration than it has heretofore received. The publicists would do well to lay less stress on the basic rights of nations and to emphasize the reserved international rights.

Flood Control on the Tennessee River

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago I listened with much interest to the very able address made by the gentleman from Arkansas, with reference to flood control on the Tennessee River and some comparison as to the result a similar program might accomplish on the Arkansas, Missouri, and other rivers of this country. The Tennessee River is the most nearly completely controlled river in all the world and the work that has been accomplished there in the way of flood control is a very fine example of what can be done when a river is controlled by a unified program.

Recently some very good editorials and newspaper articles have appeared with reference to flood control, pointing particularly to the great difficulty that has been experienced recently along the Missouri, the Arkansas, and other rivers in the Midwest. At this point I include some of these editorials for the information of the membership:

[From the Alabama Journal]

Every time the Missouri River has another flood Missouri points to the Tennessee River and wonder why Missouri cannot be protected in similar manner. Under the unified development of the Tennessee River the waters are under such complete control by expert handling of the lakes and dams that the old-time floods are no longer possible.

[From the Washington Post of May 10, 1944]

PILOT OPERATION

In establishing the Tennessee Valley Authority, Congress directed that the resources of that valley were to be developed not separately, as in the past, but in a unified way. This is the distinguishing feature of T. V. A., the feature which has made it unique as an experiment in regional planning and development. T. V. A. Chairman David Lilienthal expressed his understanding of the congressional directive in a speech delivered the other day to the American Society of Planning officials:

"The river was to be seen as a comprehensive whole, not as a series of unrelated sites for dams. And each dam was to be seen as a whole, as a unity, and made to yield all of its potential value—not to yield only a navigation channel behind its concrete barrier or to yield flood control alone, as a separate asset, or power or recreation. We were so to design the dams that all those assets—navigation, flood control, and power—were to be made available to the people from each dam. And all the series of structures were to be dealt with as interdependent, interrelated—in short, a unity. * * * The river, under the T. V. A. plan of comprehensive development, was not to be seen separately from the land, as in the past. In nature the land and the streams are a unity. The way land is farmed determines the flow of waters both on the land and in the rivers. The same unity that exists in nature was to be observed as basic in the T. V. A. plan of development."

A demand for this sort of development has arisen in the valley of the Missouri River, too often in the past devastated by floods and contributing to the periodic rampages of the Mississippi. It is unlikely to be achieved through the flood-control bill recently introduced by Senator BENNETT CLARK. This, like tremendous past investments in flood control, such as the Fort Peck Dam completed under P. W. A. auspices in 1940, would ignore the unity between land and stream, would fail to integrate the region's resources and potentialities. Farmers along the Missouri River now complain indignantly that the Army engineers in charge of the Fort Peck project, the largest earth-fill dam in the world, so concentrated upon flood control and navigation that they ignored the importance of the river for irrigation purposes. The farm lands of the area may be deprived of water forever because of unbalanced development.

It is high time that a long-term Federal plan for regional development, predicated upon national needs and the relative urgency of regional problems, be established. This is a fundamental sort of post-war planning. T. V. A. has furnished a pilot operation which should be a goad to the Government in remedying the problem which has arisen on the Missouri which, evidently, cannot be solved piecemeal.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of May 5, 1944]

HOW T. V. A. TAMES THE FLOODS

"The Tennessee Valley, too, had its almost annual inundations; now huge reservoirs on the main stream and its tributaries hold back or release water as precisely as a spigot; the winter torrent of 1942 is described to show how the first complete river-control system works." (From T. V. A.—Democracy on the March, by David E. Lilienthal, Chairman of the Board of T. V. A.; Harper & Bros., New York, publisher.)

Before the men of the Tennessee Valley built these dams, flooding was a yearly threat to every farm and industry, every town and village and railroad on the river's banks, a barrier to progress. Today, there is security from that annual danger in the Tennessee Valley.

With the erection of local protective works at a few points, this region will be completely safe, even against a flood bigger than anything in recorded history. A measure of protection resulting from the Tennessee's control extends even beyond this valley; for no longer will the Tennessee send her torrents at flood crest to add what might be fatal inches to top the levees and spread desolation on the lower Ohio and the Mississippi.

In others of the earth's thousand valleys, people live under the shadow of fear that each year their river will bring upon them damage to their property, suffering and death. Here the people are safe.

DESIGN FOR WATER CONTROL

In the winter of 1942, torrents came raging down this valley's two chief tributaries, in Tennessee and Virginia. Before the river was controlled, this would have meant a severe flood; the machinery of vital war industries down the river at Chattanooga would have stopped, under several feet of water, with more than a million dollars of direct damage resulting.

But in 1942 it was different. Orders went out from the T. V. A. office of central control to every tributary dam. The message came flashing to the operator in the control room at Hiwassee Dam, deep in the mountains of North Carolina: "Hold back all the water of the Hiwassee River. Keep it out of the Tennessee."

The operator pressed a button. Steel gates closed. The water of that tributary was held.

To the Cherokee Dam on the Holston went the message: "Keep back the flow of the Holston." To Chickamauga Dam, just above the industrial danger spot at Chattanooga: "Release water to make room for the waters from above."

Day by day till the crisis was over, the men at their control instruments at each dam in the system received their orders. The rate of water release from every tributary river was precisely controlled. The Tennessee was kept in hand. There was no destruction, no panic, no interruption of work. Most of the water, instead of wrecking the valley, actually produced a benefit in power, when later it was released through the turbines.

Back of the orders from the water dispatcher to the men who operate the dams is an elaborate system of reporting rainfall and gaging the flow of streams so the height of waters can be predicted for days in advance.

To the head of the T. V. A. forecasting division, from all over the watershed, from every tributary stream, from 300 stations, by teletype, telephone, and short-wave radio come reports of the river's stages, that is, its height.

Reports come in from hundreds of remote rain-gage stations, telephoned in by a farmer's wife, a crossroads merchant, a woodsman. From well-nigh inaccessible mountain streams ingenious T. V. A.-made devices send in their reports by short-wave radio without human intervention.

All the reports are combined and interpreted by engineers, so that they know almost exactly how much water will be swelling the river the next day and the next.

THE RIVER'S GREATEST YIELD

Yesterday's reports are checked with today's and revised tomorrow, and the best technical judgment is sent to the river control room; just how much water is being added to the river's flow in the French Broad, the Holston, the Clinch, the Hiwassee.

The operating orders go out, turning water off or on to meet the demands of the crisis along a watercourse from the headwaters of the Tennessee to the Gulf, almost as long as the Mississippi from its headwaters to New Orleans. The Tennessee River throughout its length is controlled, as water is retained at one dam, released at another. This valley has been made safe.

This is not true of other river valleys. No major river in the world is so fully controlled as the Tennessee, no other river works so hard for the people, for the force that used to spend itself so violently is today turning giant water wheels. The turbines and generators in the T. V. A. powerhouses have transformed it into electric energy. And this is the river's greatest yield.

The Rural Church and the Farm Family

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend remarks, I include an address by Mrs. Paul Palmer, of Ethlyn, Mo., national secretary of the Associated Women of the American Farm Bureau Federation, delivered at the rural-urban conference dinner at the Statler Hotel here in Washington last evening.

Mrs. Palmer is one of the outstanding women in farm-organization work in the Nation today, and, with her husband and children, operates one of the most successful farms in my section of Missouri. She comes in daily and intimate contact with most of the problems of rural life and is in position to speak with the authority of personal knowledge on the social, economic, and religious phases of American agriculture. Her address on the rural church is particularly pertinent at this time:

The rural church is as old as America itself. As soon as our pilgrim fathers had provided shelter for their families, they set themselves to the task of constructing a place to worship. They were building for themselves a new world. The kind of a world they wanted to live in was one in which the individual had the right of religious liberty and freedom of thought.

As civilization pushed westward, the pioneer fathers followed the example which had been set for them, and they, too, established their churches. The church was as vital to the souls of those men and women as the spring of living water about which their homes were grouped was to their physical being. These, our first rural churches, were crude in construction but rich in power and influence.

A good friend of mine once gave me this valuable bit of advice. Said she, "When addressing the public, choose a subject that you know something about." So this afternoon I want to tell you folks about a rural church which I know so well. It is the little church in my home community, where I have attended services all of my life. One of my earliest memories was that of my mother and her barefoot brood of children walking to church Sunday morning. We always stopped in the grove adjacent to the church and there put on our ill-fitting, squeaky shoes before going into the services.

We children were not impressed with the fact that it was a hardship to walk that mile and a half to church. Neither were we made conscious of our queer looking clothes. The lesson we did learn was that it was not only our duty but a privilege to attend church on the Sabbath—that all good people go to church Sunday. A lesson I have never forgotten.

Today my little granddaughter who goes with me each Sunday is the sixth generation of my family to worship in this same church. The building is still standing and still in use which my great grandfather and his neighbors built so long ago. These men went into the forest, cleared the trees for the site, and with their own hands shaped those timbers into a church building. Each gave of his time and his talents. They built well.

These families so few in number forgot denominational differences. All of them worshipped together in harmony and unity. The name they inscribed up in the gable of the building bears testimony of that truth. The name "Union Church," the date "1861." That inscription has been carefully preserved.

They did not neglect to provide for the spiritual needs of the black man who came to church with his master. On one side of the building there was a door opening into a stairway which led to what was then known as the gallery. Here the black man and his family sat and enjoyed the same services with his master's family who sat in the pews below. Theoretically he enjoyed the same status as the white member. In studying the early records of the church, we find that on a certain Sabbath morning, Mandy, the black woman belonging to Squire Allen, came forward and gave her heart to her Master and asked for church membership.

Instead of enduring the hardships of traveling long, cold, weary miles on foot or horseback, or in the big farm wagon to attend church, these pioneer fathers of ours could have remained quietly at home reading their Bible and truly worshiping God. They, too, in their youth had been taught the admonition of the Master when he said, "Neglect not the assembling of yourselves together for worship." Farm families, just now, perhaps, might feel perfectly justified in absenting themselves from church attendance when every precious gallon of gas must be conserved. Too, they can turn on their radios and in the comfort of their farm home, listen to the wonderful messages delivered by the most learned preachers and orators of our day. Should they remain at home they would not gain the strength which comes from having a part in the worship services. They would depart from their early training which taught them to thank God for a free church where they could worship in their own way, where they could listen to the honest thoughts of good men, even if those thoughts were not expressed so fluently. There is danger just now that the feeling of security which the American people have will lessen their spiritual endeavor.

This rural church which I have tried to picture for you is an unpretentious building. It has no spire reaching high into the heavens; neither does the sunlight filter through stained glass windows. It is just a low, white, frame building which has meant so much to the spiritual life of six generations who have lived under the shadow of its influence, a place dear to the hearts of the laymen and clergy of those generations; a spot to which they return to renew friendships or to partake of the old-fashioned basket dinners spread in the shade of the trees. They return to the old church when they are in the slough of despondency; when doubts creep into their thinking; and when their spiritual life is at a low ebb, in order that they might regain the religious steadfastness of their youth.

Probably one of the reasons for the long life of this church has been the fact that the younger generations have been given places of responsibility in the church and an opportunity to express their thoughts. New life must be injected into an organization if it is to survive and grow. I would appeal to you, the farm leaders of America, to maintain and strengthen your rural churches. If they have been abandoned, revive them. Now, as never before, our faith in Christian religion and the rural church should be strengthened. If we are to have a Christian democracy, we must have courageous Christian leadership. In the post-war era, religion must furnish the leadership for social improvement. There is no better place to train those leaders than back in our own rural communities.

In this period of transition the things we once did and the way we did them will pass away. We have every reason to believe that the church too will progress with the times. When it does let us hold fast to those basic fundamental principles of religion which characterized the faith of our fathers—the foundation of the rural church.

Our boys over across say, "We want to come back to find things as we left them." These boys are living in a world which has lost all sense of balance, yet they still cherish their ideals and beliefs. It gives them a feeling of stability to know that back home on the farm, just as always, mother, dad, and the children, hustle a bit faster with the chores Sunday morning so that they might be in their accustomed places in the little community church. I think that probably the things that they are fighting for have more meaning if they know that their places in the church will be waiting for them when they return.

Farm families of this great Nation of ours who can forget tenets, creeds, and isms, and sincerely worship together in spirit and in truth, will create an influence which will radiate to the four corners of the earth. That influence will be a potent factor in helping to make this world safe for differences. That is the kind of a world you and I want to live in.

Business Approach to Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from an address delivered at Yale University by Chester Bowles, Price Administrator, which were printed in the Washington Post of May 9, 1944. The excerpts from the address were printed as a public service by the International Latex Corporation, of my State.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUSINESS APPROACH TO GOVERNMENT

(Address by Chester Bowles, Price Administrator)

In spite of the many false starts and the many mistakes, in spite of waste and inefficiency, our Government has performed the essential tasks required of it in war and performed them brilliantly. What is more, it has carried out these tasks within the framework of the democratic process. Never before in our history has the democratic process worked with greater vigor and vitality than it does today.

We can be proud not only of what we have done but of how we have done it. We have given the world a demonstration both of our national strength and the vigor of our system of government. And yet there are few of us who do not look forward to the day when the war will be over and the role of government will shrink greatly from its present dimensions.

I fully share the view that the role of government must be greatly reduced after the war. I yield to no man in my attachment to the free-enterprise system. I am persuaded that no other system could serve us as well. But I am profoundly concerned, lest in our eagerness to shed ourselves of wartime government and give free rein to initiative and enterprise after the war, we conceive the role of government too narrowly. For if we are not prepared to accept enough government, we invariably end up with too much. It may be paradoxical, but it is true.

EITHER ENOUGH OR TOO MUCH

Our experience in the thirties yields a significant lesson. Because we did not promptly require Government to assume responsibility for stemming the growing depression in 1930, the complete collapse in 1932 left us with no alternative but for the Government to move in to put our economy back on the road to recovery. The lesson of that experience is plain and it is one that we must not forget as we look forward to the post-war period. By now we should know that it is a whole lot easier to keep a truck on the road than to haul it out of a ditch.

If we want to avoid too much government after the war, we must recognize in advance the proper functions of government and we must agree on the policies and on the appropriate organization to discharge those functions efficiently and democratically. If we don't act wisely it may spell our finish as a democratic nation. For if, after the war, we permit another great depression to overwhelm us, we shall be forced to resort to such a bagful of Government cures that we may entirely lose our character of a free economy and a free people.

I gravely doubt whether the seriousnes of the decisions that we must make is as widely understood as it must be. Although fear of post-war collapse is widespread, there is far too easy an assumption on the part of many that we have only to strip off the controls after the war and we'll go right back to peacetime operations without a hitch. There are two things wrong with that view: It won't be easy and we can't go back.

WE CAN'T GO BACK

It is no easy matter to pull seventy-five billions of Government spending out of our markets without precipitating a collapse of prices, incomes, and production. And having learned how amazingly productive our economy can be, having learned that it lies within our power to create a level of prosperity double anything we have known before, we won't be content to go back to the artificial scarcities, the unemployment, the poverty in the midst of plenty that we knew in the thirties.

There are many who will go along with the view that in the years immediately following the war only government can unwind the economy without a break-down and that government must accept this responsibility. What people are principally wondering about is what the role of government will be when reconversion is over.

To me the answer is plain. The function of government in a modern, highly industrialized economy such as ours must be at all times to sustain the level of the national income, to insure that markets are available for everything we can produce, and that jobs are thus provided for all who seek them.

This function does not entail any encroachment upon freedom of enterprise, any infringement of our personal liberties. For I do not conceive this function of government as one of regulation or compulsion. I conceive it as one of encouragement and support. I see the government of the future discharging this function not through regulation and directive but through broad fiscal and financial measures. When for any reason the flow of private investment and consumption expenditures diminishes, government can, by decreasing its taxes and increasing its expenditures, offset that decline. On the other hand, when the flow of private expenditures increases to a point which threatens inflation, through an increase of taxes and decrease of Government expenditures the economy can be kept on an even keel.

MARKETS FOR ALL

Our free-enterprise system has demonstrated itself to be the most dynamic and the most productive the world has ever known. But that demonstration has been only intermittent. In the past, for every year of boom our system has suffered a year of depression in which we lost much of the ground we had gained. As I conceive it, this central function of government will be to enable free enterprise to maintain, year in and year out, its amazing record of production, and to fulfill, year in and year out, its promise of increasing material and moral well-being.

No businessman will deny that the fear of unemployment has been a powerful deterrent to the full use of current income for the purchase of homes and cars and all the modern conveniences and luxuries that our system can produce in such abundance. No businessman will deny that the fear of periodic depression, of collapsing prices and markets, has been an even more powerful deterrent to expansion of investment. Given the assurance that markets and employment and incomes will be sustained, the damping down of consumption and investment will disappear. It may well turn out that there will be ample private demand for everything we can produce and Government will not be called upon for large operations to sustain the national income.

It is certain that the more effective the guaranties made by the Government and the more widely these guaranties are accepted, the less will be the positive action which the Government will be called upon to make, for the more effective the guaranty the greater will be the confidence in the economic outlook and the more certainly will potential demand for goods and services be translated into orders.

It has taken a Second World War to press home upon us what our responsibility in international affairs must be. I hope it will not take a second great depression to teach us what is the appropriate role of government in the economic sphere.

As a public service, we present excerpts from an address delivered at Yale University.

Slogan Gone Wrong

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. C. FREDERICK PRACHT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. C. FREDERICK PRACHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial on the subject Slogan Gone Wrong from the Philadelphia Inquirer of April 21, 1944:

SLOGAN GONE WRONG

The bill to exempt residents of other States from Philadelphia's wage tax has passed the National House.

Supporters of the bill in Washington may or may not believe the intended relief lies within the constitutional powers of Congress, but they are surely aware that there is no weight to the objection that the wage tax is "taxation without representation."

That slogan had its uses in the time and place of its origin, but if it were to be applied today as prohibiting the collection of taxes from people who had no voice in the levying there wouldn't be much left of our tax systems.

Residents of New Jersey who own property in Philadelphia never dream of claiming exemption from its real-estate tax. A Pennsylvanian never dreams of immunity from the gasoline taxes of the other States in which he drives because he can't vote there.

Since there probably isn't a tax in the country that is collected solely from those who can vote for the public officials who impose it and spend the proceeds, inability of nonresidents to vote for city councilmen is a rather pallid objection to the wage tax.

Let Us Have a Truly Representative Bipartisan Committee on Foreign Policy Which Gives Recognition to This House and to the Western Half of the United States

OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, this morning's papers report that the Gallup poll shows that 83 percent of the American public looks with favor upon the plan to appoint a bipartisan committee to advise with Secretary Hull on matters of foreign policy. I am glad, of course, that a small step has been taken in that direction by virtue of the fact that the other body has recently created such a committee.

I doubt very much, however, if the American public realizes that no member of that committee has been appointed to represent that great section of America west of the State of Iowa. I also doubt whether the public realizes that the House of Representatives is not included on that committee.

On the opening day of this session of Congress I introduced House Joint Resolution 28, to bring about the appointment of a bipartisan Foreign Policy Planning Committee, which would include representation from this body. I hope we can get action along that line, because it is important that Members of all parties get together with the executive departments and consult on the formation of a program on foreign policy. I also trust that there will be representation on that committee from the House of Representatives, because foreign policy is worthless unless it is geared close to domestic policy, and certainly the House of Representatives, on matters of domestic policy, is the paramount body of this Congress. Whether or not action is taken on my resolution, I hope its suggestions are further adopted to the end that a truly representative and honestly bipartisan committee may start functioning without delay to develop a constructive, understandable, and acceptable American foreign policy.

Mr. Speaker, it follows that since Asiatic problems will form such an important part of our post-war relations, that west coast representatives should be included on such a committee so that the opinion of the western section of this country may be given articulation here in Washington in the formation of our foreign policy. A copy of the Gallup poll is herewith attached as a part of these remarks:

BIPARTISAN GROUP IS FAVORED TO SHAPE UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY

(By George Gallup, director, American Institute of Public Opinion)

PRINCETON, N. J., May 9.—Senator TOM CONNALLY'S announcement of the formation of a Senate bipartisan committee to work with Secretary of State Cordell Hull in shaping this country's foreign policy meets with the approval of the overwhelming majority of voters, Republican and Democratic alike.

It is, of course, naive to assume that foreign policy will thus be entirely removed as an election campaign issue, but the present survey indicates that no matter what voters may think of our present foreign policy, a majority of them favor steps which will promote accord on foreign policy in this election year.

In measuring public opinion on the issue throughout the Nation, the institute had field reporters put the following question to a carefully selected cross section of the voting public:

"Secretary Cordell Hull recently suggested that a committee made up of Republicans as well as Democrats work with him in shaping our country's foreign policy. Do you think this is a good suggestion?"

The results:

	Percent
Yes	83
No opinion	11

Not only do Republican voters concur with Democratic voters on this question, they are actually in favor of the proposal by a larger majority than are Democratic voters, although the rank and file in both parties are overwhelmingly in favor of the move.

Vote by 1944 party preference

	Percent
Republican:
Yes	86
No	6
No opinion	8
Democratic:
Yes	81
No	7
No opinion	12

Resolution on Montgomery Ward Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the following resolution adopted by the Greater Detroit and Wayne County C. I. O. council at its reguar meeting on Tuesday, May 2, 1944:

Whereas the private war declared by Montgomery Ward & Co. against the United States is far more serious than an ordinary labor dispute; and

Whereas Sewell L. Avery, the company's head, has repeatedly and deliberately disobeyed the War Labor Board in his union-busting campaign against the United Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Employees Union and is spending huge sums of money to advertise his defiance; and

Whereas in 1942, Avery refused to sign an agreement with the union chosen by his employees, defied the War Labor Board and had to be twice ordered by the President to comply; and

Whereas this year he went on strike against the Government, causing a shut-down of his Chicago plants by refusal to continue dealing with the union, as ordered by the War Labor Board; and

Whereas when President Roosevelt had to again step in, the union immediately complied with his orders, but Montgomery Ward continued to thumb its nose at the Commander in Chief, forcing Government seizure of its plants; and

Whereas Avery's disruptions of wartime morale and orderly industrial relations cannot be tolerated by a nation at war, and public opinion is already aroused against this provocator who carried his fight against labor, against the administration, and against our democratic procedures to the point of open rebellion; and

Whereas Sewell Avery is the front for a section of rabidly antiunion employers who hope to follow his example—if he gets away with anything—and who look on his actions as the opening shot in the union-smashing open shop drive they hope to see launched; and

Whereas there are also reactionary, isolationist, and antiwar political forces that hope to fan Avery's rebellion into a more general revolt against the administration's war leadership and domestic policies: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Greater Detroit and Wayne County C. I. O. Council wholeheartedly applauds the firm action of the President of the United States and the National War Labor Board and condemns the action of Senator VANDENBERG and Congressman HOFFMAN and others who are upholding Mr. Avery; be it further

Resolved, That we instruct the Michigan Representatives and Senators to support President Roosevelt and the War Labor Board, and to vigorously oppose any attempt to weaken the authority of the President and the National War Labor Board; and be it finally

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to all Michigan Congressmen and Senators, to President Roosevelt, Attorney General Biddle, the National C. I. O., the press, and all locals affiliated with the Wayne County C. I. O. Council, with a request that they take a similar action.

Free Ports for Refugees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, for 11 years now Americans have been deploring the fate of Europe's refugees, first that of the refugees of Germany, and then those of Austria, of Czechoslovakia, of Poland, of France, of every great and small nation on the Continent which fell under the military or political sway of the Nazis.

While we deplored and lamented, millions of refugees were savagely murdered by Hitler's henchmen. Others escaped death only to wander as refugees across the face of a world which was sympathetic but coldly inhospitable. They have life but no place to live. They have not even been able to find a temporary haven of shelter until the storm of war blows over and they can return to their old homes or settle in a new and permanent home.

Americans have wanted to help them, but until recently we have not known how to help them, before the end of the war. On April 23 of this year, Samuel Grafton, the columnist, discussed an idea advanced by the War Refugee Board of aiding them which will not in any way hurt or inconvenience us and which will enable America to set an example for other countries of good will to follow. This idea—of free ports—for refugees deserves the most serious thought and investigation by those who want to offer some small comfort and hope to their stricken fellowmen.

Last week, for a change, we had some good news on the refugee front.

The War Refugee Board of the United States, of which Mr. John W. Pehle is director, disclosed that the idea of establishing what are called free ports for refugees is being seriously considered by the administration.

It is important that we understand just what a free port is. We have long had in this country free ports for goods. There has been one on Staten Island, in New York City, for a number of years. A free port is a bit of land, a reservation, with a fence around it, into which foreign commodities may be brought without payment of customs duties. There are warehouses in a free port, and even factories, so that the foreign goods brought into the free port can be stored and even worked upon. Now if at some later time the owner of the goods decides to reship his merchandise to some foreign country, he does so, and he will never have paid any tariff or customs duty to this country. So long as the goods stay in the free-port zone they are not considered to be in the country, and this is a very handy legal fiction, because in normal times it gives a shipper a place to put his merchandise down while he makes up his mind what he wants to do with it, and it gives our own citizens storage business and factory employment they might otherwise not have had.

Now, we do not have any free ports for refugees as yet. But the thought that we could have them is based on exactly the same legal fiction.

Those who are supporting the idea of free ports for refugees point out that we could take a few acres of land somewhere in the country, say an abandoned Army camp, put a fence around it, have it constantly guarded, and permit refugees, even refugees without visas or papers of any kind, to come to that haven for temporary refuge. By exactly the same legal fiction which we use to set up free ports for goods, these refugees would not be considered to be on American soil at all. They would acquire no legal rights of any kind. Their entrance into a free port zone would not be considered legal entry into America, and their stay in a free port would not be considered legal residence in America. In other words, we would be conferring no rights whatever on these refugees, except the right to sit down; but to a family which has been hounded by the Gestapo and pursued by the Nazi murderers, that is a very precious right indeed.

A number of newspapers around the country have taken up the free-port idea. It is hard to see how there can be any objection to it. Those among us who make a political living for themselves by being anti-refugee could have the satisfaction of knowing that the refugees were not legally in the country, while those among us (and I believe it is a larger group) who are stirred by ordinary human feeling could have the satisfaction of knowing that the refugees were being cared for, and so each group could be happy, according to its kind.

Of course, it shouldn't be against the law, exactly, to give someone in a free port a glass of water, and it is even possible that some milk could be furnished to a few children without destroying the majesty of our legal structure. The important thing is that we would have a place in which to put refugees down, and that we would give up our present monstrous notion that if refugees cannot satisfy all immigration requirements there is absolutely nothing to be done except to invite them to float in the air somewhere until the war ends. But refugees cannot float in the air, and the alternative, whether we admit it to ourselves or not, is death, not self-levitation.

The refugees would not go into the free ports to live there forever. These would simply be temporary storage depots, so to speak, where they could be kept until they could be sent home. And if we look around, we will find more precedents than one for this type of rescue effort. We have, at this very moment, 130,000 Nazi prisoners of war in this country, and these Germans, Fascists almost to a man, have been taken in without reference to whether they had quota numbers or not. We don't worry about what we are going to do with these Nazis afterward; we know what we are going to do with them; we are going to send them back. And it will be a very odd thing if we cannot give our friends, the refugees, something like the same limited right of haven and refuge that we give to our enemies, these prisoners of war. It is an odd situation, really, when our friends, the refugees, have to beg and plead to be treated only as well, no better, only as well as we treat prisoners of war. They don't ask for our best; they just beg us for a little of our worst, and how can be deny them that?

It seems to me that this proposed solution, of free ports for refugees, is in harmony with the traditional ingenuity and resourcefulness of Anglo-Saxon lawmaking; we are an ingenious people when it comes to making law; we are masters of constructive legal fictions, and there never was an opportunity for a more constructive one than in this field. Hitler has made millions of people stateless. Well, let us answer him, not by fine words, but by setting up free ports, a kind of temporary stateless state for stateless humanity. The great final point is that once we have established free ports for refugees, we can go to the other United Nations, and to the neutrals, and ask them to do so also; and they will have to follow this example; whereas, if we don't set up free ports and ask the other countries to do so, we shall be answered only with a low, leering laugh or perhaps a mocking whistle.

The free port idea is not beautiful. But it will save lives. That is its only merit, but that is a merit great enough to rouse us to action.

Legal Liquor or Poison?—Make a Choice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following splendid editorial from the Philadelphia Record:

LEGAL LIQUOR OR POISON?—MAKE A CHOICE

Prohibition days are returning to the United States—without benefit of an eighteenth amendment or Volstead Act.

The evidence is on every hand. Bootleggers operate on an increasingly large scale. The increase in gangsterism is shown in police records.

Moreover, as supplies of legitimate liquor continue to dwindle, the illicit trade will expand in proportion and the quality of the bootleg product will degenerate from cut liquor to plain poison.

LIQUOR A NECESSITY?

No one believes liquor is a wartime necessity any more than cosmetics are a necessity. But experience has shown that if we cannot have legitimate items in the so-called luxury class we will have the bootleg variety. It is easier to satisfy twenty or thirty million people than to reform them.

The question facing the War Production Board and the Senate committee now investigating the liquor industry is simply this:

Will it be better to permit distilleries to resume part-time production of liquor and keep the business legitimate—paying heavy taxes to the Government—or will it be better to take our chances with a wave of gangsterism in wartime?

GRAIN IS AVAILABLE

If it could be shown that grain cannot be spared for liquor manufacture and that the distilleries could not resume partial production without lowering their capacity for producing alcohol for munitions, that would be one thing.

But the facts are otherwise. The facts are:

1. The distilleries of this country have been making no liquor at all.

2. Those facilities are not being used 100 percent.

3. The amount of grain required to produce the 100,000,000 gallons a year which the distilleries propose, by taking a 30-day holiday" from war production, would be only 20,000,000 bushels.

4. Those 20,000,000 bushels comprise only four-tenths of 1 percent of the Nation's total grain output of 5,000,000,000 bushels.

5. Resumption of liquor making, by the proposed holiday, would not curtail Government requirements or supply of industrial alcohol.

W. P. B. APPROVED PLAN

So reasonable are these arguments that the War Production Board several months ago approved the "holiday" plan. But the proposal was killed by War Food Administrator Marvin Jones.

Excuse was that all grain is needed for food.

That four tenths of 1 percent of the supply would make any real difference is difficult to believe. Especially when that small amount of grain is weighed against the consequences of a revival of all the old evils of prohibition and some new ones besides.

Reserve liquor stocks now are so low they would last barely 2 years on a rationed basis. The proposed stretching of that reserve by 100,000,000 gallons annually would stave off the evils of racketeering and bootlegging for years.

BOOTLEGGER THREAT

Unless such steps are taken, the whole trade will soon become an underworld monopoly.

The problem is simply one of the Nation's best interests: Whether they will be served best by permitting a holiday on liquor manufacture that will keep the business legitimate, or whether they will be served best by turning the trade over to gangsters, who soon will have little but poison to peddle.

The answer seems obvious. We believe the Senate committee is rapidly coming to the same conclusion.

One experience with prohibition is enough.

Education and Training of Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, more and more people throughout the country are determined to resist any centralization of controls in Washington unless absolutely necessary for winning the war.

The set-up for providing education and training for veterans as proposed in title II of the G. I. bill of rights makes it possible for the Veterans' Administration to exercise a control over the education of the veterans which is certainly not necessary to the success of the program and which cannot give the veteran any better service, and might give him a lot worse service than if the actual conduct of the program is through the State and local agencies of education already established, experienced, and operating efficiently. The latter type of set-up is provided in the bill H. R. 3846, reported out after months of work by the Committee on Education which has been able to concentrate all its attention on this one particular feature of the several very important programs for the veteran in the whole G. I. bill.

I am including three typical telegrams of the many being received on this issue. The first is from the distinguished Governor of my State, who with his predecessor, Lt. Comdr. Harold E. Stassen, projected a sound and comprehensive program for Minnesota veterans long before the Federal Government bestirred itself. Therefore when he speaks for himself and those in Minnesota having to do with the veterans' program, it is on the basis of careful study and extensive experience with the practical problems involved.

ST. PAUL, MINN., May 9, 1944.

Hon. WALTER H. JUDD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Educational and veterans' officials favor assurance that veterans' education shall be conducted through regular established educational channels.

EDWARD J. THYE, Governor.

ST. PAUL, MINN., May 8, 1944.

Hon. WALTER H. JUDD,
Washington, D. C.:

The college of St. Thomas agrees with the American Council on Education and the Association of American colleges that the educational provisions of the Clarke and Rankin bills are a menace to State and local control of education and we urge that either the Barden bill be adopted or that the Rankin and Clarke bills be amended by striking out title 2, chapter 4, "Education for Veterans" and substituting the provisions of the Barden bill.

REV. VINCENT J. FLYNN,
President, College of St. Thomas.

ROCHESTER, MINN., May 8, 1944.

Hon. WALTER H. JUDD,
House of Representatives:

Feel strongly that education section of Rankin or omnibus bill represents a dangerous trend in Federal administration of education. Provisions of Barden bill. H. R. 3846, more desirable since it conforms with our traditions, Constitution, and does not ignore the fundamental doctrine of States' rights.

R. W. GODDARD, Dean.

Emergency Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. HILL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the House will soon consider the extension of the Price Stabilization Act. The Longmont Times-Call, of Longmont, Colo., on April 29, 1944, carried the following editorial. This editorial clearly indicates the thinking of the people at home on the changes necessary if a Price Control Act is to be continued:

SOME CHANGES NEEDED

Business isn't happy about the Emergency Price Control act which is again before both Houses of Congress.

Many agricultural leaders, businessmen and trade groups hold that the law should be reenacted but that some changes should be made.

The present Emergency Price Control Act, under which O. P. A. was set up and operates, expires June 30. It is assured that price control will be continued, but businessmen and industrialists, who have to live under the law and who know from experience how the law could be improved, are making a number of recommendations to their Congressmen and Senators.

There is a general feeling among businessmen and agricultural producers in Colorado that defects exist in the present law. A survey made by the Colorado State Chamber of Commerce of the consensus of opinion reveals a widespread conviction throughout the State that the Office of Price Administration has not been loath to ignore, in many instances, the plain intent of Congress in passing the original act in 1942. These leaders feel that the new legislation, now in process of being drafted, should recognize and whenever possible, correct the evils of price control that are burdening production and distribution.

The survey shows that practically all groups are agreed on certain over-all changes they want to see made in the new law. Some of the recommendations are:

1. Provisions for judicial review by Federal district courts or United States Circuit Courts of Appeals of price rules and regulations rather than solely by the O. P. A.'s Emergency Court of Appeal.

2. Clarification of the law so that it will make it definite that the primary function of O. P. A. is to control prices and not profits.

3. More granted authority to local price and ration boards to make adjustments in price regulations to relieve local or regional hardships.

4. Clarification of the highest price line retail clothing limitation to provide more adequate protection for consumers and retailers.

5. Discontinuance of the various classifications of stores on the basis of the volume of business they do.

6. The use of historical margins as a factor in determining ceiling prices, and stipulations that ceiling prices may be adjusted to reflect increased operating costs.

Many Colorado organizations, individual businessmen and agricultural leaders have communicated their recommendations to the State's congressional delegation in Washington.

The Colorado Retailers Association has sent a brief to the Senators and Congressmen outlining 22 proposed amendments to the present law. The Denver Real Estate Exchange has asked the lawmakers to consider 8 changes affecting rent control. The Colorado State Chamber of Commerce, the Denver Chamber of Commerce, the South Denver Civic Association, and the Colorado Trade Executives Institute, among others, either have sent recommendations or are in the process of preparing them.

Agricultural leaders throughout the State are making their position known to the Colorado congressional delegation. The national heads of the Grange, Farm Bureau Federation, and the Joint Livestock Committee already have appeared before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee and offered testimony. Colorado members of these organizations are following the lead and are communicating local recommendations to the Colorado Senators and Congressmen.

And while all of this indicates changes are needed, it should not be misconstrued to show that price control is not necessary. The opposite is true unless the Nation is to surrender to the forces of inflation.

Poland's Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. PFEIFER. Mr. Speaker, today, May 3, we commemorate Poland's Constitution Day. It is a memorable date. It is celebrated throughout the entire civilized world by all freedom-loving people, particularly those of Polish extraction. We, being a democratic, freedom-loving people, appreciate the value of those principles which were so outstanding in their constitution of self-government enacted on May 3, 1791, in spite of the feverish state the Nation was in, coupled with the political disturbances that existed throughout Europe at the time.

In celebrating this anniversary, let us not forget the parts played by Gen. Casimir Pulaski and Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko during the American Revolution when we were struggling to become an independent nation. Yes, they came to us as representatives of Poland with love of freedom in their hearts, to help us unite our Colonies so that we may enjoy this great gift which God has given to all mankind and which, today, a few individual maniacs wish to destroy.

We owe a great deal to Poland who today does not ask charity but seeks only justice. They are a proud, intelligent, and courageous people. Their splendid achievements, in spite of the many years of frightful suffering and unbelievable atrocities, Poland today stands out as an honored country who is deserving of all aid we can give.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is most fitting for us now, in this most tragic hour of Poland's history, to rightfully appraise her contribution to freedom and liberty, by assuring her of her integrity as a nation of self-government with full protection of her sovereign rights and her boundary.

Philosophy of the Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARTEL J. JONKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following editorial from the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Herald of May 9, 1944:

PHILOSOPHY OF THE GOVERNMENT

Whether the seizure by force of Montgomery Ward & Co. in Chicago by order of the President of the United States was merely an isolated instance in which the laws of the land were violated and our constitutional guaranties were ignored, whether it was merely an isolated instance of an overreaching by the President of the powers granted him in the war emergency is one thing to consider.

Whether the right of the President to seize public property under his own initiative; the right to use the armed forces of the United States for this purpose is the philosophy of the present administration is quite another.

The former concept may be passed over merely as a bonehead play. The latter concept constitutes the greatest possible danger to the rights and liberties of the American people, indicates the peril of a pure dictatorship, and is a long stride toward exactly what happened in Germany, Italy, and in other countries in which men have seized power and regimented the people and their activities.

That the latter concept seems the fact in the Montgomery Ward case is exemplified by the arguments of Attorney General Biddle in the hearings in the case in the Federal Court. For example, Mr. Biddle argued that "no business or property is immune to a Presidential order." That means the President may at his whim order the seizure of any business enterprise, even a popcorn stand, and that by the same token he may at his whim seize the home—that being "property"—of any individual.

Again quoting from Attorney General Biddle's arguments: "In time of war, particularly, the court should not substitute its judgment for that of the Executive."

That means, of course, that the right of appeal to and the protection of the court is denied every person in the land; that the order of the President is not subject to adjudication by the courts.

And again Mr. Biddle argued that the President had the right to seize the Montgomery Ward or any other property "because the War Labor Disputes Act does not specifically forbid him to do so."

This argument is in direct line with the opinion given many months ago by a department attorney that the rules and orders laid down by any department or bureau have the full effect of law unless the Congress by affirmative action repeal that rule or order.

Mr. Biddle went still farther in his argument. Said he: "The Government does not need and did not need a court order to take possession." Thus, if this argument is good, the powers of the President are greater than those of the courts and his desires are immune to the consideration of the courts. He would therefore be the only person in the entire United States who is enabled to act on his own judgment in the seizure of the property of any one of the 130,000,000 people in this country and likewise the only person whose acts would not be subject to court review.

That, of course, is pure dictatorship, nothing less.

Many times in the last nearly 12 years, President Roosevelt has been charged with dictatorial aims and ambitions. Of course he and his friends always have denied it. But in the Montgomery Ward case he acted upon the advice of the Attorney General.

The Attorney General in turn has set forth in his argument in the court what must be accepted as his and, therefore, the President's philosophy of government. That philosophy is the most dangerous that ever has confronted the American people. If permitted to survive, it can mean only the loss of every liberty and of every protection which the people hold most dear.

It can mean nothing other than a dictatorship no less oppressive and final than that of Hitler, Mussolini, or any other person heading a totalitarian government.

Approval of Treaties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER E. MERROW

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared in the New York Times, May 10, 1944, on approval of treaties:

APPROVAL OF TREATIES

The Democratic State Convention in North Carolina a few days ago adopted a platform, one plank of which called for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to provide for ratification of treaties by majority vote of both branches of Congress instead of by a two-thirds vote of the Senate alone.

The case in favor of this change is overwhelming. It is illogical that a majority of the House and Senate can declare war but that two-thirds of the Senate is required to effect peace. The two-thirds requirement puts it into the power of a Senate minority to block a treaty approved by a majority of the country. The present constitutional arrangement, moreover, shuts the House off from participating in a decision which in various ways it is later called upon to implement. A recent Gallup survey showed that 54 percent of the voters asked were definitely in favor of approval of treaties by a simple majority of both House and Senate, while only 25 percent favored continuance of the present system.

Yet so far no move has come from within the Senate itself to permit the American people to vote on whether they wish a constitutional change or not. One of the latest arguments put forward in favor of a do-nothing policy is that it takes too long to amend the Constitution. This argument is not an impressive one in view of the historic record. It took less than 10 months to repeal the eighteenth amendment after Congress submitted the repeal to conventions of the States, which meant, in effect, to a popular referendum. The armistice came in the First World War on November 11, 1918. It was not until 8 full months later that President Wilson was ready to submit a treaty to the Senate for approval. It was not until 8 months after that—and this long delay was at least in part brought about by the two-thirds requirement itself—that the Senate finally voted on, and rejected, the treaty and the League of Nations.

These precedents indicate that even if, on the most optimistic possible estimates, the German war were to end tomorrow, if there were only a single over-all peace treaty and if it could be negotiated within the same time period as in 1919, in spite of what will probably be much more chaotic conditions in Europe than then, it is far from too late to submit a constitutional amendment and have it adopted in good time to be effective for the approval of the first post-war treaties.

Educational Opportunities for Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following telegram dated May 9, 1944, sent me by Hon. Leverett Saltonstall, Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, concerning the amendment of title II of the Rankin omnibus bill to conform to H. R 3846, the Barden bill:

BOSTON, MASS., May 8, 1944.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
Washington, D. C.:

While I am entirely in sympathy with the purposes of the Rankin omnibus bill and am in full accord with its general provisions, I hope title 2 providing educational opportunities for veterans be amended so as to make it mandatory to clearly preserve to the States and educational institutions approved by the States, control of the actual education of our veterans along lines provided in H. R. 3846, the so-called Barden bill. I ask this because I believe the most fundamental basis of our American way of life is local control of our educational facilities and our State has always been a leader in the cause of freedom of education.

LEVERETT SALTONSTALL,
Governor of Massachusetts.

United States Seethes in Anger Over Ward Seizure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of Tuesday, May 9, 1944:

UNITED STATES SEETHES IN ANGER OVER WARD SEIZURE—AVERY EVICTION PHOTO USED ON G. O. P. POSTER

(By Arthur Sears Henning)

The spectacle of two soldiers carrying Sewell Avery out of Government seized and militarily occupied Montgomery Ward's, of which he is president, touched off a conflagration of public opinion fraught with political portents of the first magnitude.

The cities and towns and hamlets and farms are afire with protest against Government seizure of private property unconnected with war production, and with apprehension of the advent of dictatorship, if one may judge from the volume of mail swamping Members of Congress.

OPENED WAY FOR PROBE

Senators and Representatives say they do not recall a parallel of the state of public mind evoked by the seizure of the mail-order house.

It was this upsurge of popular indignation that swept aside the initial obstruction offered by administration leaders and cleared the way for an investigation of the episode by each House of Congress.

The incident has served to focus the spreading feeling in Congress, and the country at large, that President Roosevelt is steadily building a totalitarian dictatorship partaking of a combination of fascism and communism that, if he is successful in his undertaking, will doom domecracy in this Nation.

The Montgomery Ward affair suddenly has become the incarnation of a political issue of great moment in the approaching Presidential election. It gives form and substance to the Republican indictment of the Roosevelt administration for overriding the Constitution and seeking to establish the domination of the legislative and judicial branches of the Government by the Executive.

HELPS G. O. P. CAMPAIGN

Hence the Republicans have welcomed the incident as providential aid to their cause, and have adopted the picture of the two soldiers carrying Avery out of his place of business as a 1944 campaign poster.

Democratic leaders are a prey to misgivings that the affair bodes the fourth term no good. The seizure of Ward's had no more than been ordered than the Democratic high command recognized it as an egregious political blunder.

Feverish efforts were made to retrieve the mistake. War Mobilizer Byrnes got Avery on the phone, and implored him to comply with the Labor Board's order, promising an immediate election to determine whether the union had a majority of the employees.

BACKED BY DIRECTORS

Byrnes also brought pressure to bear on Ward's directors, including George Whitney, of J. P. Morgan & Co., to dissuade Avery from forcing a show-down with the administration. The move failed completely, the directors solidly supporting Avery.

The letters legislators are receiving from constituents emphasize fears of dictatorship, dwelling on Attorney General Biddle's assertion that the President, under his inherent powers as Commander in Chief, is at liberty to seize any man's business or other property or take any other step he deems necessary to effective prosecution of the war.

Most of the letters, according to Senators and Representatives, also cite the contrast of the President's seizure of Ward's with Mr. Roosevelt's attitude in the case of John L. Lewis' refusal to comply with a War Labor Board order.

Instead of cracking down on Lewis, Mr. Roosevelt testily demanded at a press conference whether he was supposed to write Lewis a pink note begging him to comply.

In the Republican indictment of the Roosevelt regime the seizure of Ward's is not an isolated instance of temporary resort to war emergency powers but merely the latest in a long list of acts in defiance of the Constitution that have marked the decade of the New Deal in peace as well as in war.

The outstanding example before the war of the new governmental structure the President is endeavoring to erect was his undertaking, in 1937, to pack the Supreme Court, thereby making it permanently subservient to the Executive. He was signally defeated in that effort, being deserted by the majority of his own party in Congress.

APPROACH TO DICTATORSHIP

No sooner was he curbed in that attempt, however, than Mr. Roosevelt put forward far-reaching measures proposing to enlarge the executive branch of the Government and transfer to it vast powers residing solely in the legislative branch.

The tremendous centralization of government, approaching dictatorship, involved in this project caused even some of the habitual New Deal apologists to condemn it as smacking of a combination of Mussolini's Fascist state, Hitler's Nazi regime, and Stalin's communism. Congress turned thumbs down on this scheme.

According to the Republicans, Mr. Roosevelt, if returned to power for a fourth time, will continue to flout the Constitution just as he did before the war and is still doing during the war.

They cite Mr. Roosevelt's letter to a Congress committee hoping it would "not permit doubts as to its constitutionality, however reasonable, to block the suggested legislation."

They cite the 4,000 Executive orders issued by the President and the myriad of regulations thereunder which have made laws exceeding the limits of the Constitution and congressional enactment.

It is such executive legislation in the Fascist mode that caused Senator MCCARRAN, Democrat, of Nevada, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, to say that "nothing could be more violative of the principle of government by consent of the governed than a system under which laws are made by appointive officials, interpreted by the same or other appointive officials and administered by the same or still other appointive officials.

Although Congress inserted in the 1941 War Powers Act a prohibition of the creation of new functions and agencies, Mr. Roosevelt set up more than a dozen new executive agencies by Executive order.

Congress wrote into the Price Stabilization Act a formula for fixing the prices of farm products. The President issued an Executive order under which a different formula was adopted.

REJECTED BY CONGRESS

Congress rejected the President's proposal to limit incomes to $25,000, advocated by the Communists and Mrs. Roosevelt, but under an Executive order the limitation was proclaimed. It took action by Congress to repeal the Executive order.

In the conduct of foreign relations the President has made a multitude of international agreements not only without the sanction of the Senate but without even submitting them to Congress. Under article VII of the lend-lease master agreement the President undertook to establish a vast international W. P. A. at American expense. It was repudiated by unanimous vote of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. Roosevelt also attempted to establish the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration by Executive agreement, but Senator VANDENBERG (Republican), of Michigan, intervened forcefully and compelled submission of the plan to Congress.

"Honored One Hundred" Fourth War Bond Sales Contest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday and today the Treasury Department is honoring with a special program and special honorary awards 100 leaders of War bond drives throughout the United States. These 100 honored guests are the winners from 16,500 theater managers throughout our Nation.

We on the domestic front sometimes forget that this war we are engaged in is a total war. Not only is this war being waged by our armed forces on the battle front, but it is also being waged on the home front by our army of producers and the many public-spirited citizens who are participating in our civilian war agencies. Among the most important of these people on the home front are those who lead in our bond-sales campaigns. I want to commend at this time the part our theaters have played in this important work. Through their screen and publicity outlets, these theaters have contributed immeasurably to the success of these bond drives.

Mr. Charles P. Skouras, of California, the president of Fox West Coast Theaters, was appointed chairman of the National Fourth War Loan drive. Under his able leadership the theaters of our country were mobilized for bond sales. Contests were arranged between the 16,500 theater managers. A goal was set of a bond sale for every theater seat in the combined theaters of America. This goal has been greatly exceeded, and today Mr. Morgenthau announced that through the combined efforts of these theater managers, over $360,000,000 in bond sales were made.

From these 16,500 theater managers the 100 leading salesmen were awarded trips to Washington, D. C., where they received various honorary awards and conferred with the Treasury Department as to means and methods, gained from their experience, which could be applied to the coming Fifth War Loan. Many of these theater managers learned valuable lessons in the selling of War bonds. These methods and lessons will be used during the coming campaign.

My own Nineteenth District of California produced the winner for the State of California. The winner's name is Mr. Allen Martin. Mr. Martin is now and has been an outstanding public citizen. He is one of the foremost leaders in my district. Mr. Martin promoted through his energetic work and unique efforts, sales to almost 6,000 citizens, totaling over $4,000,000. As this was the outstanding record in California, he was chosen to represent the State of California before the Treasury Department where he was presented with various honorary awards.

In achieving this distinction for himself, Mr. Martin has conferred an honor on his community, State, and Nation.

It is a pleasure for me to call to the attention of this honorable body the fine contribution Allen Martin has made to the war effort.

It is through such unselfish actions of our public-spirited and patriotic citizens, that the victory we see approaching, will be achieved.

The Montgomery Ward Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the speech of Hon. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, of Illinois, which was delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System on the evening of May 9, 1944:

I have been invited to offer some observations on the recent seizure of Montgomery Ward & Co. in Chicago.

The basic issues have been rather fully presented for more than 2 weeks by the press, the columnists, and the commentators. Perhaps a discussion of other aspects of the seizure might be timely, now that one has the advantage of a certain perspective which comes with the lapse of time.

The seizure was quickly consummated.

It was a short war on the home front.

Many of the facts will obviously be forgotten, and the fervor which gripped the country will gradually subside.

But the incident is truly historic and will live long in the minds of the citizenry.

It will be remembered as the seizure of a retail store by men in uniform, acting under orders from the Commander in Chief.

It will be remembered as a strange military exploit which was captained by a civilian general, namely, The Attorney General.

It will be remembered because of that amazing press photograph of two soldiers, acting under orders, carrying the executive head of the store from the establishment.

It will be remembered as a show of military force against a retail store because of a controversy between employer and employees over a clause in the union contract.

For the history books, it will become the Ward case.

It is important and significant, and it's importance will not be soon diminished because it touches a vital issue.

PART OF A PATTERN OF ACTION

The Ward case is important because it is the most dramatic of a long series of incidents, actions, and policies on the part of Government which have stirred vague fears in the people and which have been deemed an invasion of their civil rights.

When all is said and done, the Attorney General crossed freedom's frontier on the home front.

He did it in a manner and tone which cannot be concealed by legal argument or a discussion of the aggregate powers of the Commander in Chief.

When a soldier or policeman appears at the door, people quickly understand. They need no fine-spun legalisms.

This show of military force in the seizure of a retail store quickly crystallized a fear which many people have long entertained over the growth and exercise of Federal power.

That fear was founded long ago and has been growing.

It began nearly a decade ago when a humble pants presser in New Jersey was jailed for charging 35 cents to press a pair of pants in violation of a "blue eagle" code.

It was enhanced by the controversy between the blue eagle and "sick chicken" in the celebrated Schechter case, which went to the Supreme Court and ended in a victory for the sick chicken.

It was enhanced with the arrest of the owner of a small plant manufacturing automobile batteries in Pennsylvania because he sold batteries at a price other than the code price established by the National Industrial Recovery Act.

That fear gained force when Congress enacted and then repealed the celebrated Potato Act, under which the humble potato could not be sold by the grower unless he used the type and size of a container prescribed by Federal rules and regulations and to which a potato stamp had to be affixed.

That fear was nursed by the attempted purges of those public servants, who, because they dare assert the rights of the individual and the rights of States, were marked for political extinction.

That fear was enhanced by a proposal to place a penalty of 49 cents per bushel on every bushel of wheat which a farmer might sell if the gentle rain, a beneficent sun and fertile soil provided a yield over and above the quota established by Federal decree.

That vague, yet realistic fear assailed the people when a proposal was submitted to Congress to enlarge the Supreme Court, for the very obvious purpose of securing the kind of court decisions which a very determined administration desired.

That fear of Federal power and growth was further emphasized by a court decision which approved the contention that janitors and charwomen in a Philadelphia office building were under the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act, even though no goods were manufactured in that building which entered into interstate commerce.

These and many other policies served to demonstrate the growing power of the Federal Government and the Ward case is a conspicuous design in that pattern.

It served to emphasize in a dramatic way which the people could easily perceive, the growing conflict between the sovereign government and its agents on one side, and the individual citizen on the other.

Thus it developed a moral issue which will roll and tumble down the years ahead like ripples from a stone cast in the water.

The Ward case is truly important. It presented the issue as no amount of words or argument could do.

IT STIRRED THE SPIRIT OF THE PEOPLE

The Ward case is important because it stirred a resurgence of spirit on the part of the people that is at once heartening and assuring.

It brought a sudden recapture of that vital and living faith which is the very essence of this country, and which caused people to swamp Congress with protests.

There was a deluge of mail upon House and Senate alike, and it is interesting to determine who these people are.

They are humble folks. They till the soil and labor with their hands. They operate stores and shops and small enterprises. They are cab drivers and barbers. They are housewives and mail order patrons. Many of them were competitors of Ward's. Yet they spoke with vigor.

They are America. Here was a thing they could sense and feel. It was not like wading through an involved court decision or the abstruse language of a government directive.

Here was action speaking and they knew it. It was force. It was seizure by force. It was dramatic, and dramatically did they sense its implications and respond.

It was the kind of action that challenged submissiveness to Federal decrees where right and freedom and democratic processes were concerned.

How natural then, that this incident should evoke that same outpouring of spirit which energized the country 7 years ago when the bill to pack the Supreme Court engaged the attention of the Nation. The same people were speaking again.

This resurgence of spirit in every corner of the land bespeaks a new alertness to the encroachments of government. It needed only to be touched off.

It is a testimony to the eternal truth that the people have an instinctive sense of that which is reasonable and that when Government does the unwise and unwarranted thing, the people rise up to protest.

This resurgent spirit establishes a new pattern of hope for those who had fear in their hearts about the future of freedom and the representative process in America.

The Ward incident is important in days to come. The people so swiftly sensed that it could happen here.

A CONFESSION OF CIVIL IMPOTENCE

The Ward incident is important for still another reason. It stands like a tragic confession of the impotence of civil authorities.

Somehow, that impotence would denote a lack of faith in the reasonable and established processes of our country to serve the ends of justice.

As one reads the record of what happened, he is at once confronted with the fact that the agent of the Federal Government who appeared to take the store over was supported by a marshal and deputy marshals.

A demand was made to surrender the store. That demand was refused. There was some pleasant, although strained, conversation.

But no effort was made by civil and judicial process to carry out the mandate of Government. The marshal and his aides made no effort to discharge their responsibility.

Were they afraid of their own case?

Could they contend that enough deputies could not be deputized to do the job if they had a right to do so?

Had the case for military seizure already been worked out so that a show of civil force was only a bit of mockery which preceded the main event?

How can one do other than conclude that here was a rather sad confession of the abandonment of civil procedure before it had been tried.

In the light of the Ward incident, it is a bit hollow to speak of freedom and constitutional processes when the very legal process which has been developed by law and usage as a safeguard of the citizen is so patently ignored or abondoned.

It adds real significance to the Ward case.

STRANGE EXAMPLE FOR OUR ALLIES

Permit me to assign a fourth reason why the Ward case is important.

As we glibly roll the "four freedoms" over the tongue and speak of the bright new world of the future, where all shall be free to enjoy the pursuit of those very ideals which made America great, one wonders what the folks in China and Latin America and elsewhere will think about this incident.

Manifestly they will hear about it. They will wonder, discuss, and interpret it in their own way.

Will they not wonder why a Government which speaks so eloquently of the democratic ideal and its application to all the world, would suddenly falter in the application of that ideal to a sector of the home front?

They can say, and perhaps they will say, that while we so generously send troops and tanks, ships and lease-lend supplies, bombers and bayonets, food and fiber to every corner of the world to curb and punish aggression and to create the atmosphere in which freedom can live, that curiously enough we parted company with that ideal at home.

And they will be puzzled.

It will be difficult indeed to persuade a person in some far corner of the earth of our devotion to the cause for which we fight when we forsake that cause on our own doorstep.

It is a moral breach in the cause that must be quickly remedied because it also involves that delicate quality of morale.

In this field the Ward incident has great significance.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END OF ARROGANCE

Finally, the Ward case becomes important because it marks the beginning of the end of a strange kind of bureaucratic arrogance of which people have grown weary.

We've become a land of directives and orders, of rules and regulations.

In time of war much of this is necessary in marshaling our resources for victory.

But government by rule and regulation became an established pattern long before the war began. War only carried it to a greater degree.

The people have shown fine sportsmanship about it. They have accepted many things with a gentle patience that is truly astonishing.

But basic rights are here involved. People grow weary of the invasion of those rights and a new alertness begins.

It is not unlike that alertness which caused the barons and commons of England to summon King John to a meadow in the Thames River 729 years ago. To be exact, it will be 729 years on the 15th of next month.

There at Runnymede, they laid before the capricious King a parchment on which they had recited their grievances and their demands for relief.

King John was an apostle of force. He was adept in seizing lands and property and denying justice.

But justice would be done and in a single day, that parchment was discussed and signed. History knows it as the Magna Carta or Great Charter. It became the foundation for the freedoms which we enjoy today.

In similar fashion, the people are aroused to the implications of the Ward case and from this incident there flows assurance that in the days which lie ahead, the excesses of bureaucracy will be curbed.

It is but proof that any trend toward the arbitrary exercise of power by those to whom power has been entrusted by the people can be changed by the wills of men and the courage of the people.

The Ward incident will prove to be one of the most useful and fruitful forces in the last decade.

A Prayer for D-Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial from the May 9, 1944, issue of the Boston Daily Record, which contains a prayer composed by the Reverend Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, Mass.:

A PRAYER FOR D-DAY

Believing that it is impossible for our own country or our allies to win the war or write a just peace without God's help and guidance, we suggested last week that all churches open their doors for mass worship as soon as word comes that the invasion of the European Continent has begun.

The suggestion was widely and enthusiastically accepted by churches and clergymen of all creeds and denominations.

Thus when our fighting sons face the greatest peril of their lives, each will be supported and sustained by the prayers of millions of persons back home.

The Reverend Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, has composed this inspiring prayer, which we are sure thousands of readers will wish to clip and recite many times during the trying days ahead:

"Almighty God, who doest from Thy throne behold all the dwellers upon earth, look down with pity, we beseech Thee, upon us as upon children who know not what they do.

"Forgive us for our failure to live as one family. Help each to see his own mistakes as well as the mistakes of his enemy. Give to each the courage to forget himself in the interest of a greater good for all.

"Whatever is right in this bitter conflict, prosper it, and whatever is wrong in this Thy wayward family, purge it.

"Reveal to us in this hour of darkness the splendor of Thy Son, that, setting aside our disputes and prejudices our feet may be guided into the way of His peace, through Jesus Christ, the Prince of Peace, our Lord. Amen."

St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit herewith copy of resolution adopted at the last meeting of the Franklin County Republican Committee, urging early enactment of legislation authorizing the St. Lawrence seaway and power development as a post-war project:

The Franklin County Republican Committee resolves as follows:

"Whereas the welfare of the people of the State of New York is directly concerned in the successful completion of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project; and

"Whereas the development of the St. Lawrence River will remove the last major obstacles to deep-draft navigation throughout the Great Lakes system to the Atlantic Ocean and the ports of the world; and

"Whereas the same development will simultaneously make available 1,100,000 horsepower of low-cost hydroelectricity, under a self-liquidating State power project; and

"Whereas the Legislature of the State of New York on March 15-16, 1944, by unanimous vote adopted a resolution declaring that this State urgently requires the prompt development of the St. Lawrence to furnish low-cost power to millions of industrial, rural, commercial, and domestic consumers: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we appeal for the immediate enactment of such legislation as may be necessary authorizing the St. Lawrence seaway and power development as a post-war project; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to our United States Senators and our Representative in Congress and to the Republican State committee."

More Meat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following article by Uncle Dudley from a recent issue of the Boston Daily Globe concerning the recent removal of most meats from the rationing list:

MORE MEAT

A high test of any system is its flexibility. So the removal of most meats from rationing is not only good news to consumers, but also an indication that our wartime controls can work both ways even while the war itself approaches its climax. The action of the O. P. A. yesterday takes 85 percent of all meat out of the ration list. This accounts for 57 percent in volume of all foods needing red points.

This is the third time in the 13 months of meat rationing that restrictions have been relaxed to meet an increase in available supply. Ever since last summer, point requirements for most meats have tended steadily down. The number of points for butter was reduced by one-fourth last Sunday. Lard was taken off the ration list in March, cooking oils and shortening in April.

The reasons given for taking most meats off the ration list are that lend-lease buying has been halted, that Army and Navy demand is reduced that storage places are filled, and that it is hoped by thus freezing the market channels to bring more meat to market this summer.

These are very practical reasons. They suggest that the supply needs for the invasion have already been met. The let-up in lend-lease demands is certainly, in some part, due to the defeat of the submarine which had been a terrific consumer of American supplies for our allies. There is a limit also to the possibility of building up supplies for the future. Storage space becomes filled, even with our immense facilities. This points to a problem that will arise upon any sudden end of the war. To distribute our war-built surpluses, then, without serious disarrangement of markets will tax our system of controls with a severity that rationing itself has hardly laid upon them.

The sudden release of meats from rationing is a sufficient answer to our considerable crop of calamity howlers. A noted novelist, who is a gentleman farmer, too, made alarm headlines last fall with the prediction that we should be starving by February. Instead, nearly all meat is removed from all restrictions by May. This may well serve as a warning in a new form of the old stock-market adage not to sell America short.

For there is no question that America has learned to organize a war. It takes time for any system that is new just to learn its own task. And the converse of that is equally true. It takes time for a great free people to reconcile themselves to a necessary pattern of controls. Rationing has restricted the habits of every American. The system has not worked without its halts and bungles, and it has not been accepted without a wholly normal amount of grumbling and complaint that is an inevitable part of a free people's reaction to any interference with its habits of life. But Americans learn fast and accommodate themselves to necessary conditions.

Adjustment was not a simple problem. We individuals, watching our few points and family books, really had it easy. To the food industry, the job of collecting and accounting for points, and of planning so that our family tables were provided with at least something, has been a major headache. Meat rationing has worked only because our marketmen burned midnight oil to make it work. Their troubles are not now ended, though possibly they are lightened. But the occasion is a reminder of the service they have rendered, for which they merit more than a passing nod.

Americans have been, through their history, the most adaptable of all people. They want only to know that a thing is necessary and that in its operation it makes sense. By and large they have been convinced that price controls are necessary in war, and that rationing of shortage goods makes sense. They will expect controls to be removed whenever they are no longer needed. So they are bound to greet with satisfaction the evidence in yesterday's meat order that their fellow citizens who have been called into the public function of running these controls feel the same way about it.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Failure of Governor Tugwell—Puerto Rico Going on the Rocks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BOLÍVAR PAGÁN

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. PAGÁN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted by the House, I present an article I have written about conditions in Puerto Rico under Governor Tugwell, in answer to a mistaken and vicious article concerning the colonial policy of the United States with Puerto Rico published in the current issue of the magazine Fortune:

BALLYHOO OF HIRED PROFESSIONAL WRITERS

I have read with disgust the article on Puerto Rico published in the current edition of the magazine Fortune. I would not like to question the sincerity of its author, but said article is one of common features on Puerto Rico written by hit-and-run tourists or by people who do not know much of what they are speaking about, because to glance upon the complex Puerto Rican picture they have been taken over by the hand of interested private individuals or public officers. In fact, during the last 3 or 4 years the government of Puerto Rico has spent thousands and thousands of dollars in hiring professional writers to boost and ballyhoo the present undesirable administration of Governor Tugwell.

UNFAIR TO CONGRESS, TO THE FEDERAL ADMINISTRATION, AND THE PUERTO RICAN PEOPLE

The article is full of global errors and falsehoods. It hides or neglects important shades of our insular life and government. It is also very unfair to the Federal Administration, to Congress, and to the Puerto Rican people. The author of the article has taken as a granted truth certain mistaken data furnished to him, and he did not bother to hear unbiased persons who really know conditions in Puerto Rico, or at least he neither took pains to hear all sides of opinion.

The remarks made about the congressional committees that recently investigated conditions in Puerto Rico are very unfair. The Bell subcommittee of the House Insular Affairs Committee and the Chavez subcommittee of the Senate Territories and Insular Affairs Committee that went recently to Puerto Rico and investigated conditions there made pretty good surveys and reports. The Senators and Representatives of said subcommittees did not go to grind any ax. Their fellow-citizens of Puerto Rico cannot reelect or defeat any of them. They went to Puerto Rico with a sincere desire to find out the facts and to help my people. Their recommendations are enlightened and noble, and the Puerto Rican people at large are grateful to them.

About the policy of the Federal administration toward Puerto Rico, to which the article is so reticent, it is true that so far the United States has not been committed frankly about the final political status of the island. But the United States has granted American citizenship to all Puerto Ricans, and during the American regime Puerto Rico has taken great strides in public education, health, roads and highways, and labor and social conditions. Industry, agriculture, and commerce have gone to high brackets. Production and income have increased more than twentyfold. Puerto Rico has progressed enormously under the American flag. Now the present Federal administration has recommended a greater degree of self-government. The measure pending in Congress, if approved, will practically make of Puerto Rico a self-governing dominion similar to the British dominions. Then the island would be on the clear way to final independence or statehood. The overwhelming majority of the Puerto Ricans aim that some day Puerto Rico will enter in the family of States.

The only blot in the relations of the United States with Puerto Rico is the present Governor, Dr. Rex Guy Tugwell.

Governor Tugwell is imposed on Puerto Rico without the consent of the Puerto Rican people. Governor Tugwell is opposed by political groups that polled in last election more than two-thirds of the people's vote. Governor Tugwell is opposed by the insular house of representatives, which adopted a resolution requesting his removal. Governor Tugwell is opposed by leading insular organizations of industry, agriculture, trade, and labor.

The article distorts the facts about the present situation of Puerto Rico, and it tries to hit the administration and Congress below the belt. But the article flatters and praises Dr. Tugwell. The author of the article might know why.

POLITICAL SITUATION

Speaking about the political situation, the article echoes that a Popular Party, run and bossed by a local fellow traveler to whom Tugwell is a marionette, swept in last elections in Puerto Rico. The author of the article did not bother himself in finding out the truth. The Popular Party was simply a surprise party. It bribed voters with promises to give each voter a house or a farm with oxen, farming implements, seeds, milk cows, etc. It took advantage of incidental splits in all opposite groups. But the official statistics of last election show that the Popular Party polled only 30 percent of the registered voters. The coalition, split at the election and opposed by two defeatists groups that voted against the coalition candidates, nevertheless polled a majority over the Popular Party. Out of 571,000 votes polled at the general election, 355,000 voters did cast their votes against the Popular Party. Out of 76 counties or municipalities, the Popular Party lost 49. The Popular Party lost the house of representatives. The only candidate voted at large by all the voters of the island, the Resident Commissioner to the United States, was elected by the coalition. My physical presence in Congress is the best evidence that the coalition won the election, casting the majority of the votes.

THE GOVERNOR IS ALL-POWERFUL

The article further states that the Governor does not rule Puerto Rico. A high-school kid who had glanced upon the present Organic Act of Puerto Rico, knows that the Governor really reigns and rules and is all-powerful. In addition to the usual executive powers and prerogatives, the Governor of Puerto Rico has the appointive power over the insular judiciary, with the exception of the justices of the Supreme Court, who are appointed by the President, usually on recommendation by the Governor. All other insular judges, district judges, municipal judges all over the island, and even all justices of the peace and police judges are appointed by the Governor. The Governor appoints all members of his cabinet, with the exception of the attorney general and the commissioner of education, who are appointed by the President, usually on recommendation by the Governor. The Governor is the head of the insular police. The Governor appoints all police chiefs throughout the whole island, of all cities, towns, and rural districts. The Governor appoints the chairman of the insular election board, who supervises and controls the elections. The Governor himself has the casting vote in any tie in the insular board of elections. The Governor appoints the chairmen, who usually sway the casting vote, of all the local election boards.

The Governor has veto power over the acts of the insular legislature. This veto is practically absolute, because the legislature has no power to override his veto. The Governor is all-powerful on appropriations and disbursements of public funds. He can reduce or strike out any appropriation item approved by the legislature, notwithstanding that he approves the total bill. He has power to overrule at his pleasure the decisions of the insular comptroller general or auditor. All these tremendous powers are now entrusted to Rex Guy Tugwell.

THE LAND QUESTION

About the much praised land program, the author of the article is ignorant of the real facts. It is not true that the congressional limitation on landholdings was enforced by the Popular Party. It is a matter of contemporary history that it was the coalition that enforced said limitation on landholdings. A couple of years after the coalition assumed power, in 1935, for the first time legislative action was taken to enforce the 500-acre congressional limitation of such landholdings. The coalition approved laws to (1) providing civil proceedings to rush the enforcement of the 500-acre congressional limitation to landholdings, (2) to punish violations of said 500-acre limitation, (3) to appoint special prosecutors, (4) appropriating the necessary funds to carry on the judicial proceedings to break up the estates over 500 acres. All this was done by the coalition years before that man Tugwell came into the Puerto Rican picture.

The land law approved by the Popular Party is a different proposition. It has been instrumental in spending many millions in buying land, but the purchase dealings have been cloudy. Only some poor peasants have been able to get land, and only in petty parcels of one-fourth of an acre, most of the time barren and useless land. Not the farm, with seeds, farm implements, oxen, milk cows, etc., offered to the peasants as bribery for their votes. And the land law, in fact, violates the congressional limitation over 500-acre landholdings, because under the insular law the government gives tracts of more than 500 acres and even of thousands of acres to party stooges or privileged persons.

Tugwell is responsible for this insular land law. The law can expropriate high handedly any private property through an "authority" not elected nor responsible to the Puerto Rican people. Tugwell was not yet the Governor when the measure was approved, but he already was in Puerto Rico as a special investigator on the land question. It is of public knowledge in Puerto Rico that Tugwell drafted the measure, and he advised its approval.

TUGWELL'S HOLIDAY AND HORROR IN PUERTO RICAN PICTURE

Tugwell has enjoyed a spendthrift holiday with millions and millions of the people's money paid by Puerto Rican taxpayers, and also with millions and millions in unprecedented figures paid by continental American taxpayers, covered into the Puerto Rican treasury during the present boom years of rum taxes.

Governor Tugwell has squandered more than two hundred and fifty millions of public funds during his tenure of office in Puerto Rico. He has toyed with pet experiments and crackpot dreams. He has overburdened the insular government pay roll with 20,000 bureaucrats in useless new bureaus, boards, commissions, and authorities created by him. But there are now over 300,000 school children lacking public schools and teachers, more poor children out of school than when Tugwell came to Puerto Rico. There are about 1,000,000 Puerto Ricans suffering anemia, cancer, malaria, syphilis, and tuberculosis, more disease than when Tugwell came. There are now more slums than when Tugwell came over. When Tugwell took over there were only 66,000 unemployed; now there are more than 225,000 unemployed. Industry, agriculture, and trade have been destroyed or damaged. An exodus of capital and investments from Puerto Rico is taking place. Free enterprise is a devil to Tugwell and his government accomplices. The island is going on the rocks, and hunger and misery prevail now in Puerto Rico more than ever before.

War Profits and Legislative Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by me entitled "War Profits and Legislative Policy," from the University of Chicago Law Review for April 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR PROFITS AND LEGISLATIVE POLICY

(By DAVID I. WALSH, United States Senator from Massachusetts)

Just as inveighing against sin is spasmodically a popular pastime, so too is inveighing against war-profiteering. With the latter, considerable success has been experienced in the last 2 years, and it seems doubtful that, as a result of this success, post-war investigations will reveal anything like the scandals which shocked the public during the two decades following World War No. 1.

From its earliest days this country has been confronted with attempts on the part of merchants and vendors "to avail themselves of the difficulties of the times, and to amass fortunes on the public ruin."[1] A condition which our people have faced in every one of their wars—and which other people have faced in their own wars—is perhaps best described by the Father of his County in a letter dated March 31, 1779. It is worth quoting in extenso:

"Our conflict is not likely to cease so soon as every good man would wish. The measure of iniquity is not yet filled. * * *

"Speculation, peculation, production, engrossing, forestalling * * * affording too many melancholy proofs of the decay of public virtue * * * and too glaring instances of its being the interest and desire of too many who wish to be thought friends, to continue the war. * * *

"Cannot this common country America possess virtue enough to disappoint them? Is the paltry consideration of a little dirty pelf to individuals to be placed in competition with the essential rights and liberties of the present generation, and of millions yet unborn?

"Shall a few designing men for their own aggrandizement, and to gratify their own avarice, overset the goodly fabric we have been rearing at the expense of so much time, blood, and treasure? And shall we at last become the victims of our own abominable lust for gain?

"Forbid it, heaven! Forbid it, all and every State in the Union! By enacting and enforcing efficacious laws for checking the growth of these monstrous evils, and restoring matters, in some degree to the pristine state they were in at the commencement of the war.

"Our cause is noble, it is the cause of mankind. And the danger to it is to be apprehended from ourselves."

The hopelessness of General Washington's position, his impotence to cure or even deal with "speculation, peculation, production, engrossing, forestalling," is akin to the difficulties which he had in maintaining his armed forces, whose personnel was wont to take off for home on the slightest whim.

This letter is worth quoting because it indicates the extent to which our groping for a solution to the problem of curbing war profiteering has advanced. In each of our wars adventurers have sought "to amass fortunes upon the public ruin." But in the present war such attempts are being dealt with effectively.

The problem is threefold—material, fiscal, and moral—with political overtones. Adequate appreciation of this triple nature of the problem is essential to an understanding of the history of attempts to meet it. For if attention is paid to the tone of only one or only two tines of the tuning fork, the results may be highly discordant.

[1] George Washington, in a letter to the President of Congress dated August 16, 1777.

PRICE OF ARMOR PLATE IN SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

The most important of the threefold aspects of the problem is the material. For to an increasing extent wars have become matters of matériel. The point is illustrated by attempts by the Congress to control the price of just one item of matériel—armor plate—prior to and during the Spanish-American War. During the early nineties the Navy had paid from $574 to as high as $671 for armor plate.[2] In the belief that such prices were unreasonable, the Congress took action, and on March 3, 1897, a statute limiting the price of armor plate to $300 a ton was approved. Fiscal and moral considerations may have motivated such action, but that material considerations were not amply weighed is indicated by the ineffectiveness of this legislation. Manufacturers simply refused to accept contracts at the lower price. To avoid its having dire results in the prosecution of the war, the Congress had to raise the ceiling to $400. Notwithstanding this experience, the Congress subsequently tempted fate by reducing the ceiling once more to $300, with the result that manufacturers again refused to bid.[3] Finally despairing, the Congress gave the Secretary of the Navy authority [4] to procure armor "at a price which in his judgment is reasonable and equitable." Thus, the Congress finally succumbed to the material aspect of the problem—the most important of the three.

Price and profit control must be so finely governed that the material requirements of a war will be satisfied. This means that, under the capitalistic system to which we are committed, there must be incentive to produce and to produce quickly in large volume. In peacetime, competition provides this incentive, and as soon as competition kills it, production ceases. The fittest survive. But in wartime the production of the least fit may be just as essential as the production of the fittest, so that prices and profits must be such that both have an incentive to survive. If the material aspects of the problem are not given sufficient weight, the question of the moral and fiscal aspects may become academic through the loss of the war which is being fought.

PRICE AND PROFIT CONTROLS IN WORLD WAR NO. 1

Attempts to control prices and profits of war contracts in World War No. 1 proved futile. Indeed, as in the case of the Spanish-American War, they boomeranged—but for a different reason. The material aspect of the problem was overemphasized by the adoption of cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost contracts. These were designed to underwrite the contractor, inducing him to turn to war production because by such underwriting he escaped risk, and at the same time inducing him to produce rapidly in large volume. But by the very nature of these contracts, he was actually induced to increase his costs, for the ratio between profits and costs remained constant and the higher the dollar costs the higher the dollar profits. Thus, a fiscal fallacy entered into the adoption of this kind of a contractual arrangement. It should have been evident at the outset, but in this as in so many aspects of pricing, hindsight is superior to foresight.

Another fiscal error was made when attempts to limit war profits were supplemented by relatively high express profits taxes.[5]

As Bernard Baruch has stated,[6] high excess-profits taxes standing alone aggravate war evils.

However lofty may have been the motives of the country, the Congress, and the procurement agencies during World War No. 1, however much they may have had their eyes on the material and moral prongs of the tuning fork, they failed to tune in with the third—the fiscal. While, unlike the experience of the Spanish-American War, legislation did not in itself hamper satisfaction of the material considerations or discourage production, while attempts to limit profits satisfied lofty moral concepts, these attempts were abortive because insufficient attention was given to the fiscal aspect of the problem. Not only did cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost contracts fail to curb war profiteering; they aggravated it. Not only did high excess-profits taxes fail to prevent war profiteering; they made for inflation.

Of the 168 bills and resolutions introduced into the Congress between the 1918 armistice and the fall of France for the purpose of coping with the problem of war profiteering, few were adopted and none recognized the threefold nature of the problem. Of those that were adopted, all were failures because they considered only the moral aspect of the problem. The only important piece of legislation of this nature was incorporated in the Vinson-Trammell Act, passed in 1934 [8] and subsequently amended three times—in 1936,[9] 1939,[10] and 1940.[11] By limiting profits on naval vessels (subsequently extended to apply to military and naval aircraft) to a percentage of the contract price, the Vinson-Trammell Act prescribed what, in effect, was not very alien to the cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost contracts of World War No. 1. The main difference was that the contract price rather than the cost was the base. While superficially this difference might appear to be great, in actual practice, it could be almost meaningless. Thus, because it did not give sufficient cognizance to the material and fiscal aspects of price control and profit limitation on war contracts, the Vinson-Trammell Act was ineffectual. More than that, in some instances the act discouraged shipbuilders and aircraft manufacturers from entering into contracts, and thus delayed the defense program.[12]

POLITICAL OVERTONES

During the twenties, the question of regulation of prices of war contracts and limitation of profits thereon became increasingly important from the political standpoint.

One of the most potent forces was the American Legion, whose political influence was growing rapidly. In 1920 it launched a campaign for what it termed "Universal service." [13]

In 1924 the two major political parties each included a plank calling for the close control of the munitions industry in time of war.

The Republican plank [14] read as follows:

"We believe that in time of war the Nation should draft for its defenses not only its citizens but also every resource which may contribute to success. The country demands that should the United States ever again be called upon to defend itself by arms, the President be empowered to draft such material resources and such services as may be required, and to stabilize prices of services and essential commodities, whether utilized in actual warfare or private activity."

The Democratic plank [15] read as follows:

"In the event of war in which the manpower of the Nation is drafted, all other resources should likewise be drafted. This will tend to discourage war by depriving it of its profits."

Apparently both major political parties felt that with the adoption of these two planks in 1924 the matter had been disposed of, for future party platforms ignored the subject. In view of the extensive newspaper publicity and general public preoccupation with the question of control of war profits that developed as the years went on, it seems strange that neither political party made an issue of the matter. Nor is it reasonable to explain this omission of the question from the party platforms by the fact that it was receiving so much attention in the Congress. The omission may be set down simply as a political phenomenon.

During the thirties, with World War No. 2 drawing nearer, agitation for a complete ban on war profits grew apace. Thus, a majority of the Senate Munitions Committee on June 18, 1936, recommended the nationalization of naval shipbuilding and manufacture of certain arms used by the Army and Navy.[16] The minority report of the committee expressed the belief that rigid and conclusive munitions control would be more effective than nationalization in promoting peace, defense, and economy. The majority recommendation was based on the conclusion, drawn from 2 year of investigation, that regulation of arms manufacture is easily evaded.[17]

On June 22, 1936, the Women's Committee on Suggestions for the Democratic platform recommended by unanimous adoption that the best way to preserve peace was by passing stronger neutrality legislation and taxing the profit out of war.[18]

Three months earlier, in one of the first polls conducted by Dr. George Gallup, director of the American Institute of Public Opinion, the people of the country had gone on record as strongly favoring manufacture by the Government of its own war materials. In the Nation-wide poll the vote favoring this change was 82 to 18 out of every 100, with about the same proportion of members of both political parties favoring the change.[19]

It was this agitation that, in part, led to the strenghening of the Vinson-Trammell Act of June 27, 1936.[20]

The political crescendo reached in regard to war profits control occurred in 1939 and 1940 and 25 bills were introduced in the Congress to deal with the subject more effectively than it had been dealt with theretofore. With war brewing and finally developing in Europe and with production of munitions mounting rapidly in this country, it was only natural that insistence upon adoption of some form of control should increase. None of these numerous bills, however, was adopted, for the Congress was tending more and more to the belief that the problem could be dealt with by a high excess-profits tax.

Still clearly uncertain as to how to cope with the problem, the Congress side-stepped the issue in the Revenue Act of 1940. Finally, however, on July 1, 1940, shortly after approval of the Revenue Act of 1940, the President addressed a strong message to the Congress directing its attention to the National Defense Program and to the duty of the Congress to see that the burden of the program was equitably distributed according to ability to pay, and recommending the enactment of a steeply graduated excess-profits tax, to be applied to all individuals and all corporate organizations without discrimination.[21]

As a result, both Houses finally adopted a highly complicated measure involving a combination of the theories of average earnings and invested capital which represented a not very happy compromise.[22] The provisions for excess-profits taxes were subsequently amended in 1941 [23] and again in 1942.[24]

SIXTH SUPPLEMENTAL NATIONAL DEFENSE APPROPRIATION ACT

An uneasy feeling that the high excess-profits taxes did not wholly accomplish the purpose of controlling prices and profits on war production continued to prevail in the Congress. During discussion of the Sixth Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act of April 1942, Congressman FRANCIS CASE, Republican from South Dakota, introduced into the House a measure to limit the profits on war contracts to 6 percent.[25] While it was not specifically stated, it is to be presumed that this 6 percent was on a basis of before taxes, following the precedent established by the Vinson-Trammell Act. The measure passed the House by a vote of 70 to 8.[26]

As it went to the Senate, however, the procurement agencies along with the War Production Board pointed out that this arrangement would place a profit strait jacket on business and provide for the realization of excessive profits by companies which in the best of peacetimes were accustomed to making no more than 2 percent on sales, while at the same time it might force heavy industry companies into bankruptcy by not allowing them sufficient return. In other words, while the aim of the Case amendment was laudable, again the question of practicality was overlooked.

Meanwhile, recognizing that unprecedented volume of production was leading to excessive profits already indicated by 1941 corporate reports, the War Department had conducted a number of price renegotiations with prominent war contractors. Therefore, when asked by the Congress to suggest an alternative to the Case amendment, Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell, Chief of the Army Service Forces, presented a substitute on behalf of the procurement agencies. It was based on the theory that if every contract price could be reexamined by the parties in the light of actual experience under the contract, it should be possible to eliminate the bulk of excessive profits.[27]

Appearing before the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations, Robert P. Patterson, Under Secretary of War, gave the following reasons for opposing a set profit limitation:

"1. Effect of costs: In our view, the control of profits is an integral part of the problem of controlling costs and prices, and any method must be evaluated by its effects on all three aspects. From this point of view we feel that renegotiation is far superior to a fixed percentage limitation.

"2. Uniformity: In the second place, a flat percentage limitation does not really achieve its prime objective of uniformity of treatment. Although it allows a fixed uniform percent of profit on gross sales, this will be most unfair as applied to the diverse types of business engaged in war work. It takes no account of the fact that in different lines of business the same volume of sales may require widely different amounts of capital, skill, and work, depending on the rate of turn-over." [28]

This can be regarded as a perfect summation of the practical aspects of control of prices on and profits from war contractors.

As for political aspects, the startling revelations as to extraordinary salaries and bonuses paid by Jack & Heintz, Inc., as brought out in hearings before the Naval Affairs Investigating Committee,[29] crystallized in the public mind the extent to which war profiteering might lead. Public reaction, as reflected in newspaper comment and letters to the Congress, was immediate and intense. Under the leadership of Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR, Democrat of Tennessee, the Senate Appropriations Committee adopted the principle of contract renegotiation in the form of section 403 of the Sixth Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act.[30] Thus, politically, this final approach to control of war profiteering had its active sponsorship from a Republican in the House and a Democrat in the Senate. The 1924 party platforms had been fulfilled.

ANTIRENEGOTIATION CAMPAIGN

But the matter had not been fully resolved with enactment of the Sixth Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act and its section 403. Perhaps because there had been no debate in the Senate or the House on this section, some contractors subject to it took the position that it had been ill-considered and that it was designed to ruin American business.

In August of 1942 the campaign to repeal or emasculate renegotiation was launched by John B. Hawley, president and sole owner of the Northern Pump Co., of Minnesota, when he circularized the Congress and businessmen with a silver-covered 42-page brochure captioned "Dictatorship over United States industry under Public Law 528" and subcaptioned "Sabotage of production, development, and expansion—Towards losing the war." This was only one of a series of mailings sent out by one of the relatively few aggressive opponents of renegotiation—an excellent producer, it must be said, as are most of the other vocal business opponents. At about the same time a financial magazine carried an article by a prominent writer condemning renegotiation and basing his argument almost wholly on a theoretical case coinciding interestingly with Northern Pump.[31] This article, displaying a wide misconception of what renegotiation is all about, was subsequently reprinted in condensed form in Reader's Digest. The battle was on.

The departments engaged in renegotiation agreed with some of the more reasoned objections to the law which were voiced by businessmen of a less sensational stripe than Hawley, Jack, et al. Indeed, as the administrators began to work with the act, it became apparent that it did contain a number of minor flaws relating chiefly to mechanics. This was inevitable, since adoption and application of the principle of renegotiation represented pioneering. Certain recommendations for changes in renegotiation were adopted administratively by the departments and subsequently incorporated as amendments to section 403 in the Revenue Act of 1942,[32] jurisdiction for renegotiation having been transferred from the Appropriations Committee to the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee, where it has continued to remain.

A summary of some of the other changes effected through the Revenue Act of 1942 will indicate the manner in which the practical aspects of profit control were now commanding an increasing degree of attention—the moral, fiscal, and political aspects having been satisfied by the adoption of the principle embodied in section 403.

One amendment provided for final agreements. When a contractor or subcontractor renegotiated in good faith for a specified period and agreed to eliminate excessive profits for that period, it was clear that he should be entitled to assurance that the matter would not be reopened at a later date. The original statute did not provide expressly for any final clearance for liability for excessive profits. This amendment specifically authorized such final agreements for a specified past or future period.

Another change was embodied in two provisions affecting a statute of limitations on renegotiation. The first of these prohibited renegotiation after 1 year from the close of the fiscal year in which the contract or subcontract was completed or terminated. The second authorized a contractor to file financial and cost statements for prior fiscal periods and obtain clearance under the statute, unless the Secretary should begin renegotiation within 1 year thereafter. Few contractors availed themselves of this privilege.

Under the original law, when a contractor or subcontractor held a number of war contracts or subcontracts, the boards had found it desirable to renegotiate with him to eliminate excessive profits on these contracts or subcontracts as a group, or on an over-all basis, instead of individually. Section 403 authorized renegotiation of contracts individually. In view of the boards' practice of considering contracts as a group, the group renegotiation was formalized as part of the statute.

By one of the amendments, too, the Treasury Department was brought into the field of renegotiation, while other changes were largely of a technical and relatively minor nature.

CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS

Politically, the next important step affecting renegotiation was an investigation by the Special Committee Investigating the National Defense Program (Truman committee) begun in the early part of 1943 under the direction of Senator CARL M. HATCH, chairman of a special subcommittee on renegotiation. A report [33] issued by this subcommittee under date of March 30, 1943, in general, endorsed the principle of renegotiation in no uncertain terms, praised its administration, and made a number of recommendations designed to lead to further improvement in both the act and the administration.

Led by a small minority of businessmen, the attack on the principle of renegotiation became increasingly vocal as the year 1943 progressed. Thus it was that several score of industrialists thoroughly opposed to renegotiation appeared before the Naval Affairs investigation committee during its hearings on the subject in June 1943.[34] Also before this committee, on the other hand, appeared a number of contractors who favored the principle and the administration of the renegotiation statute. The transcript of these hearings is embodied in a 1,300-page document, which was supplemented on October 7, 1943, by a report of the committee itself.[35] The majority of this committee followed in the steps of the Truman committee by strongly endorsing both the principle and the administration of the statute. The minority endorsed the principle, praised the Government representatives in the price adjustment boards, but averred that renegotiation had served its purpose and should be repealed as to contracts made after December 31, 1943.

With attacks by certain business groups rising to a higher pitch, the House Ways and Means Committee—as part of its job in preparing the revenue bill of 1943—began hearings on renegotiation in September 1943, which continued off and on during the month. This testimony ran 1,100 pages.[36] The committee's report [37] outlined provisions for a new renegotiation act based on section 403 of the Sixth Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act. To the amazement of business interests, the renegotiation provisions prescribed by the House Ways and Means Committee continued renegotiation in the main as it had been conducted for nearly a year and a half. Major changes—including provision for court review of unilateral determinations and exemption of contractors having renegotiable business less than $500,000 a year—had been either recommended or endorsed by the administrative departments.

When the Senate Finance Committee had completed its hearings on renegotiation early in December of 1943, however, it soon became apparent that the majority of the committee was determined to make such changes in the House bill as would leave only an empty shell. The form would be preserved but the substance destroyed. All over the country newspapers reflected the public reaction to this attempted emasculation. Such a champion of private enterprise as David Lawrence at one extreme and such a "leftist" as PM at the other extreme sprang to the defense of renegotiation. Said the former:

"Undoubtedly there have been some injustices, and these ought to be revised by The Tax Court, or even some special court. But when a man like James Forrestal, Under Secretary of the Navy, whose peacetime job is investment banking in Wall Street, cries out against the efforts to emasculate the renegotiation law, other businessmen will want to ask themselves whether their tactics may not lead to a reaction and another wave of radicalism and antibusiness legislation when the servicemen come back home and get all the facts about wartime profits." [38]

Another advocate of private enterprise, Mr. Arthur Krock, in commenting on the attempt to amend renegotiation out of existence, said:

"If the Renegotiation Act is amended to the extent favored by the congressional committees, war corporate profits will reach levels that, when spotlighted after the war, as they are sure to be, may infuriate the country, produce a reckless and destructive backswing against industry and start all over again the cycle of pacifism and 'merchants-of-death' propaganda that helped so profoundly to send this Nation unprepared into desperate war." [39]

The preservation of private enterprise is certainly one of my chief concerns. Any legislation that would destroy or hurt it would be inimical to such a concern. Believing that renegotiation was not only in the general public interest but was of specific benefit to industry itself and convinced that any emasculation of renegotiation would be a serious blow to both the country as a whole and industry as an important segment, I presented on behalf of myself and Senators La Follette, Connally, and Lucas a document called Minority Views. [40] The response to publication of these views, which attacked certain of the provisions of the Senate bill that seemed to me to emasculate renegotiation, was instantaneous and dramatic. Newspaper editorial writers and commentators throughout the country, presumably reflecting a good cross section of public sentiment, made it clear that the public would not stand for renegotiation emasculation. It became crystal clear that the country would not tolerate a return to World War No. 1 profiteering and that it regarded renegotiation as the only sound preventive measure so far developed.

As a consequence, the Senate and House conferees, composing their differences, presented to the Congress what the Washington Post described as "a testimonial to the legislative process of study, discussion and compromise. It is," continued the Post, "a sound, workable law, acceptable to the executive agencies which must administer it and responsive to the rights of the contractors who must submit to it." [41]

In short, after long trial and error, the fundamental trio of considerations—material, fiscal, and moral—had been satisfied by successful legislative processes for the reasonable control of wartime profiteering.

No doubt, as time goes on, new flaws will appear in both the legislation and the administration. But as it now stands, the Renegotiation Act itself is the best solution of a difficult problem which human ingenuity and experience have been able to contrive.

Treaty Ratification

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion it becomes increasingly more important each day that the Congress give consideration to a resolution submitting to the States a constitutional amendment that would provide for treaty ratification by a simple majority of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GOSSETT] made a very logical argument in favor of such action over a National Broadcasting Co. network a few days ago. Mr. Gossett and I have both appeared before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee in support of resolutions proposing such an amendment which we have introduced.

Under leave granted to extend my remarks I desire to include here the radio address delivered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GOSSETT].

It follows:

I want to thank the National Broadcasting Co. for giving me this time to discuss a matter which many serious thinking Americans believe to be vital to the future peace and security of this country.

With reference to treaties, the Constitution of the United States provides that the President shall have power "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." This phrase "provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur" is the stump on which most of our important treaties have been wrecked. The great men who wrote the Constitution disagreed on this provision. The eminent jurist, James Wilson, wise old Benjamin Franklin, and other able members of the convention opposed this two-thirds requirement for treaty ratification. To permit a minority of one-third plus one of the Senate to defeat treaties was even then not in keeping with democratic ideals. This provision has been properly called the great mistake of the Constitution.

The two-thirds rule was written into the Constitution as a compromise between the large-State group and the small-State group. Of the 13 States then in the Union, 7 of them had only a fractional part of the entire population and considered this provision a matter of defense against large-State domination. Within 25 years after the adoption of the Constitution this reason for the rule ceased to exist. The reason the House of Representatives was denied participation in the ratification of treaties is given in The Federalist in this language:

"Accurate and comprehensive knowledge of foreign politics; a steady and systematic adherence to the same views; a nice and uniform sensibility to national character; decision, secrecy, and dispatch, are incompatible with the genus of a body so variable and numerous."

If this strange reasoning were ever sound, it has long since ceased to be supportable. The Senate certainly does not act in secrecy and seldom with dispatch. In fact, there are some who now contend, with great logic, that the power to ratify treaties should be left exclusively to the House, without Senate participation whatsoever. The House is closer to the people, it more nearly reflects the popular will, its Members are elected each 2 years on a basis of population, and under the Rules of the House delay and filibuster are impossible. On the other hand, Senators are elected for 6-year terms. A Senator representing only a hundred and ten thousand people, as in the case of Nevada, has a voice equal to a Senator representing 13,000,000 people, as in the case of New York, while under Senate Rules of Procedure a small minority can filibuster any measure to death, even though it has the overwhelming support of the American people and, in fact, of the membership of the Senate itself.

Briefly, how has the two-thirds rule worked in practice? With one or two possible exceptions, no treaty of great consequence was ever ratified by the United States Senate, while many treaties of importance have been destroyed through Senate procedure and because of the two-thirds rule. In 1824 Secretary of State John Quincy Adams negotiated a treaty with Great Britain for the suppression of slave trade. The treaty was repudiated by the Senate with sad effect upon American history. In 1844 a treaty for the annexation of Texas to the Union was defeated in the Senate. President McKinley was unable to secure the annexation of Hawaii by treaty.

In both these cases Presidents were forced to resort to the subterfuge of joint resolutions in lieu of the constitutional process of treaty ratification. If Texas had not been annexed, at least one-third of our present domain would now be foreign soil. If Hawaii had not been annexed, Jap soldiers might now be fighting on this continent. But back to the record.

In 1897 the Olney-Pauncefote Treaty, which provided for the arbitration of disputes between this country and Great Britain, although it received a vote of 43 ayes to 26 nays, failed of ratification in the United States Senate and resulted in much hard feeling between this country and Great Britain. Again, President McKinley, thinking to avoid trouble in securing Senate ratification of the treaty ending the Spanish-American War, appointed three Senators from the Foreign Relations Committee on the commission of five to draw up the treaty. Notwithstanding Senate representation on the commission, notwithstanding the fact that we dictated the terms of that treaty, ratification was secured in the Senate only after a month of torrid debate and by the slim margin of one vote. About this time John Hay, one of our most able Secretaries of State, had this to say of the Senate's power over treaty ratification:

"The United States is rapidly coming to be regarded by the other great powers as a Nation which is not able to make a treaty. We have been trying to conclude important international agreements during the past 15 years, but have seen one after another of them go to wreck in the Senate. It is needless to enumerate the long and melancholy list. Whether the President was Cleveland or Harrison or McKinley, whether the negotiations were Democratic or Republican, the power of the Senate to ratify treaties has been mainly exercised as the power to kill treaties. Three valuable conventions with Great Britain have been broken on the Senate's veto. The Chief of State has made treaties with France and Germany, but the Senate has said with a sneer, 'They reckon ill who leave me out,' and has brought the whole work to the ground. With or without intention, we seem to the world to have stripped ourselves of a leading attribute of sovereignty—the power to make treaties."

In 1904 Theodore Roosevelt abandoned entirely the submission of nine treaties of arbitration because he feared the two-thirds rule necessary for Senate ratification.

In 1927 a treaty of amity and commerce between this country and Turkey received a vote of 50 ayes to 34 nays and failed of ratification. At different times Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Roosevelt urged American adherence to the World Court, yet none could secure the necessary two-thirds vote in the United States Senate.

But the all-time classic example of the futility of the two-thirds rule, the one about which whole libraries have been written, is the Senate consideration of the Versailles Treaty and of the League of Nations. Because of the shrewd and determined opposition of one or two Senators operating under the two-thirds rule, the Treaty of Versailles was repudiated and the League of Nations doomed to failure.

Senator Watson, in a brazen confession, tells of a conversation with Senator Lodge in 1919 during their conspiracy to destroy Wilson and the League. Watson told Lodge that 80 percent of the American people were in favor of adherence to the League, that 80 percent of the ministers of America were advocating it from their pulpits, and that the League could not be defeated. To this Senator Lodge replied that he did not expect to defeat the League by frontal attack but by the indirect method of reservation and delay. After many months of debate Senator Lodge was able to attach to the proposed treaty 14 separate and distinct reservations. On that fateful day, March 19, 1920, a final vote was taken in the Senate. Forty-nine voted aye, 35 voted nay. A minority had defeated the majority. Isolation became our foreign policy.

Students of the Senate debate on the Versailles Treaty generally agree there were four major reasons why a two-thirds vote in the Senate for ratification of the treaty could not be secured. Incidentally, these are continuing reasons, regardless of who the President is or who the Senators are, and because of these reasons one can safely predict that Senate ratification of any treaty of great consequence cannot be obtained.

Categorically, these four reasons are:

1. Party politics. A Senator may represent a State with racial or religious strains opposed to a particular treaty.

2. Senatorial pride and prerogative. Senators cooperate with each other and are jealous of the power and dignity of the Senate. For example, a treaty ceding the Isle of Pines to Cuba was held up in the Senate for 21 years, although urged by all Presidents, although reported favorably by all Foreign Relations Committees, although favored by the overwhelming majority of the Senators, simply because first one Senator then another would ask and receive delay for one reason or another.

3. Hatred of the President. When any President has been long in office, a distrust of, a dislike for, and sometimes a positive hatred of him will grow up in the hearts of some Senators.

4. A desire to return to isolation. There will always be a few Senators who honestly believe that we can live unto ourselves and should have no agreements with other nations.

Twenty years before he became President Woodrow Wilson referred to the treaty-marring power of the United States Senate. While president of the American Bar Association, John W. Davis, in condemning the two-thirds rule, said it does not "contribute to national influence or prestige or safety that the process of ratifying or rejecting treaties should degenerate into an effort to discover some qualifying formula acceptable to the minority."

From President Washington to President Franklin Roosevelt, from Secretary of State Jefferson to Secretary of State Hull, all Presidents and all Secretaries of State have had heart-breaking experiences with the two-thirds ratification rule in the Constitution. Without doubt all would testify positively that no good and much harm has resulted from this rule, and that it has always been a source of irritation, embarrassment, and injury to this Government.

Ninety-five percent of all patriotic societies and of all religious organizations in America have gone on record urging American participation in some form of post-war collaboration for the prevention of war and the preservation of peace. Both branches of the Congress have gone overwhelmingly on record for post-war collaboration. The Secretary of State and the President have spoken positively on this subject. All leading candidates for President now condemn isolation as a national policy. Notwithstanding this overwhelming sentiment in the private and official life of America, that the mistakes of 1920 be avoided, history is almost certain to repeat itself. Like causes will produce like results.

A majority of the Congress can declare war. Why should not a majority of the Congress be able to declare peace?

Shall we continue to have minority control over treaties? Must our international dealings be carried on through executive agreement without participation of the elected representatives of the people? Finally, are we to lose the next peace on a technicality?

Can anything be done about this, you ask? Yes; there is now pending in the Congress a number of resolutions seeking to amend the Constitution by providing that treaties be ratified by simple majorities of the house and the Senate. You might write your representatives in the Congress urging their support of such a resolution.

Our great Capital, the city of Washington, is now the hub of the universe. The representatives of the nations will probably meet here to draw up the treaties that end this global war. Following the signing of these treaties our representatives will doubtless play a leading role in the formulation of some kind of association, some new league of nations for the preservation of peace. After securing the agreement and consent of other nations to these documents, will a determined minority in the United States Senate again say, we'll have none of it? Will the greatest and most powerful nation in the world then be rendered shameful and impotent before all mankind? The Constitution should be amended in order to avoid such a possible and tragic catastrophe, and in order to facilitate America's rightful leadership in world affairs.

Clean Tokens Please Customers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, my office is receiving complaints from constituents, because it is impossible for them to get cleaning fluids and materials necessary to operate dry-cleaning establishments.

In the congressional district which I represent in Congress there is a great shortage of manpower. Some of the territory is in a restricted labor area now, and hearings have recently been held looking toward placing the largest city in the district in a more restricted labor area. It is very difficult for retailers and merchants to furnish even the minimum service required by the communities. The State manpower director, as well as other war agencies, is seeking more labor in the war effort. In short, those patriotic citizens carrying on the local retail business, the general store, the market, and the grocery are overworked to the breaking point. There is an end to the physical endurance of these people.

Having personal knowledge of the existence of these conditions, I am not surprised at the vehement protest of a constituent who calls my attention to a statement contained in the April issue of O. P. A. Food Guide for Retailers, published and sent out at public expense by the United States Office of Price Administration, Washington, D. C. The statement is as follows:

Retailers can please customers by handing out clean, fresh-looking tokens in change for stamps.

You can clean tokens easily with alcohol or a mild cleaning fluid. Soap and water also cleans tokens, but not so quickly as alcohol does.

Never let tokens soak more than a few minutes in water or in any cleaning fluid. They cannot survive a soaking.

Mr. Speaker, there was much protest on the part of many people within the Government against the adoption of these tokens in the first place. Hundreds of millions of them have been manufactured and distributed, billions of them will be in circulation before rationing ends.

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, the feeling of the overworked merchant who is trying to comply with all the rules and regulations imposed upon him, when he is advised by his Government that he should use alcohol or a mild cleaning fluid to wash, cleanse, and make attractive these tokens which he is compelled to count, handle, and distribute. Yes, he is permitted the choice of washing with soap and water if he is not able to get the alcohol. These theorists who are advising the laundering of these tokens make it clear that the busy merchant should "never let tokens soak more than a few minutes in water or in any cleaning fluid" because "they cannot survive a soaking."

Mr. Speaker, there comes a time when patience ceases to be a virtue, and I am wondering if that time has not arrived. The retailers in my district who are asked to wash these tokens, "in order that they may appear more attractive," are exasperated. When will such foolishness in the way of rules, regulations, and information on the part of Washington bureaus cease?

Rev. Stanislaus Orlemanski and Prof. Oscar Lange

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN LESINSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter I have forwarded today to the Attorney General, Hon. Francis Biddle, relative to Reverend Orlemanski and Professor Lange:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 8, 1944.

Hon. FRANCIS BIDDLE,
The Attorney General,
Department of Justice,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL BIDDLE: I am writing you in regard to the case of the Reverend Stanislaus Orlemanski and Prof. Oscar Lange, to whom there has been considerable reference in the press recently, as well as over the radio, in regard to their trip to the Soviet Union.

Under date of May 1, 1944, I addressed a letter to the Honorable Secretary of State and inquired as to the information the State Department had relative to this trip.

Under date of May 6, 1944, I received the following reply from Secretary Hull:

"The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 1, 1944, relative to the visit of the Reverend Stanislaus Orlemanski and Prof. Oscar Lange to the Soviet Union.

"In reply I wish to inform you that Father Orlemanski and Professor Lange proceeded to the Soviet Union on the invitation of the Soviet Government, which furnished their transportation to Moscow. They are making this trip as private American citizens, acting in their own individual capacities. They have no official status, and therefore are not in any sense representatives or spokesmen of the United States Government.

"On the basis of the fact that they were officially invited by a friendly Allied power to make this trip, passports were issued to them, valid for their journey to Moscow."

It is quite apparent from the foregoing letter of the Secretary of State that Reverend Orlemanski and Professor Lange were acting in their own individual capacities, as specially invited guests of the Soviet Union. I am, therefore, of the opinion that both Reverend Orlemanski and Professor Lange have directly violated the provisions of section 5 of the Penal Code of the United States.

Both Reverend Orlemanski and Professor Lange are well known in this country as Soviet sympathizers, and the entire purpose of their visit to the Soviet Union was to disrupt the unity of the United Nations. This country is committed to a policy of nonrecognition of territorial acquisition by force, and from the press releases and radio reports it is evident that they are endeavoring as individuals to convert the 6,000,000 Americans of Polish descent to the Soviet's program in regard to Poland.

Reverend Orlemanski has been active for the Soviet cause and assisted in organizing the Kosciusko League in Detroit last fall, which is a Communist-controlled organization.

In the case of Professor Lange, he has been a naturalized citizen of the United States for a period of a little more than a year, and it is quite evident by his actions that his sole purpose of becoming a citizen of this country was to give him the protection afforded to Americans, and at the same time use that cloak of Americanism to protect him while spreading the doctrines of the Soviet Union. He certainly cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be accepted as a true American—one who believes in the American way of life and a democratic form of government. I am of the opinion that proper legal steps should be taken by the Department of Justice to take away from him his American citizenship.

Inasmuch as Reverend Orlemanski and Professor Lange have violated the provisions of our Penal Code, I am calling on you to take appropriate action, upon their return to this country, as it is quite apparent that they have been carrying on both verbal intercourse and written correspondence with a foreign government with the intent to influence the measures and conduct of that government in relation to the policies of the United States.

I am also calling upon you to take appropriate action as to these individuals in regard to their acting as agents for a foreign country without being properly registered by our State Department in accordance with existing law.

With best wishes and kindest personal regards and an expression of my highest esteem, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN LESINSKI,
Member of Congress.

PENAL CODE

SEC. 5. Every citizen of the United States, whether actually resident or abiding within the same, or in any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or in any foreign country, who, without the permission or authority of the Government, directly or indirectly, commences or carries on any verbal or written correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government or any officer or agent thereof, with an intent to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government or of any officer or agent thereof, in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States, or to defeat the measures of the Government of the United States; and every person, being a citizen of or resident within the United States or in any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, and not duly authorized, who counsels, advises, or assists in any such correspondence with such intent, shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than 3 years; but nothing in this section shall be construed to abridge the right of a citizen to apply, himself or his agent, to any foreign government or the agents thereof for redress of any injury which he may have sustained from such government or any of its agents or subjects. (Revised Statutes, sec. 5335; Mar. 4, 1909, ch. 321, sec. 5, 35 Stat. 1088; Apr. 22, 1932, ch. 126, 47 Stat. 132.)

In Defense of the Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED ROWE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial by Jay Sheldon, entitled "In Defense of the Congress":

IN DEFENSE OF THE CONGRESS

(By Jay Sheldon)

There has been an unfortunate tendency, of recent months, for some thoughtless editorial writers and columnists, to smear the Congress of the United States, through an all embracing blanket indictment. Reference to the House of Representatives as the "House of Reprehensibles," is an outstanding instance.

It has been said that this was all part of a scheme to discredit the Congress in the eyes of the people. That may or may not be true. Certainly it is true that some writers, in their eagerness to pay homage to the executive branch, have gone to extremes. Constructive criticism of the acts of some individual Member of the Congress, or the suspected failings of some committee, has its proper place in a democracy. But to include the entire Congress shows an inexcusable ignorance of the basic principles upon which our kind of government has been founded.

On the eve of a national campaign, during which the merits and demerits of respective candidates will be discussed, it is vitally important that all of us prove our intelligence and consider the membership of the Congress in its true perspective.

As Senator JOHNSON recently said:

"Congress is but a replica of the people. Congress can never rise far above their aspirations and their ability. Congress is not only a cross-section of the people, it reflects their moods and their inner selves."

Ours is a government, not of kings and princes but of the people. Our founding fathers planned that Members of the House of Representatives would serve for terms of 2 years so that if the people did not feel their Representatives at Washington reflected their sentiments they could elect another. Our Congressmen, therefore, are closer to the people, more conscious of their wants, more accountable to their demands than are the Senators, who serve for 6 years, or the President, who serves for a 4-year term. Your Congressman has to face the voters every 24 months.

There are 435 Members of the House of Representatives. These represent more than 136,000,000 people of all shades of opinion, of varying sectional problems. Naturally, a legislative body that represents more than 136,000,000 people will appear at times cumbersome; sometimes confusing, seeking to compromise different sectional viewpoints. Striving to meet the changing trends of public opinion of such a large body of our citizenry, it is natural that minority groups, seeing only their side of a problem, may become impatient. But this is democracy in action. To condemn the entire Congress because, as a body, it does not agree with the opinion of any group is obviously unfair. There is no editorial writer, no columnist, no radio commentator so important that the American people would delegate to him the sole judge as to who they should send to Washington to represent them in the Congress. The people know their Congressman. If he is to be spanked, they will do it. They elect the type of man they want. You may not like their choice. But it is their choice. If the people want investigations, don't criticize the fact that there may be too many. Congress is merely doing what the people want them to do. When they do less, they insure their own defeat for reelection.

At the moment there is a certain conflict between the executive branch and the Congress. This is not the fault of the Congress. It springs from a lack of tolerance upon the part of the President's advisers as to the constitutional rights and dignity of the legislative branch. The President has created an impression he wants to be the whole works. He started with a "must" program of legislation which a "rubber stamp" Congress passed. But the people have clearly indicated, in the past two congressional elections, that they did not want "rubber stamp" representatives. As Senator JOHNSON says, in his interesting Evils of Concentrated Power, when the President sought to purge Members of Congress, of his own party, who refused to agree with everything he proposed, he met with a rebuff by the people such as no President had before received.

No matter who is elected to be our next President, one thing is sure: He must possess great tolerance; must seek to sincerely cooperate with the legislative branch, must subordinate his views to that of the majority; must have faith in the people and their chosen representatives in the Congress. Anything less would be dictatorship.

Congress has rewon its proper independence. The voice of the people has decided this. There may still be some "rubber stamps" to stand for reelection, but the great majority of the Congress speak for their neighbors; the voters of their congressional districts. If the Congress is wrong, then the people who elected them are wrong. If the entire Congress is to be smeared, then Hitler still has some friends in America, for those who would seek to destroy the faith of the people in representative government and substitute for it some totalitarian rule, are playing the game of our enemies and seek to destroy this Government which Lincoln so defined as "of the people, by the people, for the people."

People of Tennessee Valley Against Senate Amendments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein an address delivered by Maj. Phil B. Whitaker before the Civitan Club of Chattanooga on the two amendments which have been added to the T. V. A. appropriation bill in the Senate:

Mr. President, members of the Civitan Club, and guests, I very sincerely appreciate being invited to speak to this club, of which I was a member for so many years, to present arguments opposing the adoption of amendments to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act which are incorporated in the Senate bill which passed the Senate on March 24. Shortly the bill is to go to conference of Members of the House and Senate before final action is taken by these two bodies. The issue is one which, in my judgment, is of paramount importance to all people of this country, and particularly to those of us who live in the Tennessee Valley. The final decision of the Congress will determine whether this Government-owned corporation shall be operated along business lines, with its policy dictated by sound business principles, or whether these business principles shall be emasculated by political considerations.

The Tennessee Valley Authority Act as it now is, is found in title 16 of the United States Code. The act creates a Government-owned corporation with a board of three directors. It provides that it shall have succession in its corporate name, may sue and be sued in its corporate name, may make contracts as authorized by the act, may adopt, amend, and repeal bylaws, and may exercise many other powers which are common to private corporations. It is authorized to construct and acquire dams on the Tennessee River and its tributaries for promotion of navigation and flood control and is further authorized to sell its surplus hydroelectric power to States, counties, cities, cooperatives, or private companies. To date the Government has invested approximately $800,000,000 in this vast enterprise, and today it is the sole source of hydroelectric power to the inhabitants of this area. The corporation is further authorized by the act to contract with commercial producers for the production of fertilizers, to arrange with farmers and farm organizations for large-scale practical use of the fertilizers, to cooperate in the prevention of soil erosion, to produce nitrogen for the manufacture of explosives in event of national emergency.

In other words, the corporation is set up along business lines to render a great and outstanding service to this area and to the entire Nation. It is required to file with the President and with the Congress in December of each year a financial statement and a complete report as to the business of the corporation covering the preceding governmental fiscal year. The act further provides that the Comptroller General of the United States shall audit the books of the corporation at such times as he shall determine, but not less frequently than once a year, with personnel of his selection. A maximum of $10,000 for the annual salaries of the three members of the board or any other officer or employee is provided by the act. For the purpose of showing how definitely the framers of the act decided that politics should not dominate or influence the acts of the corporation, I refer you to the section of the act which requires that no political test shall be given consideration in the selection of members of the board or any employee. I submit that it is the deliberate judgment of the overwhelming majority of the people of this section who have observed the operation of the Tennessee Valley Authority for the past 10 years that this requirement of the statute has been strictly complied with. The Tennessee Valley Authority is not a governmental bureaucracy located at any place remote from the valley, but by terms of the act its board of directors are required to maintain their homes in the valley where they are in constant and daily contact with the corporation which they direct and the people whom they serve.

Two weeks ago today I was a guest of this club when Senator MCKELLAR addressed us supposedly in defense of the amendments which he proposes to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. The Senator spoke for more than an hour. For more than 50 minutes he mentioned no amendments, but chose to consume the major portion of his time in defending his record as a friend of the T. V. A. He did not mention the fact that as acting chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations he offered to the Senate 17 amendments to the House bill. Of these amendments, all except two were stricken from the bill as passed by the Senate, and one of the remaining two he did not mention at all. He only discussed, and this for not more than 5 or 6 minutes, the amendment affecting what is popularly but erroneously known as the T. V. A. revolving fund.

Everyone must admit, and so far as I know has always admitted, that Senator MCKELLAR rendered distinctive and outstanding service in support of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act as originally passed and in bringing about appropriations for the construction of the various dams on the river and its tributaries. But from listening to the Senator 2 weeks ago, one cannot fail to conclude that he gives unto himself practically all of the credit for this major development. I know of no one else except Senator MCKELLAR who is willing to take the position that Senator Norris, of Nebraska, made but an insignificant contribution, if any, to the establishment and development of T. V. A. I am told by responsible parties, on the other hand, that Senator Norris gives to Senator MCKELLAR full credit for his own outstanding contribution to this development. Those of us who live in Chattanooga are thoroughly familiar with the outstanding work done by the late Congressman McReynolds in bringing about the construction of Chickamauga Dam. Strong local influences were exerted for years to bring about the construction of this particular dam, and through Congressman McReynolds the local advocates of this project received their primary support.

Without detracting for a moment from Senator MCKELLAR'S contribution to the success of the T. V. A. in the past, we yet say that it is no new thing in the history of the world for a man to attempt to destroy that thing which he has helped to create.

Many of us believe very definitely that Senator MCKELLAR has for the past 2 or more years and is now attempting to convert this Government-owned business corporation into a political instrument. He may believe that this is not destructive of the purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority and that such action will not impede its progress. He may even feel that he is better qualified to shape its policies and determine its course than are trained experts.

It is rather a remarkable thing that Senator McKELLAR saw no need for the amendments which he proposed and for those which he is now supporting until personal differences arose between him and Director Lilienthal, of the T. V. A. board. The people of the valley and of the country are not primarily interested in a personal fued between Senator McKELLAR and Mr. Lilienthal, but what we are interested in is the continued maintenance of this vast public enterprise, free from the undue and improper influences either of politics or of personal animosities between persons in high position.

As heretofore indicated, 15 of the 17 amendments to the House bill as proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, of which Senator McKELLAR is acting chairman, were stricken from the bill as passed by the Senate. These proposed amendments are now important only for the purpose of demonstrating the lengths to which Senator McKELLAR is willing to go in injecting political considerations into the administration of T. V. A. Time does not permit the mentioning of all of them. We will only mention a few. I have before me the official report of the Committee on Appropriations for the Senate, which reads: "Mr. McKELLAR, for Mr. GLASS, from the committee" on "independent offices appropriation bill, 1945." It is well known that Senator GLASS, of Virginia, the chairman of this committee, has been in ill health for some time and that Senator McKELLAR has acted as chairman and to a large degree has influenced the committee.

He proposed to strike from the House bill authorization for the continued construction of the Watts Bar steam plant, in spite of the fact that construction on this installation has proceeded for many months under congressional authorization, in spite of the fact that a failure to make this appropriation to continue this construction would have wasted the money already spent, and in spite of the fact that this installation would add an additional generating unit of 60,000-kilowatt capacity, which is badly needed in time of war.

He proposed to strike from the House bill authority to continue work on the Fort Loudoun Dam, which consisted primarily of the completion of dredging work which would complete a 9-foot navigation channel to Knoxville, much of which work has already been done.

He proposed to limit to $600,000 the amount which could be used by the Authority in the next fiscal year for the construction of transmission lines without giving any reason therefor in his report and without apparently giving consideration to the fact that much larger sums conceivably might be needed to erect transmission lines vital to war plants and other users of electricity and without considering that this much money or more might conceivably be needed to make repairs to existing lines if seriously damaged by an act of God or the public enemy. He even overlooked the fact that this limitation of $600,000 made no provision for transmission lines to market power to be generated at the Kentucky and Fontana Dams now under construction.

It was further proposed by his committee that no part of the funds appropriated for the corporation should be used to pay the compensation or expenses of any officer or employee of the corporation who takes an active part in political management or political campaigns or "who seeks to influence public opinion by means of lectures, advertisements, publications, public statements, radio, or otherwise, for or against (a) any candidate for public office or (b) any legislation or legislative proposal." The political activities of T. V. A. officers and employees are limited today by the general statute known as the Hatch Act, just as are the political activities of any other Government employee, but the Senator proposed to go further. These employees, though still American citizens, are prohibited so long as they draw compensation from the corporation, even from making a public statement with reference to any legislation or legislative proposal. So far as I know, such a proposed limitation on free speech has never before been advanced by any responsible public official. Plainly it is un-American, unconstitutional, and springs only from the mind of one who seeks to be a dictator.

Since all revenue measures originate in the House, the House first adopted an Independent Offices Appropriation bill and sent it to the Senate. This applied to appropriations for the National Archives, the Tariff Commission, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the United States Maritime Commission and others. The Senator's committee when offering its report to the Senate proposed to amend the sections with reference to the Tennessee Valley Authority by providing that every employee of the Authority who drew an annual salary of $4,500 a year or more should receive his position by appointment of the President "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate". The bill which passed the Senate on March 24 has made this provision applicable not only to the Tennessee Valley Authority, but also to all other employees of the bureaus, boards, commissions and offices referred to in the bill. This means that perhaps 30,000 employees of these various agencies may receive their appointments only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No skilled engineer or highly trained technician or other employee drawing $4,500 a year or more can, if this bill is adopted, be selected by the board of the Tennessee Valley Authority unless his appointment is approved by the Senate. The practical application of such a policy, as we well know, is that the Senators from Tennessee would pass upon every one of these employees who reside in Tennessee. Such a patronage grab is almost unprecedented.

It is wholly contrary to the provisions of section 831e of the act heretofore referred to which prohibits any political test or qualification for the appointment and promotion of employees of the corporation. In practical application it would mean that Senator McKELLAR would select every one of these important experts who are supposed to serve the Authority. The board of directors would have but little, if any, control over their employees. Senator STEWART has declared himself opposed to this amendment as well as the others. Senator McKELLAR alone wants it, and yet he has publicly declared that at his age he is not interested in patronage. We well remember that 2 weeks ago the Senator clearly showed his chagrin that the President requested Senator Norris instead of him to introduce the original T. V. A. act which contained this provision prohibiting a political test in making appointments to T. V. A. jobs.

It is generally understood that the Senator has but little hope for the passage of this amendment in the House. Therefore, I believe he would be willing to sacrifice this in conference with the House conferees if he were able to save his remaining amendment. That amendment refers to the so-called T. V. A. revolving fund. The act as it now is in section 26 provides that:

"Commencing July 1, 1936, the proceeds for each fiscal year derived by the Board from the sale of power or any other products manufactured by the corporation * * * shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States at the end of each calendar year, save and except such part of such proceeds as in the opinion of the Board shall be necessary for the corporation in the operation of dams and reservoirs, in conducting its business in generating, transmitting, and distributing electric energy and in manufacturing, selling, and distributing fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients. A continuing fund of $1,000,000 is also excepted from the requirements of this section, and may be withheld by the Board to defray emergency expenses and to insure continuous operation."

The bill as it passed the House provides that for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of the Tennessee Valley Act the unexpended balance on June 30, 1944, in the Tennessee Valley Authority fund, 1944 and the receipts of the T. V. A. from all sources during the fiscal year 1945 subject to the provisions of section 26 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933 as amended shall be covered into and accounted for as one fund to be known as the Tennessee Valley Authority fund, 1945, to remain available until June 30, 1945, and to be available for the payment of obligations chargeable against the Tennessee Valley Authority fund, 1944.

According to the report of the committee of which Senator McKELLAR is acting chairman, the unexpended balance in the account for 1944 is $19,262,298, and the estimated receipts for the year 1945, are $68,523,882, making an estimated amount which would be available under the House bill of $87,791,180. In lieu of this provision the Senate Committee on Appropriations proposed to appropriate from the Treasury $76,981,873, and to provide that the 1944 unexpended balance and all receipts for 1945 and subsequent years shall be covered into the general funds of the Treasury as and when collected. The bill as it passed the Senate, however, increased the appropriation from $76,981,873 to $79,134,882.

It should be borne in mind that the bill as it passed the House appropriated no new money. It reappropriated the unexpended balance which, together with estimated receipts for the fiscal year 1945, was expected to adequately finance the House-approved program of the T. V. A. The program approved on the basis of detailed examination was estimated to require $79,134,882. This is the exact figure in the bill as it passed the Senate. The House proposes in addition to this amount to leave in the Authority's fund a balance of $8,656,298, which would be available in the event work were ordered resumed on war projects authorized by Congress but ordered stopped by the War Production Board. Chief among these are the Wautauga and South Holston Dams, which Senator McKELLAR repeatedly advocates, and an elemental phosphorous manufacturing plant at or near Mobile, Ala. It is rather remarkable that these three projects are included in those authorized by the report of Senator McKELLAR's committee and by the bill as passed by the Senate, and yet there is not included in the appropriation in the Senate bill 1 penny for the completion of these projects if the War Production Board during this fiscal year gives the go-ahead signal on these projects.

But far more important than the $8,000,000 difference between the House and Senate bills is the fact that the House bill designates the appropriation as one fund known as the Tennessee Valley Authority fund 1945, while the Senate bill leaves the appropriation in the general fund of the Treasury.

Senator McKELLAR accomplished this most important variance in the two bills by striking the words "subject to the provisions of section 26 of the T. V. A. Act of 1943." Every T. V. A. appropriation bill which has ever been made has contained this wording of the House bill. It is no new thing as contended by the Senator in his speech here 2 weeks ago.

Under the terms of the House bill as always in the past the T. V. A. Board is empowered to exercise its discretion in the expenditure of certain funds in conducting the business of distributing electric energy, etc., as provided in section 26. Under the terms of the Senate bill it is stripped of this authority.

The Board loses all flexibility of business administration. The Congress instead of the Board shall determine even where a new transmission line shall be built to a new industry in the Valley. If a new industry desires to locate here it can no longer go to the Board and ask for service and expect a definite answer. The Board will be forced to reply, "We cannot agree to serve you until Congress is asked for authority." Can we expect new industry to locate here when faced by such delay and uncertainty? If the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee is from New England, can we expect him to look with favor on new industries being located here instead of there?

Senator McKELLAR should know that he is in error in designating the $8,000,000 difference in the House and Senate bills as the T. V. A. revolving fund. It is no such thing. It is an amount set apart in reserve to continue the construction of the Watauga and South Holston Dams and the Mobile phosphorous plant if and when W. P. B. says this can be done.

How in the name of common sense does the Senator expect to reduce electric rates by taking away money appropriated for new construction. He might as well have argued that he could have reduced electric rates by failing to procure, as he said he did, an appropriation to construct Chicamauga Dam. Any businessman knows that electric rates can be reduced only by reducing operating costs and by increasing operating revenues.

But the Senator contends that no other Government agency has what he terms a revolving fund. By this I assume he means that no other Government agency can use its earnings to defray the expenses of its operation. Again the Senator is in error. We need mention only a few, the Panama Railroad Co., the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and others. All of these are Government-owned corporations just as T. V. A. is. His comparison to the Post Office Department is wholly beside the point. This department is not a corporation. It has no board of directors. It is merely a department of the Executive branch of the Government headed by a member of the President's cabinet. Incidentally, it has always been the most fruitful source of both senatorial and congressional patronage. And incidentally also, Senator McKELLAR is Chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

It is a very remarkable thing that every member of the Tennessee delegation in the House and Senator McKELLAR'S colleague from Tennessee in the Senate, oppose the adoption of his proposed amendments and that these amendments are likewise opposed by the entire Alabama delegation both in the Senate and the House. Is it possible that they are all out of step but Jim? The Senator's proposed amendments are vigorously opposed by practically all of the municipalities and co-operatives purchasing power from the Tennessee Valley Authority in this area. There has been an almost universal condemnation of his proposals by the press of the Nation in the North, the South, the East, and the West.

Mr. Alfred Mynders, the brilliant and distinguished editor of the Chattanooga Times, had a noteworthy article on the Tennessee Valley Authority in his column in the Chattanooga Times on Sunday, April 16. He accurately states that what the T. V. A. has done for the individual is that which has won Nation-wide admiration.

"The farmer is better off because he has learned how to revive his land and make it pay; the small towns have T. V. A. for health and for progress through new industries located in the valley. The average person everywhere in the valley has benefited."

He points out that while the per capita income in the rest of the Nation was increasing 56 percent between 1933 and 1940 the per capita income in the Tennessee Valley was increasing 73 percent. He calls attention to the fact that the T. V. A. has attracted not merely Nation-wide, but world-wide attention, and that there has been much discussion of a Danubian Authority on the Danube River to serve the Balkan states in the same manner that T. V. A. has served this region. And, he states, the further and more remarkable suggestion is now being discussed in England that the great problem of India can be solved by copying the Tennessee Valley Authority. It is a tragic thing that an agency such as the Tennessee Valley Authority which has meant so much to the individual happiness of the inhabitants of this region, which has contributed and is contributing so greatly to the prosecution of this war, and which is today the inspiration for similar projects throughout the world should, because of personal malice or for any other reasons, be made a political football or the subject of unseemly and perhaps disastrous political manipulation.

Tennessee has too proud a record for independence of thought and independence of action to be willing to submit to the dictates of any one man or to be willing to live under such tyranny as results from enacting into law the whims and the fancies of any individual.

The Late Joseph McDonagh

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARY T. NORTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, there are many casualties of this war outside of those serving in the armed forces. One such casualty occurred this week in the passing of a great friend of labor, Joseph McDonagh, who was well known to the Members in this House who are concerned with labor. He was formerly legislative representative of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, A. F. of L. Mr. McDonagh was a veteran of the Spanish-American War and devoted his life to the cause of the underprivileged. His contribution to progressive labor legislation was well known and appreciated not only by members of his union, but by all who believed in honesty and justice in the labor movement. Joe McDonagh died as he lived—in service to his God and to his country.

No words of mine can do justice to this man for whom I feel a great admiration and respect. The story of his life is told by Philip Pearl in a recent article in the American Federation of Labor News sheet. Under unanimous consent, I include this article as a part of my remarks:

FACING THE FACTS

(By Philip Pearl)

What makes a man devote his life to the union cause? What attraction is there in a career which takes so much out of a person yet offers such insignificant rewards in the way of fame and fortune?

These reflections spring from the news of the sudden and shocking death of a friend who made the trade-union movement his life's work, who accepted the philosophy of organized labor as his gospel—Joseph McDonagh.

McDonagh died as he had lived—in harness. He was attending a union conference in New York City and was reaching over to hand some papers to his colleague, Frank Fenton, when his heart stopped. He had no warning, no time or opportunity to utter a last word to those who will follow after him. Let his life speak as his parting message.

Joe was a little guy who went through life with his chin out. He was the kind of fighter who likes to pick out bigger and tougher opponents. He always had to battle against odds. Classrooms ended for him at an early age, but not his education. He served a thorough apprenticeship not only in his trade of electrician but as a soldier, a labor organizer, a legislative representative for his union in Congress and, finally, as secretary-treasurer of the A. F. L. metal trades department.

Perhaps Joe McDonagh's rebellion against oppression, against stupid authority, began during his service in the Spanish-American War, when he saw action in Puerto Rico. Uncle Sam didn't treat his boys in uniform too well in that war. It was then that Joe learned to hate brass hats.

A LIFETIME ENLISTMENT

Later, when peace came and Joe went back on the job, he discovered the same heartless attitude—the same cruel disregard for human life and human suffering—evinced by private employers toward their workers. What if there were industrial accidents? What if a mechanic fell from the rigging of a ship or had his fingers chopped off by a tool because proper safeguards were not provided? What if a man's energy and sap were burned out by too long hours on an intense job at too low pay? There were always others to take his place. Human life was cheap. It didn't pay to spend money to protect and conserve it, like machinery, which represented a cash investment.

This was the type of economic cruelty against which Joe rebelled and against which he waged war through his union. This was the cause in which he volunteered to serve a lifetime enlistment, and this was his victory—that by the time he left his home town of Brooklyn to assume a higher title and different duties in Washington the electrical workers of his community had won the highest conditions that laboring men anywhere in the world had ever enjoyed.

In Washington, Joe was at first regarded as something of a rough diamond. As legislative representative for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, he came into contact with Members of Congress and high-ranking Government officials who were well versed in the thousand different ways of the polite brush-off and painless double-cross. But they soon discovered that Joe had a disconcerting way of his own—a way of cutting through the double talk and getting down to facts—a way of demanding yes-or-no answers and getting them.

During the last 10 years of his life, Joe McDonagh made many enemies in high places—and also many friends. The phonies feared him, but the honest politicians trusted and respected him. Joe was a steady, plodding, legislative worker—not necessarily brilliant but always reliable and on the job. The great gains in labor legislation which the workers of America have won can be credited at least in part to the hard work done by Joe and others like him.

A PRACTICAL IDEALIST

Joe McDonagh was nearing the age of 66 when he died. To a certain extent he liked to live in the past. He loved to recount dramatic incidents of long-forgotten labor conventions and battles against tough employers. We used to sit and listen to him by the hour on slow afternoons in Bill Hushing's office in the A. F. of L. Building.

If you didn't know better, you might get the impression from his casual conversation that Joe was a confirmed griper. He enjoyed sounding off on his pet hates, especially against the professors and theorists who abound in Washington. Joe would run into them frequently at meetings of various Government advisory boards on which he represented the A. F. of L. and some of their impractical theories with regard to labor regulations got into his hair. He had no patience with people who became overnight experts on matters with which they had never had any practical experience and he loathed red tape. The brass hats in the Navy and War Departments did not overawe him nor did they delight him.

But, as we've tried to indicate before, the dominating, driving power behind Joe McDonagh was a more positive thing than mere impatience with stupid officialdom or even hate of oppression. He was that rare thing, a practical idealist—the kind of idealist who expresses himself in action rather than talk. He liked his fellowman and he worked for him. He loved his country, and he served it. He clung to the independence that freedom gives a man and he was ready at all times to fight for it. He believed with all his being in the aims and philosophy of the American Federation of Labor and he lived and died for it.

This is just the kind of piece that would have embarrassed Joe to the utmost. He was the kind that appreciated a dig more than a compliment. But the workers of America owe Joe McDonagh more than a passing sigh. May he rest in peace.

War Refugee Board

REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, when President Roosevelt recently declared how tragic it would be if the innocent victims of Hitler's fury should perish on the very eve of triumph over barbarism, the awful fate that threatens European Jewry was once more brought to the attention of the world. As the increasing military pressures on fortress Europe makes clear to the Germans the inevitability of their defeat and the frustration of their mad lusting for power and the domination of the world, the Nazi gang seems ever more determined to carry out their vicious program of slaughtering every Jew, including women and children, in the regions controlled by them. For this evil purpose they have converted Poland into a gigantic slaughterhouse. When Jews from the rest of Europe are deported there, there is no further hope for them; they are being sent to their death.

The civilized world is now uneasily and anxiously watching Hungary. What will happen as Hitler takes over the reins in Hungary to some 800,000 Jews who up to now have been comparatively secure from the Nazi blood spilling? The evil omens of impending slaughter already are commencing to appear. Registration of all Jews, compulsory wearing of the star of David, restriction to ghettos all spell out only one thing—the preliminaries to deportation to Poland and to death.

In the face of this monstrous slaughter it is vitally important that the civilized world cooperate immediately to do everything humanly possible to save these innocent victims of a brutal philosophy of power through slaughter.

The President has made an important beginning in his statement setting forth the policy of the United Nations to punish those who, directly or indirectly, participate in this inhuman persecution, and promptly supported by the prestige and power of the British Empire by Anthony Eden on the floor of the House of Commons. There will be many a functionary in Axis Europe, particularly in the satellite countries, who will hesitate to give effect to the murderous commands of the Hitlerite butchers when he sees in the not too distant future the unyielding accounting he will have to make to the victorious United Nations.

Even more important to this humanitarian task of saving the lives of the innocent victims of oppression has been the creation of the War Refugee Board by the President. For the first time in history a nation at war has established an agency devoted to the rescue of peoples of other nations in imminent danger of death, even when those people are technically enemy subjects. It makes one proud of his American heritage to witness in the creation of the War Refugee Board another illustration of our democratic and humanitarian ideals and traditions translated into action on the side of the forces of decency and progress.

We are fortunate, too, in the appointment of John W. Pehle as executive director of the War Refugee Board. Mr. Pehle, born in Minnesota and educated in the public schools of that State and her sister States of South Dakota and Nebraska, brings to the noble task of saving lives a great wealth of natural talent nourished and nurtured in the democratic and humane ideals and spirit of the Middle West. His ability to organize and to give drive to a new agency faced with novel and important wartime problems has been ably demonstrated by his excellent work as Assistant of the Secretary of the Treasury in charge of foreign funds control.

Already, after only 4 months, his work with the War Refugee Board is beginning to pay dividends in the form of human lives saved. The flow of refugees to Turkey through the Balkans, which had practically ceased prior to the creation of the Board has been greatly stimulated as a result of the efforts of the Board and Ambassador Steinhardt and Ira Hirachmann, the Board's representative for Turkey. Pressure directed against the satellite government of Romania resulted in the removal of over 40,000 Jewish refugees from concentration camps in the Dneister River region of southwestern Russia to Romania. Although these unfortunates have not been finally rescued, it is an achievement to be proud of, because God knows what terrible slaughter may have been the fate of these people, if the bitterly disillusioned and vengeful German Army, retreating before the mighty blows directed against them by the victorious Russians, had ever got their hands on them.

These results and others already achieved by the Board, under Mr. Pehle's dynamic leadership, illustrate anew the tremendous power and influence moral forces may have when translated into vigorous action. It is to the undying credit of the United States that at a time when the outlook appeared darkest for the victims of oppression, it seized the moral leadership of the civilized world by creating the War Refugee Board, thus, as always in its history, giving courage once again to the despairing and holding out to them, after years of darkness, the precious light of freedom and the hope of a better world.

Let all of us here, who treasure our American traditions of speaking out for the oppressed and offering them the sanctuary of our free institutions, assist the work of the Board by supporting its objectives, so that all the world will know that Americans are wholeheartedly united in the humanitarian task of rescuing those whom enemy brutality and terrorism threaten to annihilate.

The War Dads' Canteen at Springfield, Mo.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARION T. BENNETT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, Maj. Gen. F. E. Uhl, commanding general of the Seventh Service Command, has awarded a Citation for Meritorious Wartime Service to the War Dads' Canteen, of Springfield, Mo., for voluntary efforts and outstanding achievement within this command in behalf of the Army of the United States and its personnel. I want to add to the Army's citation the approval of Congress, for I know every Member of Congress will concur with me in such commendation when they hear the story of the War Dads' Canteen.

SOLVING LOCAL PROBLEMS LOCALLY

Sometimes, perhaps, we are prone to believe that all that must be done for the serviceman and the veteran must spring from Washington. Not so. I say that advisedly and as a member of the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee of the House of Representatives, the committee which has been responsible for the constructive efforts being made by the Federal Government for rehabilitation of veterans and for their readjustment into civilian life. Whether or not this Nation and our form of government can withstand the shock to our national economy which will be felt when millions of men are brought back into this country and begin searching for jobs will be determined not alone by Congress. It will be determined, also, by the extent to which local communities assume their share of the burden and responsibility. Alert citizens in Springfield, Mo., organized 1,000 strong in a chapter of War Dads, are alert to the situation and already are doing things which are the envy of every community in the land. The most outstanding project of the American War Dads Chapter, No. 6, is the War Dads' Canteen located in a building built by the War Dads adjoining the local railroad station at Springfield, Mo. Here the Springfield War Dads are already ministering to the needs and wants of the man in uniform. It is an interesting and unique story.

Mr. Lester E. Cox, president of the War Dads chapter in Springfield is credited with being the original spark-plug for the idea of a canteen. He is a believer in direct action. He went to St. Louis, Mo., and interviewed the president of the Frisco Railroad. Permission was granted by the Frisco to use company property for the canteen site. It is an advantageous location parallel to the railroad station, only a few feet from it, facing the tracks and bordered by a principal street of the city. Mr. Cox then obtained the pledges of 25 of his friends and other War Dads for $100 contributions toward building the canteen. This accomplished, the big fund-raising drive was turned over to another war dad, O. L. Robinett, who with War Dads I. V. Ewing and George Thompson raised the total of the voluntary subscriptions to approximately $10,000. Of this sum $8,800 was spent for the building and furnishings. Part of the labor was donated by the local unions in construction of the canteen.

After sufficient money had been raised to assure the building of the canteen, a campaign was launched for those people in the city who did not care to contribute to the construction work to make pledges for its upkeep. The pledges are for monthly contributions of $1 up. Some 300 people in Springfield, Mo., volunteered a total of approximately $1,500 per month for maintenance. This money is used to buy coffee, doughnuts and other items for the boys who visit the canteen.

SETTING RECORDS

Since the War Dads' Canteen was completed in November 1943 it has broken canteen records. It is pertinent to observe, for instance, that this War Dads' Canteen, in a small midwestern city, serves more coffee, milk, orange juice, and doughnuts than the famous Stage Door Canteen in New York City. More than 15,000 cups of coffee are served each month and doughnuts and cookies in tremendous quantities—all without cost to the man in uniform.

But this canteen is not just a place to eat, nor is it a play center. It is not possible to do justice to the canteen without seeing it. I hold in my hand some pictures of the canteen and the War Dads and the Red Cross canteen workers who have made it such a success. These pictures tell the story. The canteen is a large L-shaped building of stucco construction. A large Neon sign hangs at the door reading: "War Dads' Canteen. Servicemen Welcome." At the door, serving in shifts covering 24 hours per day, stand some War Dads to greet any serviceman who enters. Other War Dads meet each incoming train, board the train, and invite servicemen to visit the canteen. The environment provided by the canteen is a homelike environment. The canteen is beautifully furnished with new and comfortable furniture in gay but restful colors. There is a big fireplace. Radios are at hand and the latest magazines by well-placed reading lamps. Writing materials are at each desk and table. Post cards are furnished each visitor. The War Dads have a book in which visiting servicemen are invited to register. War Dads then write the parents of the visitor and tell them they have had the pleasure of serving him doughnuts and coffee, that he is well, and expressing the hope we all share that G. I. Joe will soon be able to return home in a nation at peace. Replies received from the parents are much too numerous and touching to dwell upon here. Indeed, letters of appreciation sent back to the War Dads' Canteen by servicemen who have rested and been served there are a story in themselves. These letters come from all over the world. Some of these letters are signed by scores of men, ranging from buck privates to major generals.

VOLUNTEER HELP

I want to say just a word about the Red Cross canteen ladies. A group of 100 of the leading civic-minded women of Springfield donate their services to the canteen. They have all taken a 2 weeks' course and are trained in canteen work. They donate their time to this canteen, which is operated 24 hours per day and open to everyone who wears a uniform of his country, regardless of creed, color, or rank. These Red Cross canteen ladies perform their duties neatly dressed in the distinctive uniform of their organization. The spirit of hospitality they have shown, together with their efficiency, has contributed to the fame of Springfield and the War Dads' Canteen. The whole community is back of this effort. The various churches rotate each week in having their various groups provide home-made cookies for the canteen. But this story must come to an end.

So far as I know, there is no other project exactly like the Springfield War Dads' Canteen. I hope, however, that the example will be copied in many places. It is democracy in action in a nation worth fighting for. It is a manifestation of local pride and local assumption of responsibility to which America must increasingly look in the days ahead. I take what I believe is justifiable pride in being the Representative in Congress for these progressive citizens in the Springfield War Dad's chapter, their affiliated Red Cross canteen workers, and the numerous similar groups throughout the Sixth Missouri Congressional District.

Industrialization of the Southwest and Discriminatory Freight Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL J. KILDAY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, on November 9, 1943, I delivered an address on radio station KTSA at San Antonio, Tex., in which I discussed the effect upon Texas and the Southwest of the discriminatory freight rate differential. In February 1944, a meeting was held in Dallas for the purpose of organizing the Gulf Southwest agricultural and industrial conference. This meeting had for its purpose the formulation of plans for the promotion of the industrialization of the great Southwest. At that meeting I repeated some of the observations made in my earlier radio address and observed that it is useless to discuss the industrialization of the Southwest so long as the discriminatory freight rate structure exists. Mr. H. N. Roberts, chairman of the Texas-Louisiana Freight Bureau of Dallas took issue with the statements and conclusions made by me in both the radio address and in my remarks before the conference. Under date of February 16, 1944, Mr. Roberts gave wide circulation to a letter addressed to me by him in which he sought to deny some of the statements made in my radio address. Under date of April 24, 1944, Mr. Roberts addressed a letter to those present at the meeting of the Gulf Southwest agricultural and industrial conference, taking issue with my statements to the conference and enclosing therewith a copy of his circular letter of February 16.

Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to enter into a controversy with Mr. Roberts nor any of the other paid representatives of the so-called freight bureaus, which are largely responsible for the present discriminatory system and its perpetuation. By reason of the activities of these very men, the industrialization and development of the Southwest has been retarded. So long as they are able to maintain the present system our great Southwest will be strangled. They are paid to effect that very result. However, through the years they have conducted energetic campaigns of misinformation throughout the territories in which this discrimination exists. Therefore, I am interested in bringing the true situation to the attention of our people who have been long misled by these paid representatives of the railroads. In the Transportation Act of 1940 Congress created the Board of Investigation and Research and directed that it inquire into the freight-rate structures in the United States. This is an impartial board created by Congress and charged with this official duty. I have submitted both my radio address and Mr. Roberts' letter of February 16 to members of that Board, with the request that they analyze them and report upon the merits of each. They have done so in a fair and impartial manner and have written me in detail with reference thereto. That Board has sustained every major statement made by me. It completely refutes the claims made by Mr. Roberts.

The Board makes it plain that so long as the discriminatory freight rate exists we cannot hope to industrialize the Southwest. Therefore, industrial employment will remain in the North and the East. Unless we develop our industry we cannot increase the wealth of our territory nor raise our living standards. All of our working people will be deprived of industrial employment. The railroad worker will suffer the greatest. During the war there is plenty of employment for all. When the war ends the demand will be for manufactured articles. The railroad worker of the North and the East will have an abundance of employment in transporting those articles. The railroad worker in the Southwest will find little to do. The freight-rate differential prejudices every man, woman, and child in Texas. Those who seek to maintain the present system are working contrary to the interests of all of them.

No one interested need accept my contentions nor those of Mr. Roberts. I include below the report on the situation as it is found to be by a fair and impartial instrumentality of the Federal Government:

TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1940
BOARD OF INVESTIGATION AND RESEARCH,
Washington, May 8, 1944.

Hon. PAUL J. KILDAY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN KILDAY: As requested in your letters, April 27 and May 1, I am glad to submit my comments on your radio address of November 9, and Mr. H. N. Roberts' criticism of February 16, with regard to Texas freight rates.

Your statement is correct that Texas shippers pay more per mile to ship their fabricated articles to market than eastern manufacturers pay to get to the same markets. Despite an occasional exception to this rule, the freight rate advantages enjoyed by eastern manufacturers in shipping their products are very substantial. On the whole, the freight rate disadvantages on products manufactured in Texas and shipped to the north and east are restrictive of the growth of manufacturing in Texas and favorable to the continued development of manufacturing in the northeastern section of the United States, rather than in the south and west.

The terms used to describe freight rates are sometimes confusing to the layman, and before proceeding further, I shall attempt to define them. For rate-making purposes, the railroads divide the different kinds of freight into groups or classes. These classes are designated by numbers, as first class, second class, third class, etc., or sometimes by letters, as class A, class B, etc. Rates are then published on each of these classes. The rates so published are called class rates. It is customary, in discussing class rates, to use the first-class rate for illustration, because the rates on all of the other classes are certain fixed percentages of the first-class rates; therefore, a comparison of first-class rates is sufficient to show the general relationship of all the classes, although only a very small proportion of the freight is actually charged the first-class rate.

Class rates are published on practically all articles of freight between all parts of the United States. They are generally uniform, or closely related, on a mileage basis, within each of the rate territories, but the levels vary widely in one territory compared with another, and from a point in one territory to a point in another. Between two given points, however, the rates are the same in both directions; that is, from San Antonio to New York, for example, the rate would be the same as from New York to San Antonio. But from any point in the South or Southwest to any point in eastern territory the rate is much higher than the rate on the same kind of freight for a haul of the same length within eastern territory. For example, the first-class rate from San Antonio to St. Louis, Mo., is $2.79 per hundred pounds. The distance from San Antonio to St. Louis (925 miles) is about 125 miles shorter than the distance from New York to St. Louis (1,053 miles). The first-class rate from New York to St. Louis, however, is $1.84 per hundred pounds, or 95 cents per hundred pounds cheaper than the rate for the shorter distance from San Antonio to St. Louis. This is typical of the average class-rate levels from the Southwest to the North and East, as compared with eastern class-rate levels. On the whole, the southwestern first-class rates are 61 percent higher than the eastern first-class rates. (For more detailed comparisons, see the Board's report on Interterritorial Freight Rates, H. Doc. No. 303, 78th Cong., 1st sess., p. 91 and preceding.)

The railroads also publish, on commodities moving in heavy volume, particularly on raw materials and a relatively few staple manufactures, specific rates which are lower than the class rates. These are called commodity rates, or exceptions to the classification. These rates are sometimes published generally throughout an area, sometimes only between specific points. Whenever commodity rates or exceptions are published, they take precedence over the higher-class rates. Sometimes these rates are very much lower than the class rates. They are fixed at whatever levels the railroads consider necessary to meet commercial and competitive conditions or to comply with orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission—or, on intrastate traffic, the State railway commissions. Commodity rates and exceptions frequently bear some mathematical relationship to the class rates, but many of them are entirely unrelated. Because of the wide variance in levels of commodity rates within and between each territory, it is possible to pick out some particular commodity rate in any territory which is higher, or another which is lower, than the rates on the same commodity for a like distance in another territory. Such comparisons can be, and frequently are, confusing rather than enlightening. There is not much value in comparing, for example, a carload commodity rate on cotton in bales between points in Texas, where the movement is very heavy, with the rate on cotton for a like distance between two points in the North, where there is no such movement.

The controversy over northern versus southern freight rates centers around the class rates, because these rates, or rates closely related thereto, apply on all less-than-carload freight and on the great majority of manufactured articles moving even in carloads. "Commodity rates" lower than the class-rate levels are published only on a relatively few manufactured articles, moving in heavy volume, where stresses of competition or other peculiar conditions have forced reductions from the class-rate levels. The smaller and newer manufacturers, especially if they are located in areas not highly industrialized, are generally forced to pay class rates on the finished articles they ship, while an old-established competitor in some other area may have been able to get a lower commodity rate. It is vitally important, therefore, for the encouragement and maintenance of manufacturing industry, particularly in the newer and smaller localities, that class-rate levels and relationships be fair and reasonable. High class-rate levels in the South and West, as compared with the lower levels of the North and East, unquestionably retard the development of miscellaneous manufacturing industries in the South and West, and restrict the markets of southern and western manufacturers who wish to sell their products in the North and East in competition with eastern manufacturers.

Defenders of the present freight-rate structure contend that the high class rates of the South and West, on which comparatively little freight moves, are offset by low commodity rates on the freight which moves in heavy volume, and that a reduction in the class rates would require an increase in the low commodity rates, which would injure the producers of the South and West, whose freight moves on commodity rates. It is true that comparatively little freight moves in the South and West on class rates. This is not surprising, because the rates are so high as to practically prohibit any movement in large volume. However, it is not true that, if the southern class rates were reduced to the levels of the eastern class rates, drastic increases in the commodity rates of the South would be necessary. It is possible that the increased volume of freight which would move on lower class rates would yield the railroads more revenue and greater net returns than the present rates. Even if this were not so, the studies of the Board of Investigation and Research show that economies can be made in loading, routing, and handling of freight which would more than compensate for any reductions in class rates, and in fact offer promise of lowering rate levels generally.

It is also argued that, for more than a decade, the South and West have been making greater progress in the development of manufacturing industries than has the East, and this is offered as proof that freight rates are not retarding the industrial development of the South and West. These arguments are generally based on percentage comparisons of growth, or loss, of wage earners or value of manufactured products in 1939, as compared with 1929 or 1919. The figures for the East show some recessions in 1939, when the country was coming out of depression, as compared with the boom years of 1929 and 1919; whereas in the South manufacturing had made so little headway that the boom years had comparatively little effect, and 1939 shows some increases. Such comparisons are of little value because they fail to take into account the tremendously greater volume of manufacturing in the East than in the South and West, and also the fact that such increases in manufacturing as have occurred in the South and West have been in a comparatively few lines of industry and have not been general and widely diffused.

A better idea of the progress of manufacturing in the East, as compared with the South and West, can be gained by tracing the growth in the forty-odd years of the present century, during which the United States changed from a predominantly rural and agricultural to a predominantly urban and industrial nation. In the 40 years, 1899 to 1939, the value of manufactured products in the Eastern States increased from $9,032,000,000 to $41,143,000,000, an increase of $32,000,000,000. In the same period the manufacturing wage earners in the East increased from 3,750,000 to 5,793,000, an increase of more than 2,000,000. In the 5 Southwestern States (Louisiana, Arkansas, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Texas), from 1899 to 1939, the value of manufactured products increased from $256,000,000 to $2,593,000,000, and the manufacturing wage earners increased from 115,878 to 265,446. The growth of southwestern manufacturing, in dollars, was only 2,500,000,000, compared with 32,000,000,000 in the East, and in wage earners only 150,000, compared with 2,000,000 in the East.

The States above named, comprising the southwestern rate territory, occupy an area (18 percent of the United States) slightly larger than the States comprising eastern, or official, rate territory (15 percent of the United States). So far as location and natural resources are concerned, the South is unusually blessed and, in no sense, inferior to any other region of the United States. It has a healthful climate, energetic people, cheap water transportation, along its seacoast and the Mississippi River, vast agricultural, forest, and mineral producing capacity. With these assets, the southwest should be able to attract and sustain a much larger population and much larger and more diversified industrial activities than it has attained. Inequalities in freight rates, which retard manufacturing development, have no justification in the southwest, or anywhere else, in our national rate structure. Removal of such inequalities will be beneficial to the carriers and to the general public; they will advance the growth and prosperity not only of the South and West, but of the whole Nation.

Mr. Roberts lists in his letter to you, February 16, certain commodities on which he says "the freight rates in Texas are considerably lower than the rates in official territory." He admits, however, that "the average first-class rate in Texas is 51 percent more than the average first-class rate in the official groups." I doubt whether any extended discussion of these so-called averages would be helpful. Whether Mr. Roberts' averages are mathematically correct or not would depend upon what rates he has selected as freight rates in Texas, and to a considerable degree, upon what freight rates he picked as representative of rates in official territory. Furthermore, the commodities he mentions comprise only a small proportion of the entire Texas traffic. The Board of Investigation and Research has made a study of relative rate levels in the various rate territories, based upon the volume of traffic moving in 1939. These studies indicate that, on numerous commodities listed by Mr. Roberts as taking lower rates in Texas than in official territory, the general rate level actually is higher in the Southwest than the level in official territory. There are other commodities, however, in which the southwestern level is lower than the official territory level. Our studies indicate that, on the whole, the weighted average rate level of the Southwest is about the same as in the East—not more than 2 or 3 percent higher—and the cost of transporting freight is no higher, per hundred pounds or per ton per mile, than the average cost in the East. All this makes it perfectly clear, it seems to me, that there is no possible excuse for the maintenance of class rates in the southwest, or from the southwest to the East, on the present levels, which Mr. Roberts admits are more than 50 percent higher than the eastern class-rate level.

One other point mentioned in your radio address which has been challenged by Mr. Roberts is in regard to the fixing of rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the State commissions, and the rate committees of the railroads. The fact is that the class rates in all of the rate territories (except a part of the mountain Pacific area) have been fixed at their present levels by the Interstate Commerce Commission, based on rates formerly established by the railroads. In fixing the rates the Commission did not have before it the facts necessary to determine whether the varying levels in the different territories were unjustly prejudicial or discriminatory against one section and favorable to another. For the past 5 years the Commission has been conducting an investigation to determine whether the rates in the several territories should be harmonized. After decision is reached in this case some readjustments may be ordered to equalize present differences. It is the opinion of the Board of Investigation and Research, however, that additional legislation will be necessary before complete relief can be expected.

It is true, as stated in your radio address, that most tariffs filed by the railroads with the Commission take effect in 30 days, without being examined in detail by the Commission. However, the majority of these rates are in compliance with or in harmony with Commission orders. It is also true, as Mr. Roberts states, that railroad committees hold hearings and give interested shippers an opportunity to present their views before the railroads make any voluntary changes in their tariffs; and if shippers are not satisfied with the rates published, they have the right to file protests with the Commission and ask for suspension and hearing. Sometimes such requests for suspension are granted and sometimes they are denied. However, the prosecution of such matters before the Commission is a complicated and expensive process, which many shippers and communities, especially the smaller ones, are poorly equipped to undertake. The rates which are voluntarily established by the railroads are generally agreed to by majority vote of the roads, members of the rate committees, and are usually unanimously accepted by the railroads. As Mr. Roberts says, each railroad retains the right to publish its own individual rates independently of the rates fixed by the rate committee, but this right of independent action is seldom exercised, and there are many practical reasons which make it necessary for the railroads, as a rule, to conform to the rates established by the committees.

I hope this clears up the points about which you inquire. If any other information is desired which I may be able to give you, please let me know. I think it is fair to say that although your radio address was subject to criticism as to certain technical matters, there can be no question raised against the accuracy of your main point—that the high levels of class rates applying on manufactured products of Texas and other Southern and Western States are injurious to the industrial and general development of the South and West and are not justified by differences in transportation costs or other transportation or economic considerations.

Yours very truly,

C. E. CHILDE.

The St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Benefits to Farm Homes and the Nation From Post-war Construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project," delivered by Mr. Fred J. Freestone at Watertown, N. Y., Friday evening, May 5, 1944, under the auspices of the Watertown Building and Construction Trades Council, attended by representatives of the Grange, chambers of commerce, mayors, and civic bodies of New York State.

Mr. Freestone is a past master of the New York State Grange, and was chairman of the executive committee of the National Grange from 1930 to 1942. He is now president of the National Seaway Council, vice chairman of the Power Authority of the State of New York, and president of the National Grange Liability Co., with headquarters at Syracuse, New York.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a great pleasure to me to visit Watertown again and to participate in this meeting. You of the north country not only possess one of the greatest natural resources of the world, in other respects also you have been fortunate. For out of this community have come many leaders in industry and commerce, in the public service, and in the professions. We who had the privilege of serving with Delos M. Cosgrove, the first Vice Chairman of the Power Authority, delight to visit his home city. We revere in him the memory of one who by his rugged strength and keen vision helped greatly to advance the St. Lawrence project for the benefit of all mankind.

I have a message to present this evening from the master of the National Grange, Albert S. Goss. In his message Master Goss states the position of the oldest farm organization in the United States, with more than 1,000,000 members, on the St. Lawrence seaway and power project and the Aiken bill. It is a pleasure to present this message in the presence of the author of the pending legislation, himself for many years an active member of the Grange.

On April 20, 1944, Master Goss wrote me from National Grange headquarters at Washington:

"Whether the St. Lawrence seaway development would rate as a war project or whether its completion would have to await the cessation of hostilities, the Grange favors its completion as soon as practicable in the light of war conditions.

"The National Grange passed the following resolution with reference to the St. Lawrence seaway development, seventy-seventh annual session, November 10–18, 1943, Grand Rapids, Mich.:

" 'Whereas the National Grange has for years advocated the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway, nearly 90 percent of which is already completed, and opening this wonderful artery of commerce to carry the products of the interior of our country to the markets of the world at reduced costs; and

" 'Whereas the completion of this project would permit the development of vast electrical energy, now going to waste in the onrushing waters of this mighty river, resulting in cheaper electric power to all our people; and

" 'Whereas there is legislation now pending in Congress to bring this project to completion as soon as material and labor are available: Therefore be it

" 'Resolved, That the National Grange reaffirms its position favoring completion of this project for navigation and power purposes.' "

I may state that the substance of this resolution quoted in the letter of Master Goss has been incorporated in the National Grange's platform for 1944 and has been presented in printed form to the Members of the House and the Senate at the present session of the Seventy-eighth Congress.' "

You will recall that extensive public hearings were held in the last Congress on a bill to authorize the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, after which the Committee on Rivers and Harbors approved the proposed legislation by a 2 to 1 nonpartisan vote. That bill, offered in the House by Chairman MANSFIELD of Texas and subsequently by the late Representative Culkin, of New York, Representative PITTENGER, of Minnesota, and others, was identical in terms with the bill introduced in the Senate by Senator AIKEN. At the 1941 hearings, the then master of the New York State Grange and the master of the National Grange joined in recommending authorization of the St. Lawrence development. That action was urged by the leaders of the Grange on broad national grounds as well as on behalf of more than 132,000 Grange members in farm homes in the State of New York.

At times we forget that New York is one of the principal farm States of the Union, ranking sixth in the value of its farm production and sharing with a few other Great Lakes areas leadership in dairy farming. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system thus forms a natural highway for the richest farm-producing area in the world, and its improvement is just as vital to agriculture in the East as in the West.

The seaway and power development authorized by the pending bill will be of immense advantage to producers and consumers in every section of our country. Any project that helps to create low-cost transportation and low-cost power will bring benefits that are general in character and not confined to any one section or locality.

The same navigation works which will be erected under this bill to give more than a dozen States on or near the Great Lakes access to the sea, will enable our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coastal areas to increase their intercoastal shipping in American bottoms and widen their market for products which cannot now be moved profitably by rail. The use of St. Lawrence power to raise the consumption of electricity at low rates, to extend rural electrification, and to lower the costs of production both in agriculture and manufactures, will be reflected in benefits to communities far removed from the site of the project. As in the case of the great projects on the Tennessee, the Colorado, and the Columbia Rivers, the advantage of low-cost power from the St. Lawrence will contribute to the economic and social well-being of the people of the entire Nation.

The security of this country rests today upon our possession of rich natural resources and upon our ability to utilize these resources in producing and transporting both agricultural and manufactured goods. The self-preservation of this country and its continued existence as a powerful and prosperous nation will depend, in the years that follow the present World War, upon the use we make of these resources.

At a time when we are enlisting the manpower of the Nation 11,000,000 strong for service on the battle fronts of the world, we cannot permit private interests to obstruct the use of resources which will always be valuable assets, both for defense and for the peacetime needs of our people.

In the pending bill Congress has an opportunity to provide the machinery by which the State of New York, after safeguarding this resource from private exploitation, may cooperate effectively with the Federal Government to remove the last major barrier to the completion of the seaway, at the same time utilizing St. Lawrence power exclusively for the benefit of the public.

From the earliest times this great natural waterway has played its part in the growth and progress of our country. It was through the St. Lawrence River and the Great Lakes that the tide of settlement moved westward into the interior of the continent. Chicago, Duluth, Milwaukee, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, and other great cities sprang up on the lakes and, because of access to cheap water transportation, became centers for the manufacture of steel, automobiles, farm machinery, and other industries. The first grange in the United States met in Chautauqua County, N. Y., on the shores of Lake Erie, in 1868. In the following year the first State grange was organized in Minnesota at the headquarters of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system.

More than 80 years ago, Abraham Lincoln foretold the growth of the Great Lakes region and warned against the danger of cutting it off, either by physical or artificial barriers, from any of its available routes to the sea. In his second annual message to Congress, Lincoln said:

"The great interior region, bounded east by the Alleghenies, north by the British Dominions, west by the Rocky Mountains, and south by the line along which the culture of corn and cotton meets * * * already has above 10,000,000 people, and will have 50,000,000 within 50 years, if not prevented by any political folly or mistake * * * A glance at the map shows that, territorially speaking, it is the great body of the Republic. * * * In the production of provisions, grains, grasses, and all which proceeds from them, this great interior region is naturally one of the most important in the world. * * * And yet this region has no seacoast, touches no ocean anywhere.

"Outlets, east, west, and south are indispensable to the wellbeing of the people inhabiting, and to inhabit, this vast interior region. Which of the three may be the best, is no proper question. All are better than either; and all of right belong to that people and their successors forever."

The United States and Canada have developed the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River to a point where it is now possible by removing the last remaining barriers to give the great interior region direct access to the sea, to the ports of our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, and to the markets of the world.

The pending bill simply modernizes an existing deep waterway, just as the harbors of our seacoasts have been progressively deepened over the years to keep pace with the enormous growth in size of oceangoing vessels.

Billions in public funds have been expended to create our existing transport facilities, not to serve a few narrow interests in local ports but for the general welfare. All sections of the United States and the whole people are the proper beneficiaries of any sound program to improve our system of transport by rail, highway, inland waterway, and harbor channel. It is in this spirit that we hail the action taken by Senator AIKEN to provide for the modernization of the St. Lawrence project and that we renew our support of the constructive measures he has introduced in the United States Senate.

Mexicans in the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, several days ago there appeared in the Washington Post, in the column by Mr. Selden Menefee entitled "America at War," an article with reference to Mexicans in the war. The article by Mr. Menefee is most interesting and generally accurate. I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEXICANS IN THE WAR

(By Selden Menefee)

One of the weak spots in our war effort is our failure to rally the Nation's second largest racial minority, the Mexican-Americans, to participate more actively on the home front.

The Mexicans are doing their full share of the fighting—250,000 of them, out of a total population of 2,000,000 being in the armed services at last reports. They have proved to be among the best of our combat troops.

San Antonio, with a population not much over 300,000, one-third of them Mexicans, has furnished some 51,000 troops. About 1,400 San Antonians have been listed as killed, wounded, or missing, nearly half of these being of Spanish-American or Mexican stock.

The first Army private to get a Congressional Medal of Honor in this war was a Mexican lad from Colorado named Jose Martines. His outfit was storming a height leading to Chichagof Harbor in the battle of Attu. The Japanese were well entrenched, and it looked like a suicide mission.

The commanding officer gave the order to advance. No one moved. The order was repeated. One man stepped forward—Martines. He started up the slope, and others followed, cleaning up machine-gun nests as they went. Martines ran out of ammunition and was killed. But the way was opened.

BAD HOME MORALE

The fighting war is very close to most Mexican-American families, for nearly all of them have one or two sons in the armed forces. Nevertheless, here at home a bad morale problem has developed among the Mexicans, and little is being done to overcome it.

Los Angeles, with its 250,000 Mexicans, has been called the second largest Mexican city in the world, being topped only by Mexico City. Ever since the so-called zoot-suit riot of last year resentment has been simmering just below the surface in the Mexican community.

The Mexicans of Los Angeles feel alone, tolerated but not accepted by the American community. Many war plants will not hire them, and little has been done to draw them into community activities in support of the war. The Mexican is proud, and this enforced isolation causes bitterness.

The Sinarquist movement with its totalitarian philosophy, has attempted to take advantage of this situation. Its propaganda appeals to the racial and national pride of the Mexicans. Its failure to win widespread support on this side of the border is surprising to those who know what the Mexican is up against.

One barrier to assimilation of the Mexicans is their tendency to retain Spanish as their first language. In the 1940 census 7 percent of all Californians and 13 percent of the Texans named Spanish as their mother tongue.

In part this is because the Mexicans are relatively recent immigrants, in part because they are segregated in their own sections of town in the southwest, where most of them live. In any case it makes the job of reaching them with news about the war difficult, though doubly necessary.

GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Our Government agencies have failed to meet this challenge. For a time O. W. I. had a Mexican-American editor from Los Angeles, Ignacio Lopez, writing broadcasts and news releases. He did an excellent job, from the reports I heard in Los Angeles.

But because of congressional sniping and slashing at O. W. I.'s domestic appropriation, that has gone by the board. For the past 5 months no Mexican has been on the staff of O. W. I.'s Foreign Language Division.

The agency puts out three 4½-minute radio shows a week to stations featuring Spanish-language broadcasts, but these are written in English and translated, and they fail to use the Mexican idiom. Occasional press releases issued to the 144 Spanish-language publications in this country are not much better.

The Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs has opened inter-American centers in Los Angeles, Chicago, and other cities, but their chief aim seems to be to develop an interest among American businessmen in post-war trade with Latin America. They do not reach the Mexican people.

One thing that is needed is to bring the war closer to the Mexicans. They do not have to be sold on the war itself, but only on their stake in it. They need to be encouraged to develop pride in the racial and national background, and in the contributions they have already begun to make in America.

They also badly need war information of the most rudimentary sort. In the absence of an adequate Spanish-language radio and press service in O. W. I., O. P. A. officials have had an increasingly difficult time explaining to the Mexicans the ins and outs of rationing. Mexican women with husbands in the Army frequently become Red Cross charity cases because they, or their husbands, do not understand the allotment system.

The Mexican wants to feel less like the forgotten man and more like an American. That is a modest enough wish, and deserves to be satisfied.

The Late Moina Michael, Founder of Poppy Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. RUSSELL

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, on Wednesday morning Miss Moina Michael, a distinguished citizen of my State, who is known throughout the world as the originator of Poppy Day, which has been the means of raising millions of dollars for the rehabilitation and support of veterans of the First World War, passed to her reward. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a brief article from the New York Times in regard to Miss Michael's life and work.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOINA MICHAEL, 74, FOUNDED POPPY DAY—ORIGINATOR OF IDEA THAT RAISED MILLIONS FOR WAR VETERANS DIES IN GEORGIA HOSPITAL

ATHENS, GA., May 10.—Miss Moina Michael, who originated Poppy Day in 1918 as a memorial to the war dead, died in a hospital here early today after an illness of several months. Her age was 74.

Known as the Poppy Lady, she also originated the annual memorial to soldiers and sailors who died at sea in the First World War, each year making a 7-foot anchor of poppies and setting it adrift at Savannah, Ga., until 1930. Thereafter the anchors were launched by naval authorities at Annapolis.

President Roosevelt told Miss Michael in 1938: "I know all about you. You started a wonderful work."

MEMBER OF GEORGIA FACULTY

Miss Michael was a member of the University of Georgia faculty for more than 25 years. Georgia paid tribute to her work in 1937 by unveiling a marble statue of her in the State Capitol.

She carried the Poppy Day idea to the American Legion, which sponsored it in August 1920. The British Legion adopted it in 1921.

Miss Michael spent her time since Christmas in a hospital room fashioning the poppy anchor which will be launched at the Naval Academy on Memorial Day.

With hands that were stiff and aching from neuritis she finished the last of the 300 paper poppies 2 weeks ago. Sitting in a wheel chair as she worked, she remarked:

"This may be my last poppy anchor."

INSPIRATION FROM WAR POEM

Miss Michael set November 9, 1918, as the birth date of the Flanders Field memorial poppy idea. Col. John McCrae's poem, "In Flanders Field," provided much of the inspiration, she said.

Poppies are now worn on Memorial Day in all States of the Union, in Great Britain, and 53 other foreign countries.

Profits from their sale in the British Empire from 1921 to 1940 were approximately $50,000,000. Miss Michael estimated that total profits throughout the world have been $125,000,000, all used for the rehabilitation of veterans or for the care of their dependents.

The idea brought no gain to Miss Michael.

FORMER Y. W. C. A. OFFICIAL

Born in Good Hope, Ga., the daughter of John Marion and Alice Sherwood Wise Michael, Miss Michael studied at Teachers College in Athens, Ga., and Columbia University.

She taught in the Georgia public schools and had been social director of Winnie Davis Hall and general secretary of the Y. W. C. A. at Georgia State Teachers College. She was president from 1915 to 1920 of the Georgia Council of Deans of Women and Social Directors of Schools and Colleges of Georgia. During the First World War she served with the Y. W. C. A., overseas headquarters.

Miss Michael received the American Legion Auxiliary's distinguished-service medal in 1930, the distinguished-citizen citation of the Georgia Legislature in 1931, and was nominated for the Woodrow Wilson Foundation Award in 1934.

She was a member of the Bicentennial Commission of Georgia in 1933, the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Daughters of the Confederacy, the advisory committee on women's participation in the New York World's Fair, and an honorary member of the Spanish-American War Veterans' Auxiliary.

Miss Michael was the author of a poem, "We Shall Keep the Faith."

British Air Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OWEN BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article on British air policy appearing in today's New York Times, together with the attached statements, one of which is a special radio message from London on the air situation, and the other of which is from Ottawa. The entire article is to be included.

There being no objection, the article and attached statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH AIR POLICY IN LINE WITH OURS—BEAVERBROOK ANNOUNCES SHIFT FROM CANADA'S WORLD RULE PLAN TO "FOUR FREEDOMS" IDEA

LONDON, May 10.—Great Britain reluctantly has abandoned a Canada-backed post-war plan for central international control of civil aviation and has turned toward the American-sponsored idea of a "four freedoms" of the air, Lord Beaverbrook announced in the House of Lords today.

Lord Beaverbrook, Lord Privy Seal and charged by Prime Minister Churchill to form a post-war aviation program for the British Empire, said Britain had at first favored the Canadian plan, with its system of allocated quotas, but had turned to the American plan following United States opposition to the Canadian proposal.

The American plan to curtail competition by fixing standards and rates, Lord Beaverbook said, was based more along the lines of the "four freedoms" of the air—the right to fly, to land, to set down passengers, mail, and cargo, and to pick them up anywhere in the world.

Lord Beaverbrook said the British delegation went into the conference here recently with Adolf A. Berle, Jr., United States Assistant Secretary of State, favoring what is known as the Canadian draft convention which "laid down a detailed plan for an internation regulating authority of frequencies of air service and national quotas for international air traffic."

TOO RIGID FOR AMERICANS

"This program," he continued, "was considered by the Americans as too rigid as a basis for talks at the proposed international conference."

This conference will be held later this year, probably at Washington.

"The broad purpose," Lord Beaverbrook explained, "will be to draw up an international convention on air navigation to be supplemented by an international transport organization which would evolve standards, seek to eliminate uneconomic competition, work out for each nation a network of participation in world transport, and maintain a broad equilibrium between air transport capacity and transport offerings.

"On these general principles, the United States and Great Britain are in agreement. The powers of enforcement will be open to further discussion."

Noting that President Roosevelt had proposed for the future the right of innocent passage for all nations and the right to land anywhere, Lord Beaverbrook said he was authorized by Mr. Churchill to say:

"We are joined with Mr. Roosevelt to the fullest extent in subscribing to these principles."

Amid cheers, Lord Beaverbrook declared that the United States was prepared to make long-range aircraft available to Great Britain on a nondiscriminatory basis for civil aviation during the post-war period of adjustment of British plane production.

NEW TYPES OF CRAFT DESIGNED

He said he was able to give such assurance on the authority of Mr. Berle. But Britain, he emphasized, was not content to rest alone on the United States supply and everything possible would be done to provide Britain with her own passenger and commercial planes.

"We must admit," he said, "that the United States has a long lead over us in air transport, but we have a number of excellent designs for new types."

The arrangement by which the United States agreed to construct bombers while Great Britain comcentrated on fighters was "an admirable division of responsibility for war purposes," Lord Beaverbrook added, but it "plainly conferred on the United States advantages in post-war manufacture for the civil aviation market."

Outside Parliament Lord Knollys, chairman of the British Overseas Airways Corporation, told a meeting of the Royal Empire Society that the United States Air Transport Command had been flying planes from San Francisco to Australia by way of Honolulu in "well under 48 hours."

"CHOSEN-INSTRUMENT" STATUS

LONDON, May 10.—In answer to a question in the House of Lords today as to the status of the chosen-instrument policy by which the British Government now controls and operates air lines, Lord Beaverbrook replied:

"It is just as it was. It is fixed by statute and until Parliament decides to repeal the statute then the chosen instrument is just as it used to be."

Discussing British types of big commercial planes, Lord Beaverbrook said that the Shetland flying boat, first mentioned last month in an Australian areonautical magazine but the details of which were withheld here, will soon be ready for its first flight.

Built by Short Bros. and Saunder-Roe, the Shetland is a 100-ton craft powered by four Centurus engines. It can carry 50 to 100 passengers, depending upon length of hop and it has a range of 3,000 miles and a cruising speed of about 275 miles an hour.

CANADA TO ATTEND PARLEY

OTTAWA, May 10.—Canada probably will participate in a further post-war civil aviation conference along with the United Kingdom, the United States, and perhaps other countries, in spite of the rejection of a Canadian plan for fixed control, national quotas, and a central international enforcement authority, it was learned today.

Munitions Minister C. D. Howe, Canadian representative at recent conferences on post-war civil aviation, said he had no immediate comment to make on Lord Beaverbrook's statement.

Disposal of Surplus Materials

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following letter, which discusses the very vital matter of disposal of surplus materials by the Government:

FORT WAYNE, IND., May 8, 1944.

Congressman GEORGE W. GILLIE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GILLIE: The time has come when we must give serious thought to the matter of surplus material accumulated by the Government in their various depots. As you know, this is a mobile war and our industry is vitally affected. It has been reported from reliable sources that the Government is now gradually disposing of these surplus stocks. For the interest and the preservation of our business, and for the security of employment and our economic system in the post-war era, it is imperative that we act now—together—so that proper legislation is passed for the protection of our established channels of trade so that no price wrecking speculators, who are now maneuvering to get control of this material, may have the opportunity to wreck our market.

If we permit this surplus material to be dumped on the open market it will definitely affect our economic system and send prices downward to the point that it would be impossible for any manufacturer to continue the sale of his merchandise on a reasonable profitable basis and this would prohibit the function of the automotive distributors until such time that the market has absorbed all this surplus material.

There are two thoughts on this matter: How shall we act with regard to the movement of the surplus material now during the prosecution of the war; and what shall be done with the material after the day of victory.

We have given considerable thought to this matter and our suggestions for action at present to Congress is—

1. The surplus automotive material which is accumulated at the various depots should first be used in he various governmenal agencies, such as Army, Navy, Air Corps, etc.

2. After the various agencies have taken all the material they require, the surplus should then be offered to contractors working on Government contracts who may be in a position to use this material and would be in the market for such a product. We would also like to point out that by offering this material to these contractors we would be saving the raw material necessary to produce these same products.

3. Then, the manufacturer of the product should be given an opportunity to purchase back his material for distribution through his regular wholesale channels of trade.

4. Last, that this material be offered to wholesale distributors at established market prices.

The disposal of surplus material in the post-war era is a gigantic problem. We believe that a certain quantity of this material can be disposed of to the various countries overseas, for they will have a need of equipment to furnish their standing armies. We, likewise, will also require a certain portion for our armed forces. The remaining portion of marketable products should be offered for sale through regular established channels of trade until such time as the reconversion of industry commences.

Yours truly,

WILLIAM C. KORTE, Secretary.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH MRUK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. MRUK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a pamphlet published by the Buffalo Chamber of Commerce on the St. Lawrence seaway:

THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—THAT HUGE BEHEMOTH!

The Buffalo Chamber of Commerce has long opposed the St. Lawrence seaway project. It has persistently, each time the need arose, presented its conclusions to congressional committees, to businessmen, and to the public, and it will continue to do so until this ugly behemoth of Federal politics is killed for all time.

Periodically, for half a century, the St. Lawrence seaway project has been revived. The issue met defeat in Congress twice in the last decade and the arguments in its favor are less convincing now than on those occasions. The fact that this Nation at the moment is devoting all of its energies and attention to the prosecution of the toughest war the world has ever seen does not prevent the politicians again from leading out their sacred cow. By the widest possible stretch of the imagination it again appears as a project "in the interests of national defense" in the bill (S. 1385) introduced by Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN, of Vermont.

The Vermont Legislature, within recent weeks, completely repudiated Senator AIKEN'S proposal in a resolution passed with the thumping vote of 123 to 69. It is perfectly clear that Senator AIKEN'S bill which, for some reason, again endangers States' rights, is not wanted even in his own State.

In view of the military necessities in the utilization of time, of men, of materials, and of money, it first of all seems impossible today to justify the Aiken bill proposed, as it says, "in the interests of national defense and for other purposes." The Aiken bill states that "the work allocated for construction by the United States under said agreement (with Canada) and be undertaken immediately under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers * * *" It would seem, at the moment, that the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers are, or should be, quite fully occupied with the prosecution of the war without being charged with the responsibility of directing the United States in a billion-dollar project.

Two years ago the Buffalo Chamber of Commerce insisted that the St. Lawrence project would be costly in money, men, transport, and materials. Most of all, that it would be a prodigious and profligate misdirection of important critical materials when they are badly needed elsewhere now. This situation, true as it was 2 years ago, is infinitely more true today.

At a time when the War Manpower Commission and the Selective Service organization are desperately scraping the manpower barrel of the country and urging the employment of more thousands of women in industry in order to provide the necessary war materials, it seems more than ever the height of folly to think of constructing the St. Lawrence seaway, which at this time would divert tens of thousands of men from the war effort to a construction project of doubtful or no value.

The issue of national defense is an overworked argument. Just what beneficial effect the seaway would have had, either in the last war or this one, is exceedingly obscure. There was not enough ocean shipping available in either war to waste it in the long transit through the St. Lawrence into the Lakes. Quick turn-arounds and efficient concentration of ocean shipping were imperative and the long journey into the Lakes would have been a profligate waste.

Experience has shown the wisdom of concentrating ocean shipping at our salt-water ports and funneling the necessary war materials into those channels by the expeditious use of our flexible inland transportation agencies.

The St. Lawrence seaway, either in war or peace, is bound to prove uneconomic and unsound.

POST-WAR

A recent statement credited to Secretary of State Cordell Hull that the Aiken bill should be enacted now authorizing this undertaking in the post-war period is a plain indication that the proponents have abandoned their main argument that the seaway and power development is a war necessity.

Does this statement by Secretary Hull forecast an attempt at a national policy of make-work projects for the days after the war? Is this the beginning of a program of paternalistic national spending on the assumption that a depression is inevitable after the war? If this to be a continuous policy, it may well lead to national bankruptcy.

Can it be that the present urgency to enact this bill as a post-war measure lies partly in the muted attitude of our northern neighbor and that to postpone action until after the war would revive opposition from that quarter?

SEAWAY

The ship canal, according to proponents of the St. Lawrence project, will make possible commerce between oceangoing ships and the Great Lakes. Engineers say the St. Lawrence Seaway will be open for navigation as little as 56 percent of the year. This is based upon navigation experience in existing channels over a period of 20 years.

Shipping interests have opposed the St. Lawrence project on the grounds that it presents serious navigation problems and is economically unsound in principle. Oceangoing ships would, of course, require special pilots for the channels and navigation for those used to the wide-open spaces of the open sea would be slow, hazardous, and difficult. Most ocean freighters could not operate under full draft. They would find it necessary to operate light and not at full efficiency, or not operate at all. Operation through the channel would be slow, even when navigable, and the highly-organized traffic in Great Lakes grain, ore, and coal would be seriously disrupted, affecting the business of Great Lakes ports and putting out of work large numbers of workers.

Oceangoing vessels are not adaptable to efficient operation in canals or relatively restricted navigation areas such as would be provided in the St. Lawrence Seaway. Eighty percent of the hull space of Great Lakes freighters are devoted to cargo while it is generally true that in oceangoing vessels only 33⅓ percent may be devoted to cargo. Experience has proved that navigation on the Great Lakes and through relatively narrow channels, as well as the particular cargo requirements in the Great Lakes carrying trade, makes the operation of the ocean freighter economically unsound and relatively impractical in this trade.

DOMESTIC COMMERCE

If the United States desires to play Santa Claus to foreign vessel-owning interests so that they may send their ships to our inland ports and seize the export-import carrying trade, that is folly of one kind, but there are also many obvious reasons why coastal trade in American bottoms through the St. Lawrence seaway would prove to be folly of another kind and also prove to be economically unsound.

Thanks to its proximity to the Lakes and to the people of New York State, who financed the State barge canal, the upper lake area already has a cheap transportation outlet to the North Atlantic that is not available to other American communities less fortunately situated. This is true also of the all-water route from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico via the Mississippi River system.

The distance via the St. Lawrence route from Duluth to New York or New Orleans is more than double that via existing water routes. Construction and operating costs of the ocean-type vessels that would have to use the St. Lawrence greatly exceed that of lake vessels and canal and river barges. Whereas, prior to the enactment of the Transportation Act of 1940, prospective operators in the lake-coastal trade would have been able to choose desirable traffic at whatever rates would be attractive, that act places such operators under the regulatory powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. If they could get the necessary permits or certificates of convenience and necessity in face of existing competition, they would be required, in the case of common carriers, to file tariffs of rates and maintain a service available to all shippers. There is a vast difference between the carriage of selected commodities and an overall common carrier service at rates fixed by the Commission.

The rates of contract carriers would also be subject to I. C. C. supervision, and the Commission has the power, upon complaint, to fix minimum rates of both types of carriers.

All circumstances considered, it is extremely doubtful that capital could be influenced to invest in such enterprises.

(See accompanying comparative distance tables.)

POWER

Two years ago the Buffalo Chamber of Commerce said, "There has been no shortage of power in New York State." It pointed out that all present and contemplated requirements for power had been provided and that there was then a surplus of generating capacity in New York State. That statement was true 2 years ago and it is still true today. We are now in full war production and there is still no evidence of a power shortage.

The maximum demand for electrical power in New York State on December 14, 1943, between 5 and 6 p. m., was 4,198,600 kilowatts; and there is an installed capacity in the State of 5,346,200 kilowatts, which leaves an additional excess capacity of 1,157,600 kilowatts. There is no present need for additiona' electrical power.

Existing and future power surpluses can be supplied at Massena and elsewhere within the State by utilizing existing transmission lines. The Beauharnois Power Co. in Canada, only 50 miles north of Massena, is another possible source. It can furnish any additional power required up to 1,400,000 horsepower in from 1½ to 2 years, the period being determined by the time necessary to procure and install the additional generating machinery. The necessary treaty arrangements with Canada to utilize this facility could be readily negotiated.

The St. Lawrence project is being advocated, it seems, by a small, well-organized group of public-power proponents who are intent, even in the face of the war, upon substituting political for business management throughout the electric-utility industry.

SUBSIDIES

The promotion of foreign commerce brings into issue the competitive factor between foreign and American shipping. We would either have to surrender the foreign commerce of the Lakes to foreign operators or grant operating and construction differential subsidies to American operators to enable them to compete effectively against the lower operating and construction costs of foreign competitors. There is no other practical way of keeping this traffic in American bottoms.

If we decide not to surrender this commerce to foreign shipping, the extent of these subsidies to American operators must be considered as a part of the seaway cost, and it will not be a small item.

Consideration must also be given to the discrimination that would be created if such shipping were supported by Federal funds and the transportation agencies, railroads, trucks, and water carriers that presently participate in this traffic were denied relative monetary support.

The diversion of export and import traffic from the Atlantic and Gulf ports would disrupt the ocean freight-rate structures and seriously affect the successful financial operation of overseas shipping at those ports.

STATES' RIGHTS

Perhaps the most shocking element in the Aiken bill is its attack on States' rights. It represents nothing more nor less than legislation compelling a clear abdication by the sovereign State of New York to the Federal Government of its inalienable rights in and to the natural resources of New York State, comprised in the State's ownership of bed, water, power, and power sites upon, adjacent to, or within the watershed of the St. Lawrence River.

While New York State would be victimized by the Aiken bill, it also sets a precedent whereby other States may be victimized by encroachment of the Federal Government. It is that foot in the door which Federal bureaucrats have long been seeking and other States have felt in a Federal control of State resources under the guise of flood control.

While the Aiken bill would provide for the transfer to the power authority of the State of New York the "power facilities constructed pursuant to this authorization and the right to use the United States share of the waters," the bill ties a string to this provision. It states specifically: "In addition, the arrangement shall include provisions protecting the interests of the United States and assuring a widespread, equitable disposition of the power to public agencies in other States, including counties, municipalities, public power districts, and rural electric cooperatives within economic transmission distances * * *." This provision would give the Federal Government the right to dictate to New York State how it shall dispose of the power. It is a socialistic provision which would bar the distribution of the power by a private agency even if that proved, by virtue of ownership of transmission lines and other facilities already in existence, to be the most economical method.

The Aiken bill is one of the most subtle and iniquitous attacks on States' rights to appear in many years.

COSTS

Total cost figures for the United States and Canada for this project, including interest during the time of construction and the amortization cost over a period of 50 years, will reach the staggering figure of $1,130,121,924, of which the share of the United States will be $585,949,383. These figures are based on official estimates issued in May 1940, and costs will be higher at the present time.

Construction index costs since the last estimates were made for the St. Lawrence seaway project indicate a rise of 18.39 percent. The figures given herewith, the latest available, were prepared during the fall and winter of 1940. Taking the year 1926 as a base index of 100, the construction index had risen to 119.80 as of December 1940 when the estimates were made, but the rise since that time to February 1944, according to the Engineering News record, had risen to an index of 141.83, which is 22.03 points higher than the index for 1940, an increase of 18.39 percent.

(See accompanying cost estimates issued in a report of the Niagara Frontier Planning Board.)

The following table is based on the testimony of Brig. Gen. Thomas M. Robins, of the United States Army engineers, and covers the foreseeable portion of what the cost is likely to be to the United States.

What the cost estimates of the St. Lawrence seaway reveal

Great Lakes system:	Present estimate
New locks at Sault St. Marie with approved channels	$8,000,000
Connecting channels, Detroit and St. Clair Rivers	66,029,000
Compensating works, Niagara and St. Clair Rivers	Omitted

St. Lawrence River:	Present estimate
Thousand Islands section	$516,000
International Rapids section:
A. Works solely for navigation	48,857,000
B. Works primarily for power	78,550,000
C. Works common to navigation and power	100,210,000
Total	302,162,000
Deduct amount already expended	17,105,485
	285,056,515
Add 12½ percent for contingencies	(included above)
Total initial cost without harbors	285,056,515
Add—
Harbors improvement:
13 harbors, at average $7,500,000 per harbor	97,500,000
12½ percent for contingencies	12,187,500
	394,744,015
Add—
Interest during construction, at 3 percent on basis 4 years	23,684,641
Total initial cost, including harbor, and interest during construction at 3 percent	418,428,656
Deduct amount to be reimbursed by New York State Power Authority	93,375,000
	325,053,656
Add—
Interest at 3 percent, based on amortization of cost in 50 equal annual installments	243,790,242
	568,843,898
To which should be added amount already expended	17,105,485
	585,949,383
Total cost, both countries:
United States	585,949,383
Dominion of Canada	544,172,541
Grand joint total	1,130,121,924

A STUDY IN DISTANCES

As illustrative of the competitive conditions that would confront prospective operators of vessels between lake ports and our coastal ports with the following comparisons of distances are significant:

	Statute miles
Buffalo to New York:
Via St. Lawrence	2,070
Via New York State Barge Canal	504
Difference	1,566
Detroit to New York:
Via St. Lawrence	2,292
Via Lake and New York State Barge Canal	765
Difference	1,527
Chicago to New York:
Via St. Lawrence	2,924
Via Lake and New York State Barge Canal	1,397
Difference	1,527
Duluth to New York:
Via St. Lawrence	3,017
Via Lake and New York State Barge Canal	1,490
Difference	1,527
Chicago to New Orleans:
Via St. Lawrence	4,745
Via Mississippi River system	1,524
Difference	3,221
Duluth to New Orleans:
Via St. Lawrence	4,838
Via Lake and Mississippi River system	2,332
Difference	2,506
Chicago to San Diego, Calif.:
Via St. Lawrence and Panama Canal	8,214
Via rail	2,347
Difference	5,867
Chicago to San Francisco:
Via St. Lawrence and Panama Canal	8,674
Via rail	2,279
Difference	6,395
Chicago to Seattle:
Via St. Lawrence and Panama Canal	9,560
Via rail	2,224
Difference	7,336
Duluth to San Francisco:
Via St. Lawrence and Panama Canal	8,767
Via rail	2,243
Difference	6,524
Duluth to Seattle:
Via St. Lawrence and Panama Canal	9,653
Via rail	1,808
Difference	7,845

Obviously the vast amount of circuity between lake ports and Atlantic and Gulf ports via the St. Lawrence and the existing water routes would preclude any probability of the inauguration of service via the St. Lawrence between such points.

This is true also in the comparison of water and rail distances between lake ports and Pacific coast ports. One of the most liberal figures the Interstate Commerce Commission ever used in composing the competitive rates as between rail and water carriers was to equate the water distance on a basis of 3.6 miles to 1 rail mile. On that basis the water rates between lake ports and Pacific ports would be higher than the rail rates.

Admiral King Clears Congress in Guam Dispute

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a newspaper article written by Phillip Warden of the staff of the Chicago Tribune under date of May 7, 1944:

ADMIRAL CLEARS BOTH HOUSES IN GUAM DISPUTE—KING EXPLAINS REMARKS ON FORTIFICATION

(By Philip Warden)

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7.—Demands that Admiral King, commander in chief of the United States Fleet and Chief of Naval Operations, explains the "false" and "unjustified" charges in his official report on the Navy at war that Congress was responsible for our failure to fortify Guam today brought an almost complete retraction of these allegations.

In a letter to Acting Secretary of Navy Forrestal disclosed today, Admiral King completely absolved the Senate and almost cleared the House of accusations that have been employed in primary campaigns against Senators TYDINGS, Democrat, Maryland; HOLMAN, Republican of Oregon; and NYE, Republican of North Dakota.

Admiral King's letter to Forrestal revealed that the question of fortifying Guam had not come up in the Senate at all and had been requested only orally in the House during committee hearings. No formal request for an appropriation to fortify Guam had been made to either House by the Navy Department or the President.

The letter in effect placed the blame for Guam going unfortified on President Roosevelt.

RECALLS HEPBURN REPORT

It said the "essential desirability" for fortifying Guam was communicated to Congress in the report of the Hepburn Board of 1939 and orally by the Chief of Naval Operations in the course of committee hearings on a House resolution to increase naval aviation facilities on Guam. It said these recommendations were never incorporated in the bill.

It was recalled that the report of the Hepburn Board, based on a survey of bases in the Atlantic and Pacific, was given President Roosevelt and he in turn transmitted it with certain recommendations to Congress. While Admiral Arthur J. Hepburn, the Commander in Chief of the Fleet, recommended fortifications costing $180,000,000 be built, neither the President nor the Navy made a direct request to Congress for such an appropriation.

BILL OMITS GUAM

Admiral King skirted these facts, however, in his letter absolving Congress.

In his letter to Forrestal, Admiral King wrote:

"The essential desirability of fortifying Guam was communicated to Congress in the report of the Hepburn Board in 1939 and orally by the Chief of Naval Operations in the course of the committee hearings on House Resolution 2880 (67th Cong., 1st sess.), but these proposals were never embodied in formal draft legislation.

"Though the question of fortification entered into the debate on said bill, it was not included in the bill as voted upon. The proposals relating to Guam that received adverse votes in Congress were (a) provision in House Resolution 2880 (changes to H. R. 4278) introduced February 1939, to establish, develop, or increase naval-aviation facilities at Guam; (b) a provision in the 1940 appropriation bill for improvement of harbor channels at Guam."

SENATOR WALSH PROTESTS

Senator WALSH (Democrat, Massachusetts), chairman of the powerful Naval Affairs Committee, was one of the first to demand that Admiral King expunge from his report the charge that "after considerable debate" Congress rejected a proposal to proceed with the fortification of Guam. Senator WALSH said the admiral's statement was "unjustified" because the facts were that Congress had never been asked to fortify Guam.

Senator WHEELER (Democrat, Montana) joined Senator WALSH in asking King to supply the official information upon which he based his "false" accusation against Congress.

Administration of Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, for over a year now the rules and regulations under the Price Control Act, which is being administered by the Office of Price Administration for the purpose of controlling prices, have been so rigid and applied so unwisely in some instances as to increase the pressure and power of inflation rather than to decrease it.

In many instances this organization has helped to keep prices from advancing too rapidly and its effects have been beneficial. It is regrettable that in many other instances it has operated to increase the threat of inflation. Inflation is increased when the goods people want to buy are held off the market because they cannot be manufactured, delivered to the retailer, and sold at a profit by either of them.

The Office of Price Administration in many instances has compelled manufacturers of the ordinary necessities of life to attempt to continue to produce goods at the price level of manufacturing of 1942, when the price was frozen, and have refused to take into consideration that the price of producing such goods has been increased by allowing wages to rise and because more efficient labor has been taken into the Army or has been lured into the high-salaried war-production plants which has cut down the production of such manufacturers by reason of losing the younger men and men who were skilled in bringing forth a great production in the same number of hours. Many such manufacturers have quit business and many of those who remain in business are working with only a skeleton organization, some of them losing money, some of them breaking even, and few of them making a legitimate profit.

The laconic directive in 1942 issued by the President in which he demanded that the Office of Price Administration's "hold the line" sounded well to the American people but it has not worked successfully because one end of the line has been held; but the cost-of-production end of the line to the little manufacturer and distributor has not been held, which has kept goods off the market.

One of the best ways to fight inflation is to encourage all of the production for civilian articles that is possible for which there is available material which is not needed for the war effort. Give the people all of the useful necessary articles which they are needing on their farms and in their homes and this will help to absorb some of the extra money and this will minimize the pressure to break the line.

Unreasonable and uneconomic practices imposed by the office of Price Administration which have depressed production, not only in manufactured merchandise but in many instances production on the farm, is not fair to the American people, not conducive to the best interest of our general economy, and is a practice that continuously increases the pressure of inflation.

The small businessmen's committee and many of the Members of Congress have conducted investigations and for the past year have tried to convince the Office of Price Administration of the necessity of following more closely the law which provides for mitigating inequities when they exist.

It does seem that the little businessmen and the Main Street merchants have become the forgotten men of this country. It raises the question as to whether or not those in charge of forming the policy of our Government are deliberately attempting to wipe out the little businessmen of the Nation.

In all of the history of this Government big business has never been so strongly favored by any national administration. For political effect they bemoan and cry out against big business at the front door and issue him special privileges at the back door. The big packers, the big dairy companies, the major oil companies, and big business generally have moved their power controls from Wall Street to Washington.

If there is a plan to socialize this Government little business must first be regimented, destroyed, or brought under control, and later big business can be more quickly brought under control of the Federal Government. There are many who believe such a program may be in the making.

In this connection I want to offer in support of the above statement and include in the RECORD a letter from one of the old, sound business firms of Teutopolis, Ill., which I received this morning from H. J. Weber & Co. who, for over a quarter of a century, have supplied the people in that little village with clothing, shoes, gents' furnishings, and general lines of merchandising to be found in the ordinary progressive stores in many of the small towns of this Nation. This is only one of the many complaints which the Members of Congress find coming over their desks daily.

TEUTOPOLIS, ILL., May 8, 1944.

Congressman CHAS. W. VURSELL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a small independent merchant in a small town, we wish to register a complaint against the W. P. B., O. P. A., and various bureaus that are depriving us of clothing and shoes vitally needed by our farmers and workers. Our allotment of overalls, work shirt, shoes, work gloves, underwear, etc., is much too small to supply the demands.

When we write our sources of supply—the wholesalers and manufacturers—we receive the reply that, beside the shortage of labor and material, the cost of raw material and labor has risen to such an extent, that they are operating at a loss under the present ceiling set-up. Why does O. P. A. allow these things to happen?

The only reason we can see for all this, is to "freeze" all small merchants out of business and let the big operators control the retailing field. Any effort on your part to alleviate this condition will be greatly appreciated.

Very truly yours,

H. J. WEBER CO.

St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit herewith copies of resolutions adopted at a meeting, sponsored by the Watertown Building and Construction Trades Council, in the interest of the St. Lawrence River power and seaway development, held at Watertown, N. Y., May 5, 1944:

Whereas the St. Lawrence River furnishes a natural outlet to the Atlantic for the five Great Lakes along the northeastern boundary of the State of New York and represents, by all odds, the greatest undeveloped natural resource for power and navigation in North America; and

Whereas prior to and during the present World War other great river systems of the United States have proved their worth when properly developed as invaluable assets to the Nation's strength, furnishing low-cost power for war production and supplementing other forms of transportation; and

Whereas 15 great dams have been erected in the Tennessee Valley, in the States of Tennessee, Alabama, Kentucky, and North Carolina, and Congress has appropriated since the initiation of this project by President Wilson more than $500,000,000 to build artificial reservoirs, dams, power works, and locks, thus creating one of the greatest combined systems of inland waterway and power development in the world; and

Whereas the great Boulder Dam in the Colorado River was authorized under the administration of President Hoover and its power works have now been virtually completed in combination with canal, navigation, and reclamation works, at an ultimate estimated cost for the entire system of about $300,000,000; and

Whereas the power, navigation, and reclamation works on the Columbia River, initiated by President Roosevelt, have been carried forward during the war to complete the Bonneville Dam and deep navigation locks, the Grand Coulee Dam, and other works, at an estimated ultimate cost of over $400,000,000; and

Whereas there are now pending before the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate the omnibus rivers and harbors bill and the flood control bill, authorizing additional projects on our great river systems aggregating over $1,500,000,000, including $200,000,000 to be applied to a half billion dollar project on the Missouri River, and more than $200,000,000 additional for the Mississippi; and

Whereas the Committee on Commerce also has had pending before it since September 28, 1943, the Aiken bill, S. 1385, to authorize construction of works to complete the St. Lawrence seaway and power development at a net cost to the Federal Treasury of less than $190,000,000; and

Whereas thorough and complete public hearings were held on an identical bill in the last Congress and it was at that time approved by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and by every Federal and State agency directly concerned with the St. Lawrence development: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this conference appeals to the United States Senate and to the United States House of Representatives to take favorable action at this session of the Congress on the pending St. Lawrence project bills introduced by Senator AIKEN, of Vermont and Representative PITTENGER, of Minnesota, to the end that the Northeastern United States and the Great Lakes region may not be cheated of their birthright and the benefits which will flow from the development of the greatest natural resource available for post-war utilization in this populous and productive area; and be is further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the chairman to the Honorable JAMES M. MEAD, junior Senator from the State of New York and also the only New York member of the Senate Committee on Commerce; to Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER, senior Senator from the State of New York, who has declared his unqualified and active support of the Aiken bill; to the Vice President and presiding officer of the Senate; to the Speaker of the House; and to all Members of the New York delegation in Congress.

Whereas this conference on the St. Lawrence project has heard a masterly presentation of the seaway and power development in the address by the Honorable GEORGE D. AIKEN, United States Senator from the State of Vermont; and

Whereas Senator AIKEN is the author of Senate bill 1385, providing for the immediate authorization and the post-war construction of the works needed to complete the St. Lawrence seaway and power project; and

Whereas there are present at this meeting representatives of the Northern Federation of Chambers of Commerce, the Building and Construction Trades Council, the Grange, members of the New York State Legislature, mayors, boards of supervisors, and numerous civic bodies and organizations of the State of New York; and

Whereas the St. Lawrence seaway and power project will benefit agriculture, labor, business and industry, and all producers and consumers, of which this conference is representative; Therefore be it

Resolved, That this conference extends its hearty appreciation to the Honorable GEORGE D. AIKEN, as the constructive, farsighted and courageous leader of the effort to secure prompt completion of the St. Lawrence project, and we further declare that it is our purpose to participate, in unity and with mutual cooperation, in this effort until the Aiken bill, S. 1385, is enacted into law; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the chairman to the President, to the Vice President, to the Honorable GEORGE D. AIKEN, to Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, and to all members of the New York delegation in Congress.

Whereas the Honorable Thomas E. Dewey on March 27, 1940, in a public statement on the development of our natural resources, said: "I favor the St. Lawrence seaway and always have"; and

Whereas on October 10, 1942, he reaffirmed this declaration and clearly indicated, as reported by the New York Times, "approval of the entire St. Lawrence project" and "strongly advocated the development of the power resources of the State by government"; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of New York on March 15–16, 1944, by a unanimous, nonpartisan vote, and with the approval of the Governor, adopted a concurrent resolution recommending prompt measures to develop the resources of the St. Lawrence River, under the inalienable ownership of the people, to meet urgent needs for cheap hydroelectric power in this area; and

Whereas by his farsighted and consistent support of the St. Lawrence project Governor Dewey has contributed greatly to the advancement of this development under a sound program for the beneficial public use of the State's major natural resource; Therefore be it

Resolved, That this conference heartily commends the progress made in the State of New York in carrying forward this program as an outstanding accomplishment in the public interest; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Governor, to the Lieutenant Governor, and to the speaker of the assembly.

Whereas this conference has received a message on the St. Lawrence project from the honorable ROBERT F. WAGNER, senior Senator from the State of New York in the United States Senate; and

Whereas this message gives unqualified and affirmative support to the Aiken bill, S. 1385, to approve the United States-Canadian agreement of March 19, 1941, to authorize construction of the State's public power project in the International Rapids section, and to authorize construction of works needed to complete the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway; and

Whereas Senator WAGNER has long advocated the improvement of the International Rapids section and has sought to advance and protect New York's interest in this development, under the terms of the pending agreement of 1941; and

Whereas the enactment of the Aiken bill will unquestionably furnish the most direct means of achieving the public benefits which Senator WAGNER envisions, on behalf of the people of the entire State of New York and of the whole Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this Conference strongly endorses the statesmanlike action taken by Senator WAGNER in support of the pending bill, insuring for this constructive, nonpartisan legislation the powerful aid of the senior Senator from the State of New York in the United States Senate, and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the honorable ROBERT F. WAGNER, and to the President, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House, honorable GEORGE D. AIKEN, Senator from Vermont, author of the pending bill, and to all Members of the New York delegation in the Congress.

Federal Security Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY SAUTHOFF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, there has been a vigorous fight waged against the Federal Security Administration. That fight is still going on. In support of that fight, some questions have been raised about F. S. A. projects that did not show a profit. Of course, anyone familiar with the subject knows that the purpose of the F. S. A. was to set up deserving persons in the business of farming, show them how to improve their yield, and help them to get on their feet and be an asset to their respective communities. The results have exceeded the expectations of those of us who favored and supported the F. S. A. Some of these results have been published in the Wisconsin Farmers Union News of May 8, 1944, and I take the liberty of making that article a part of my remarks. The opponents of F. S. A. should note the remarkable success in food production, as shown herewith:

F. S. A. BORROWERS COME THROUGH AGAIN WITH GOOD PRODUCTION RECORDS IN 1943—SHOW INCREASES IN WAR ESSENTIAL CROPS, RANGING FROM 14 TO 65 PERCENT

Farm Security Administration borrowers sold 49 percent more meat (live weight) in 1943 than in 1942, and made increases ranging from 14 to 65 percent in their production of five war-essential food and oil crops, the War Food Administration announced today.

A survey of F. S. A. borrowers' 1943 production compared with 1942 showed that these families made increases in the production of war foods comparable to the increases made by F. S. A. families in 1942 over 1941.

The families in 1943 sold enough milk to provide a year's supply for 8,739,000 active men; enough eggs for 7,515,000 men; pork for 4,437,400; mutton and lamb for 3,153,200; beef and veal for 2,694,000. These sales were in addition to production for their own needs. Their 1943 sales increases alone provided enough eggs for 1,789,300 active men, enough pork for 1,584,800 men, and enough milk for 1,344,500 men.

BROAD SURVEY

The survey represented 311,880 active standard rehabilitation borrowers of the Farm Security Administration who operated farms both in 1942 and 1943. They constitute about 5.1 percent of all farmers. Total sales of livestock and livestock products in 1943 from the farms of these families, and the percent increase over their sales in 1942, were:

Hogs, 532,361,500 pounds; 56 percent increase.

Cattle and calves, 432,360,700 pounds; 43 percent.

Sheep, 62,777,800 pounds; 30 percent.

Milk, 571,116,000 gallons; 18 percent.

Chickens, 66,069,700 pounds; 47 percent.

Eggs, 126,333,300 dozen; 32 percent.

In addition, these families produced for home use 149,146,500 pounds of hogs, 29,371,100 pounds of cattle and calves, 1,049,900 pounds of sheep, 163,089,200 gallons of milk, 35,683,000 pounds of chickens, and 42,916,200 dozen eggs.

WAR CROPS

In the principal war-needed food and oil crops, the total production in 1943 and the percentage increases over 1942 were:

Soybeans, 5,049,200 bushels, 37 percent increase.

Peanuts, 156,776,400 pounds, 22 percent.

Dry beans and blackeyed peas, 84,185,000 pounds, 15 percent.

Irish potatoes, 20,996,800 bushels, 65 percent.

Sweetpotatoes, 5,972,700 bushels, 14 percent.

The borrowers increased wheat acreage, but like other farmers, had smaller average yields than in the near-record year of 1942. Their total wheat production in 1943 was 26,950,300 bushels, 4 percent less than in the previous season.

The families surveyed had 49,579,300 acres in farms in 1943, 7.7 percent more than the year before, and of this acreage they had 19,521,300 acres in crops, an 11 percent increase over 1942.

The survey was made through a Nation-wide sample check of individual farm production records of F. S. A. borrowers in all types of farming areas. Statistical methods used were reviewed and approved by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

HELPED NATION

The high percentage increases in war-food production by Farm Security families, particularly their expanded production for the commercial market, are of great value not only to the Nation, but also to the families themselves, Frank Hancock, F. S. A. Administrator, pointed out.

"The extra margin toward victory which these small, family-type farmers have contributed is of primary importance to the Nation at this moment," Mr. Hancock said. "Also, these families, who received credit and practical guidance from Farm Security when they could not qualify for adequate credit from other sources, have strengthened their own security for the years to come.

"Like all farmers, they have done more with less, for thousands of their sons and daughters have gone into the armed services and war industries. Many of these borrowers already have paid off their Government loans in full and have become independent and debt-free, while most of the others have made rapid advances toward that goal. As far as our resources permit, we are continuing to help additional small farmers help themselves and at the same time aid the country and our allies toward victory."

The Price-Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, delivered over the radio on Wednesday, April 26, 1944, by Representative WALT HORAN, Republican, of the State of Washington:

Two duties lie before America.

Our first duty is the continuation of nonpartisan unity to the end that this war will be over and our boys returned home as soon as possible.

Our second duty is to take advantage of the wisdom we acquired in our 10 years of depression and plan to put them to work in peacetime as we now are doing to win the war. The people themselves must understand the people's business and be about it.

During the thirties, we learned the economic facts of life. Producers on farm, forest, factory, or mine learned that there was little security in it for them unless people used what they produced—that consumption was the sole objective of production. Today our consumers are learning another hard fact also, that unless goods are produced they cannot be consumed.

And even a great and mystic government cannot conjure up what is not there. We now know that government can chill and stop the desire of a people to enter freely into production and the people's business of serving each other. There are times when the genius of administration lies in the restraints it places on itself.

I know we can all agree that we want our boys to return to a working America. A Nation happy in this business of producing for each other—at prices low enough to assure consumption—at prices high enough to make production secure.

We want our boys to return to a nation where the lumber of the great forests of the West and South makes for better shelter and living in the North, the plains along the estern seaboard; where the knives from Connecticut move freely to Florida, California and Washington, and trains of luscious oranges, apples and the other of Nature's bounty may move eastward in exchange.

We want our boys to return to the greatest area of free trade on the face of the globe—to a land of free production and free movement of goods. More and more the specific proposals for a world in which peace has a chance point to expanding areas of free trade—shall we deny this principle at home and propound it abroad?

Yes, we want our boys to return to God's country and reengage in their God-given heritage—creative work—equality of opportunity, and that most important privilege of all, unhampered production to a land where every encouragement is given the free flow, exchange, and consumption of man's produce.

We want this. Therefore, it is our business to get busy at the task of making this come true.

The vast majority of our population want to do what is right. It is the duty of government to counsel with them as to what is just and right and then give them both the opportunity and the responsibility of doing what is right. The people know where their security lies—in mutual production and the using of each other's products. It is like the ablution at the end of the harvest day, one hand washing the other.

Already responsible men are talking of the relationships of prices and the maximum use of products in the post-war era; of the tested formula of low profits on a great turn-over so ably promoted and protected by Henry Ford. They realize that individual enterprise and private property, to survive itself and restore this Nation to its proper freedoms must discipline itself. The glory of this Republic lies in the fact that self-discipline is far better than discipline imposed upon an otherwise free people by edicts and penalties.

Freedom concedes that honorable men are, when given the knowledge and responsibility, worthy of freedom. The ultimate strength of any form of government lies in its faith in its productive citizens—a faith sufficient to let civil law rule, civil law which says that men are innocent of wrong until proven guilty. Yet, today, we verge nearer and nearer a complete code of military laws under which all men are guilty until proven innocent.

We lie in danger. The very foundations of our free institutions are challenged by the inroads of an arbitrary expediency.

The operation of the Price Control Act can be made the means of restoring our maximum internal commerce and the faith of our citizens in each other.

What better opportunity could we have than the home front battle against inflation?

What better medium than an increasing assumption of the functions of price control by the people themselves?

I believe we must begin with this fact:

A low rate of profit on fully and continuously employed capital, thus achieving maximum total employment for American labor and maximum total earnings—in the long run—to the responsible proprietary interest; in short, it means the maintenance of God's bounty, man's purchasing power and national security.

Give our free American people an active and responsible part in this serious matter of inflation control. Justice and the whole principle of self-government demands it.

Let us keep faith with America and Americans. Yes, our future lies in a productive America.

A Washington paper recently headlined it this way, "Peak output, low cost held post-war need."

How achieve this?

Through expanding bureaucracy?

Under pressure this policy may appear successful, but it is an illusion. The end is something else than what we want.

Through continued badgering and penalizing of existing business?

The government we want must recognize integrity and faithful purpose wherever it is found. We should recognize the honest and the faithful.

Are we to delude ourselves that this peak output can be achieved by a resumption of the social revolution which rocked this Nation from the bank holiday until Pearl Harbor? Our task, today, is to so educate our people that no one will feel the need—nor permit another to promote a resumption of the social revolution of the thirties.

Our people have a heritage—it lies in our Christian teachings and traditions. our institutions and established way of life in government, commerce, and society. It assumes that there is a better side to every man and if we would have faith in our own future, we should lose no time in appealing to that better side of men.

Is it not just as possible to appeal to and enlarge the yearning for justice inherent in our people as it is to appeal to their prejudices and points of conflict?

We ought by now to realize that security itself can only come from justly rewarded work.

That is basic and a concept we can have faith in. The way to implement that faith is by giving the people themselves more control over their own business. The means of implementing that faith is through constructive modification of the Price Control Act under which the Office of Price Administration functions and through both of which we hope to control inflation.

If we are to have O. P. A. with us during the rest of the war and that crucial period after the war when we know that inflation is extremely contagious, we must, in my opinion, move in the direction of the people themselves, taking a full responsibility in this matter of price structures.

Mind you, I began this statement with the assumption that the Price Control Act, as passed by Congress, remain to guard against the possibility of industrial combinations in restraint of trade. If an industry proves that it cannot discipline itself when entrusted with this public responsibility, that is time enough to invoke the prerogatives of minute regulations.

The American people are citizens—responsible participants in the duty of self-government. They are not subjects of a benign and omnipotent temporal authority. They are that authority itself. We must not deny them a full part now in that which will determine their destiny for years to come.

There is far more in this matter than the mere discussion of price control. Far more than a debate on the rightness or wrongness of granting a limited extension of O. P. A.

A cynic has been described as one who knows the price of everything, the value of nothing.

Prices are relative—values are constant.

If we are to control inflation, we must fully realize the values we are protecting. We can do so with mutual understanding. We cannot gain that end with force.

Force and an appeal upon the basis of price alone will continue the destructive tendency for it stresses conflict and denies unity, hence it will complete the distrust in American individual enterprise and, by the back door of indirection, render us more and more a land of state capitalism and monopoly.

We are asked to exchange faith in each other for a spurious faith in Government. We are not reminded that government, to endure, must be founded upon our trust in each other.

Today, small businesses are at a low level. We must restore them and revive the faith of all men capable of self-reliant, individual enterprise. Government, as such, with one hand in the Treasury and the other in the ballot box cannot effectively bring this about. The people themselves, in their daily tasks, can restore this. It must be achieved by producers who appreciate the consumer. It must be achieved by consumers who realize the indispensable need for producers.

There should be no wall between them. Each should realize the indispensability of the other.

The Price Control Act should be extended. It should be modified through the inclusion of four simple amendments, in addition to the terribly important administrative purpose of giving the people themselves a greater functional part in the business of inflation control.

1. Civil court review of O. P. A. directives. This is obvious. While the present administrator is doing much to correct the earlier mistakes, many inequities remain that could more speedily be adjusted by access to the courts by producers and consumers.

2. The industrial casualties reflected in the death of small businesses because of price control edicts should not be accepted inevitable byproducts of inflation control.

3. Clarification of the purpose of the Price Control Act's administration to assure the Nation that the act is being used to control inflation—and not merely to effect monopoly and a head start on post-war business. Indeed, O. P. A. is not alone behind this cloud. This is absolutely essential if the faith of small ambitions are to be restored in the American way of free and individual enterprise.

4. The sham of dual control should be ended as far as food production and distribution is concerned. The illusion of public benefit from continuous conflict between war agencies is false. Everyone loses, since the net result is distrust in Government and class distrust. One responsible head, responsible to the interests of both the consumer and the producer in the people's business, can act faster and with greater certainty. Confusion can only be ended in this way.

We want our boys to return to an America where men have faith in each other. Through this faith, a faith in our Nation.

Tomorrow, and have no doubts about this, our democracy within a Republic will once again be tested upon the fires of peacetime reconversion and rehabilitation.

We should lose neither time nor opportunity in the educating of all of us of our stake and part in the people's business. The future of ourselves and our posterity demands it.

Resolution of the Ancient Order of Hibernians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following resolution passed at a meeting of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America assembled in the city of New York, April 28, 1944:

We, the members of the national board of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America and its ladies auxiliary, in meeting assembled in the city of New York this 29th day of April A. D. 1944, do hereby reaffirm our loyalty, fidelity, and continued support of our Government, the United States of America, in our all-out endeavor of winning the war on every battle front. We pledge the continued support of the membership of our order in the performance of our duty in the present war, as we have met the test in every national emergency from the birth of this great Republic.

We are deeply grieved over the strained relations between our Government and the government of Eire over the question of neutrality. We offer up our prayers to God and pray Saint Patrick, the apostle of the Gael, to intercede that this misunderstanding will be corrected by applying to Eire the principles of the Atlantic Charter—the principles for which our American blood is now being shed in all parts of the world.

Ireland, a nation for more than seven centuries fighting for these rights with no question as to her geographical boundary—until partition took from her 6 of her 32 counties, is under God and man entitled to the recovery of her liberty and territory, not part free and part slave, but all free and independent.

With this accomplished both our country and our allies will find the people of Ireland not only willing and anxious to join with us but to offer up her last drop of blood and pound of treasure in defense of liberty and justice: Be it therefore

Resolved, That we request our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, our Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, and our Members of the American Congress to petition our ally, Great Britain, to remove at once the artificial political boundary that divides Northern and Southern Ireland, and that they and we remove from her shores all semblance of a violation of her neutrality until the Irish Nation of its own free will changes its course or follows its present course without interference; be it further Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, to Secretary of State Cordell Hull, and to the Members of Congress.

Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS J. CAPOZZOLI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. CAPOZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I regret that my duties as chairman of the subcommittee of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, investigating production in shipyards, made necessary my absence from Washington on May 3, 1944. I had intended, if I had been able to attend that day's session of the House, to pay tribute to our gallant Polish ally on the occasion of the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption of the Polish Constitution.

In these crucial days, when millions of lives have already been sacrificed in order that liberty may live, we remember with sorrow that the people of occupied Poland, deprived of their liberty, are suffering untold torments at the hands of a cruel and oppressive invader. Their suffering should forever be before us, in order to remind us as to what we are fighting for. Please God, we fight to stave off a fate for our country and our people similar to that which has befallen the great Polish Republic.

Our people are grateful to our Polish ally because, as Gen. Wladyslaw Sikorski pointed out, the trend of the war might have been different if Hitler had launched his attack on France and Great Britain first, instead of attacking Poland. We also like to recall that both the Polish people and our own, at about the same time, established governments dedicated to the theory that they are the servants and not the masters of the people.

Mr. Speaker, it is hoped that, when victory is ours and the hordes of the invader shall be no more, we may witness the rejuvenation and the reestablishment of the great Polish Republic, which, by its example of democracy, has contributed so greatly to social progress.

Free Ports for Refugees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Samuel Grafton and an editorial from the New York Times of May 4, 1944:

[From the New York Post of April 5, 1944]

I'D RATHER BE RIGHT

(By Samuel Grafton)

Free ports for refugees: A free port is a small bit of land, a kind of reservation, into which foreign goods may be brought without paying customs duties. There is one in the New York City area. Goods brought into it from overseas are destined either for transshipment to other countries, or for temporary storage. Such goods may even be processed while they are in the free port; manufacturing operations can, and are, carried out on them. Or the goods may just sit there for a while, giving their owner time to brood.

If, eventually, he decides to bring the goods into the country proper, he merely pays the normal customs duties, and the stuff may enter.

A PLACE TO SIT DOWN

A free port is a place where you can put things down for a while, without having to make a final decision about them. The few cases which constitute a free port are well guarded, so that nobody will smuggle a pair of alien garters or a foreign fry pan over the boundaries, in defiance of the tariff laws.

Why couldn't we have a system of free ports for refugees fleeing the Hitler terror?

Obviously, we need a place where we can put refugees down, without making final decisions about them, a place where they can be stored and processed, so to speak, without creating legal and political problems. Of course, it shouldn't be against the law, exactly, to bind up a wound in such a free port, or to give somebody a drink of water.

The need is for reservations of a few acres here and there, where a man who has been running for 10 years can sit down and catch his breath, and where somebody can tell a story to a frightened child; a few reservations where it would be possible for those who cannot satisfy the requirements of law to rest a bit, without violating the law. We do it, in commercial free ports, for cases of beans, so that we can make some storage and processing profits; it should not be impossible to do it for people.

AS IF THEY WERE SHIPS

Let us look upon these refugee free ports as if they were moored ships, ships of land. Anyone who would step over the boundary of the free port into the country proper should be made to satisfy all requirements of immigration law, precisely as if he were proposing to come ashore from a ship. But surely it should not baffle our ingenuity to find some legal way in which to grant a Stateless woman the comparatively small bit of room which she needs in order to deliver a baby.

Of course, I am a little ashamed to find myself pandering to anti-refugee prejudices even to the extent of saying, "Yes, pile the legal disabilities on them, give them no rights, store them like corn, herd them like cattle"—but the need is so sharp, the time is so short, our current example to the world is so bad, that it is necessary to settle for whatever can be done.

And something can be done. It should not be really necessary to beg, storm, and plead for a few reserved acres in which, without creating legal or political problems, a man can be allowed to die without filing in all his papers, or in which a baby can drink a glass of that strange white stuff which an older European generation knew as milk.

OTHERWISE, A SNICKER

If we set up a system of refugee free ports, our fine new War Refugee Board can then properly appeal to other countries to do the same. If we do not go at least that far, the board will be answered with a snicker should it make such requests of other lands.

The refugees, Jewish and other, ask only for a few fenced-in acres of the poorest land in America. They don't want to keep it. They just want to sit on it until they can go home again. They are letting us off more easily than does conscience itself, for they don't even ask that we do our best for them. They plead for our worst.

[From the New York Times of May 4, 1944]

"FREE PORTS" FOR REFUGEES

When the idea of "free ports" in this country for war refugees was brought up in Washington recently there seemed to be two possible objections to it, one good and one bad. The first objection was that it would be inhuman to establish what might be regarded as concentration camps for refugees we were not willing to admit. The second was that some of these refugees might eventually get into the country, beyond the restrictions of the quota law. A study of the situation indicates that neither argument is valid. A refugee brought, say, to Ellis Island and there comfortably housed and fed and treated with consideration would be in heaven compared with the same person in Germany or Rumania. As for the danger of refugees escaping into the United States from their places of detention, this is hardly a menace to the safety of the Republic. We take this risk with our captive enemies. Why not with our luckless friends?

The War Refugee Board, as its director, John W. Pehle, has indicated, would be a logical agency to carry out the "free port" plan. Perhaps Army camps, vacated as the peak of training passes, could be used. After the war some of the refugees might safely return to their countries of origin. Others might find homes in other countries where immigrants might be needed and welcomed. Still others could in time be admitted regularly to the United States. The plan has nothing to do with unrestricted and uncontrolled immigration. It is simply a proposal to save the lives of innocent people.

Invention of the Flat Top Plane Carrier

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW J. MERRITT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include two letters received by me setting forth the excellent work of John L. Bogert, naval architect and engineer, who, it is claimed, is the inventor of the flat top plane carrier and its use as an escort to our cargo convoys across the Atlantic. I understand he made the original designs and drawings some time in the spring of 1917 and submitted same to the United States Navy.

The letters follow:

TRANSPORTATION ECONOMICS CONSULTANTS,
New York, N. Y., May 8, 1944

Hon. MATTHEW J. MERRITT,
Representatives' Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Because I am a "Flushing boy," having been born there on October 27, 1858, lived there all my life up to World War No. 1, I am writing to you, as Congressman from my own home town, to tell you that you can enhance the glory and credit of Flushing by trying to secure proper recognition for me in Congress, as the inventor of the flat-top plane carrier and its use as escort to our cargo convoys across the Atlantic.

I made the design and drawings of the first flat-top plane carrier way back in the spring of 1917, and I spent plenty of time in Washington trying to get the United States Navy to build one and have it escort the cargo convoys across the Atlantic.

I insisted that destroyers were more or less helpless in their efforts to protect convoys, because no one on the deck of a destroyer, or up at its masthead could look diagonally through the water and locate a submarine lurking at periscope depth. This anyone up in the air vertically over the submarine could do. Therefore the only strategy worth while was a plane carrier accompanying each convoy and planes from its deck constantly circling the convoy. As soon as a lurking submarine was spotted, the loom of its hull showing up through the water, the plane could drop a bomb at the exact spot where the destroyer or destroyers were to head for with their depth bombs.

I was unsuccessful in 1917 and 1918, in spite of all my efforts to interest the Allies, and the Government refused to permit any steel being used to build any such vessel. With the dawning of the armistice, submarine hunting became a dead issue. Nevertheless, the United States Navy, in 1923, 6 years after they had received my drawings, converted the collier Jupiter to become their first flat-top plane carrier.

With the outbreak of World War No. 2, I resumed my importunities, only to be rebuffed until the sinkings had risen to 1,000,000 tons a month. Then the Navy adopted my strategy, and sent a baby flat-top plane carrier with each convoy, and the sinkings ceased. That was in the winter of 1942–43. I am still waiting for public recognition from Congress that my ideas and my ideas alone were responsible for winning the battle of the Atlantic. Don't you consider that Flushing would be interested in having you insist from the floor of Congress that a Flushing man was entitled to a vote of thanks by the Nation?

Yours truly,

JOHN L. BOGERT,
Naval Architect and Engineer.

NEWPORT NEWS SHIPBUILDING & DRYDOCK CO.,
Newport News, Va., February 3, 1944.

Mr. JOHN L. BOGERT,
Transportation Economics Consultants,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. BOGERT: Thank you for your letter of January 25

I am sorry not to have known before that you were the original proponent of escort plane carriers back in 1917–18 and am surprised to hear that of all people Stocker should have turned down the idea, as he had a reputation for inventiveness and progressiveness. However, looking back to those days when I was personally engaged in sub hunting, operating from the coast of Ireland, I can see that perhaps the escort plane carrier would have been a useless luxury. Subs were not what they are now and operated singly in the channel and along the French coast but not west of 15° longitude. Planes were not so good then either, but they were used, also dirigibles, both land based, for scouting and searching for subs.

As submarines improved, permitting far greater radius of action, and as planes improved, the evolution of the escort plane carrier seems natural. This goes to show that you were ahead of time like Leonardo de Vinci.

I do think you should be given all manner of credit for the ideas which you put forward at such an early date and am surprised that the Navy is backward in doing this. Perhaps the patent situation has something to do with this. As for naming a ship, no doubt they will tell you that Government-owned vessels are not named after living persons. Next time I go to Washington I will make some inquiries.

With kind regards,

Sincerely,

ROGER WILLIAMS.

The Sewell Avery Photograph

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the dramatic episode staged by Attorney General Biddle at the request and pursuant to the demand of the Commander in Chief is well analyzed by Walter Lippmann under the title "The Sewell Avery Photograph" which appeared in the Washington Post under date of May 11, 1944. Under unanimous consent, I insert this article in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my remarks:

THE SEWELL AVERY PHOTOGRAPH

It may be that the the Montgomery Ward affair raises great constitutional issues. If so, learned judges and lawyers will have to separate them from the farce which the leading actors in the affair bumbled and stumbled into.

When the representatives of the Government entered Mr. Avery's office, they had with them a copy of the Presidential order directing the Secretary of Commerce to take over the operation of the company. Mr. Avery refused to obey it. Thereupon, the Government officials had to decide either to go to court to prove their authority or to enforce the Presidential order with the authority which they believed they had. They decided, wrongly so it would seem, to enforce the order before going to court.

Having made this decision, it was then a question of how to enforce their order. They proceeded to confront Mr. Avery with nine Federal marshals. Mr. Avery would not yield peaceably to this civilian police power. On the other hand, the Government officials did not tell the marshals to remove Mr. Avery. For some reason nine armed marshals seemed to them an inadequate force to deal with the aging Mr. Avery and so they called upon the United States Army to replace the marshals.

Presumably, they hoped to overawe Mr. Avery. Whether or not he was temporarily overawed by the three Army trucks and the 44 soldiers is not clear, and may, alas, never be known to the conscientious historians. What is known is that the Army arrived shortly after 6 o'clock and that almost immediately thereafter Mr. Avery remembered that it was time to go home, and perhaps to fortify himself with a drink, his dinner, and some advice. Anyway he left peaceably, walking on his own feet. Thus Montgomery Ward had been evacuated and the United States Government and the Army were in physical possession.

Then the most absurd part of the affair took place. Mr. Avery was gone. Mr. Chatfield Taylor and Mr. Biddle were inside. The troops were there. The next morning Mr. Avery returned, without opposition, apparently by a back door because the Government had posted its men only at the front door. Then for the second time Messrs. Chatfield Taylor and Biddle had the problem of disposing of Mr. Avery. One thing to have done was to have given him a comfortable chair to sit in until later in the day when he again felt the need to go home for dinner, and then, when he had departed, to have seen to it that he did not come back the next morning. The physical presence of Mr. Avery in the building was not such a danger to the security of the Nation but that a powerful and courageous Government might have taken the risk.

It seems, however, that in their not very deeply considered judgment, Mr. Avery had to be removed at once from the premises. At this point they again had a choice. They might have ordered the marshals in civilian clothes to escort Mr. Avery to the door. Nine marshals with 44 soldiers in reserve could have done this without heavy exertion or severe casualties, and the Nation would have been spared the indignity of seeing a photograph of troops, armed as for the invasion of Europe, carrying a somewhat eccentric old gentleman into the streets of Chicago.

For it was the manner in which the troops were used, far more than the legal issues involved, which has made the affair so notorious.

Not having studied the legal issues, I do not venture an opinion on them. But it seems to me that the incident which is summed up in the photograph is probably more important than the exceedingly narrow legal question of how the statute is to be construed. And the incident is important because it reminds us that we are tending to forget the distinction, which is fundamental in a republic, between the civil and the military power.

The use of the military in civil disputes should never be resorted to unless the civil power is plainly inadequate to maintain law and order. That is why, assuming that the Government had the right to remove Mr. Avery from the building and assuming that it was wise to exercise the right, the removal should have been done by the marshals and not by the troops. To employ troops before the civilian marshals had made any show of force was exceedingly bad practice. In this case it merely produced a silly spectacle. But the Army of the United States should not be treated so carelessly that it becomes implicated in silly spectacles.

This episode is one illustration of a general slovenliness, which we need to check, on the whole question of how the civilian and the military powers are related. One of the worst examples of it is the sentimental and rhetorical use of the term "Commander in Chief" to imply that the President governs by a kind of vague and inclusive martial law. The true conception of the Commander in Chief is, I venture to think, quite the opposite: it is that because this is a republic, the President, who is a civilian and because he is a civilian, is always supreme over the military power. To talk as if he were a kind of generalissimo is a total reversal of the meaning of commander in chief.

The supremacy of the civil power is the essence of a constitutional republic. Here was the basic objection to nominating General MacArthur while he was still an active soldier. Here is the objection to making him Secretary of War, to making, as some suggest, Admiral Leahy the Secretary of the Navy, For in a republic, no matter how deeply we trust the military and wish to defer to it in time of war, the supremacy of the civil power ought to be zealously preserved. That truth is one of the basic principles for which we stand.

Medicine Man of Capitol Hill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I desire to include here an article from the magazine Coronet.

I believe Members will appreciate this well-written article about Dr. George W. Calver, to whom many of us are indebted beyond measure for his attention to, and advice concerning, our physical needs.

The article follows:

MEDICINE MAN OF CAPITOL HILL

(By David Brinkley)

During peaceful, unhurried sessions the work of keeping more than 500 congressional hearts, stomachs, and nervous systems in working order is difficult enough. But after 4 years in which Congress has had very little vacation, when debate on the war's conduct draws nerves tight and threatens to stop stomachs from working and hearts from beating, George Wehnes Calver's office on the ground floor of the National Capitol is one of the busiest spots in Washington—and that's saying plenty.

For example, take the events of a single week during the violent debate over food subsidies. Henry B. Steagall, of Alabama, had just made a fire-eating speech in the House while W. Warren Barbour, of New Jersey, engaged in hot debate in the Senate. Both men, who had apparently enjoyed normal health, suffered fatal heart attacks on the very same day.

During the same week around two dozen legislators showed up in Calver's office suffering stomach pains, which he diagnosed as the ailment he'd treated time and time again during his 16 years as attending physician to Congress. It was indigestion, brought on by tense, strained nerves. His prescription was the same as always—rest and relaxation, both physical and mental.

Only recently Senator Frederick Van Nuys, of Indiana, already one of Washington's hardest working legislators, was given the additional job of investigating the liquor shortage. After a few weeks of this work burden he also collapsed and died of a heart ailment. Calver will tell you without reservation that Van Nuys, had he remained in private life and avoided strenuous activity, would have lived longer. That holds true for most of the 13 other legislators who have died in office since January 1943.

When Calver called this epidemic of heart and stomach ailments to the attention of Capitol Hill he suggested that Congress slow down, take more frequent vacations, and relax whenever possible. His suggestion brought vigorous reaction from the public. Bales of letters arrived—and all took issue with him. Servicemen, they pointed out, work in trenches and fox holes for as little as $50 a month, while a Congressman begins work at noon and is paid $10,000 a year.

"That," says Calver, pointing to one of the letters, "is the prime reason our legislators are in a constant state of nervous tension. A private businessman has at most a few bosses to answer to. Folks don't realize that a Congressman has hundreds of thousands. He's afraid to relax, afraid to take a vacation when he needs it for fear his voter bosses will accuse him of lying down on the job.

"It's true that the House and Senate open at noon. But it's also true that every man on the Hill has a lot of duties he can't perform on the House or Senate floor. For one thing, he has reams of letters from his home State to answer, correspondence he can't afford to neglect.

"Then again, committee work—where the real work is done—usually starts before noon and continues long after the ordinary businessman's day is done. In addition to which, Congressmen are called upon constantly to run errands and perform favors for their constituents."

The work of a Congressman can't exactly be classified as a hazardous occupation. But a legislator who spends a day in a committee hearing matching wits with lobbyists, or who engages in strenuous debate on a chamber floor, has done more nerve-wracking work than most men in private life. As a result, says Calver, heart and stomach trouble and all the ills brought on by overwrought nerves have become the "occupational disease" of Capitol Hill.

On almost any day while Congress is in session, you can sit in his anteroom and watch patients stream in and out, among them the Vice President, Supreme Court Justices, Senators, Representatives, and a few stenographers and clerks who work in the building.

When your turn comes, you go into a half-dark office, sit in a big, black leather chair and face the graying, soft-spoken man who perhaps knows Congress more intimately than any other person.

Calver, a captain in the Navy Medical Corps, has been assigned to the Capitol since 1928 and still claims that his is the most interesting job in all of Washington.

On an ordinary day about 80 visitors—some sick, some not—will drop into his office. Those needing only a throat spray or minor care are treated by C. L. Block, a lieutenant in the Navy and Calver's assistant. Most, however, want to see Calver. They may seek relief from a head cold or just want to talk into a sympathetic and nonpolitical ear.

During the first few months after an election Calver engages in more of these heart-to-heart talks than at any other time. For ethical and political reasons he can't report on them, but he does say that visitors run mostly to freshman legislators suffering from "buck fever," complicated by what he calls "a sense of frustration." From a home town where they've probably been the No. 1 citizen, they must suddenly adjust to being one politico among more than 500. And then in the Capital a Member of Congress doesn't always find the consideration he might expect.

Calver's favorite anecdote concerns a new Representative who, on arriving in Washington, had to wait 30 days while his predecessor vacated his space in the House Office Building. Nor could he locate a house, an apartment, or even a hotel room to live in. Finally, as he stood disconsolately on a street corner, a stray dog took a bite out of his leg. "How," the young legislator asked himself, "did that dog know I was a Congressman?"

Even an older hand is sometimes upset by the abuse and criticism heaped on him by home-State newspapers, political rivals, and the public. Usually the criticism results directly from some political action he's taken that the folks back home disapprove. The legislator, who has often based his decision on better information than that available to his critics, feels he's been wronged and wants to talk to someone about it.

Calver, following the policy of pills and politics don't mix, will treat a head cold and listen to a tale of woe; but he won't put his eggs into any political basket. Small doses of the usual nostrums, blended skillfully with big doses of sympathy and encouragement, comprise the therapy that has kept him in office for two administrations through a record turnover in congressional membership.

His story and the story of his job begin at the same time, for he is Congress' first and only physician. In 1928 Representative Martin B. Madden, of Illinois, collapsed on the floor of the House with a heart attack. The 2-hour delay incurred in finding a doctor so irritated Congress it called on the Navy to send over a medical man to minister to its ailments on a full-time basis. Calver was the man and he's been ministering to Congress' ailments ever since—but not on Navy say-so. For 3 years after his appointment, the Navy told him he was due for sea duty. Congress, having grown partial to his brand of pills and comfort, would not hear of it. Both Houses passed a resolution stipulating that he was not to be removed from office without congressional consent. In the 13 years since, consent has never been given.

Calver is a rarity in a town where nearly everyone is from somewhere else. Not only was he born in Washington but he grew up near the shadow of the dome under which he now works. His boyhood home stood on the land now covered by the Library of Congress. He studied at George Washington University's Medical School and interned at its hospital.

Both his daughters are married to physicians. From his conversation, it's hard to tell whether he's prouder of them or his basement carpentry shop. He will, in fact, talk more freely about the furniture he builds than the inner workings of Congress.

For his services, Calver receives only the Navy's regular pay for his rank. Instead of fees, he collects autographed pictures of his patients, and these profits of 16 years' service line his office walls. Most are inscribed with short words of thanks. Typical are photographs of President Roosevelt and former Vice President Garner in informal poses. Garner wrote: "To Doc Calver—Thanks for making me try to behave." To Garner's note, the President added: "To Dr. Calver—Keep on Trying."

Calver recalls that he gave Garner the same advice he still gives all freshmen on Capitol Hill, namely, to live as calmly as possible, eat wisely, exercise regularly, and relax at every opportunity. He has developed that advice into what he calls the ten commandments of health, rules which are printed on cards and distributed to all newcomers. They have been revised only once since 1928. Suggestion two read: "Drink plentifully." Calver has since gone through the stack of cards and with a fountain pen added the words "of water."

On his desk he has a wooden box bearing a row of small electric lights. For each patient who enters the outer office, Calver's receptionist flips a switch, flashing a signal to his desk. This array of lights has come to be a pretty reliable index to the state of affairs on the floors of Congress. When the debate grows hot and heavy, it won't be long until the outer office is full and all the tiny lights glowing.

Calver tells you he long ago forgot that his patients include many of the Nation's most distinguished lawmakers and jurists. "They come in here as patients and they get the treatment they need. If they need a cussing out, they get that too."

If Congress were not made of the exceptionally strong stuff that it is, the effects of a strenuous, seldom interrupted 4-year session would be even more serious. "These men," Calver says, "have come up through the process of elimination. They have survided one or many political campaigns and the weak have long since fallen aside. As a group, they're physically stronger than probably any other group of the same average age."

It is difficult, however, to tell whether today's lawmakers are in better or worse physical shape than their predecessors, for they are working under unprecedented strain. Calver doesn't believe there are as many infectious diseases as there once were, but he can prove that cardiovascular ailments—affecting the heart and blood vessels—are definitely on the increase.

He estimates the Senators' average age at about 65 and Representatives' at about 58. Sixteen years of treating patients of the middle-aged and elderly groups has taught Calver this: Most illnesses commonly associated with age can be delayed or avoided by moderate living, light eating, and exercising sensibly. That program, he says, holds good not only for a Congressman but for any middle-aged man or woman.

Quite often Calver is called on to decide whether the various cranks and crackpots who turn up around Capitol Hill should be sent to the police station or mental hospitals. The boy who stood up in the House gallery, flourished a gun and demanded the floor, was taken to him and promptly given a psychiatric examination.

When the bonus army marched on Washington the police fired tear gas at the marchers. But by standing to the windward, they succeeded in gassing no one but themselves. It was Calver who treated them.

Today at 56 he hopes to spend many more years at his office, changing in the morning from his gold-braided Navy blouse into a doctorish-looking tweed coat, listening throughout the day to the complaints of the men who make the Nation's laws.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent of the House of Representatives, I present for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following editorial from the Indiana (Pa.) Gazette:

MERITED TRIBUTE TO JIM FARLEY

By unanimously reelecting him to a ninth term as State chairman, New York Democrats paid James A. Farley a marked and well-merited tribute. There had been some talk of opposition to Farley, but it faded away and the Democratic State committee, without a dissenting vote, approved his generalship in this national election year.

There is no question that Jim Farley is one of the best-liked personalities on the American political scene and that his wide popularity is thoroughly deserved. He is a marvelous party organizer, with an amazing memory for names and faces. He is an affable gentleman, unruffled under pressure. Best of all, Jim keeps his promises. Not even his enemies—if he has any—could accuse him of unfairness or trickery.

We're glad the opposition to his reelection in New York didn't develop and that he will be, presumably, an active leader in this year's campaign.

A Patriotic Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. LEONARD ALLEN

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Alexandria (La.) Daily Town Talk of May 8, 1944:

A PATRIOTIC CONGRESS

Congress, at its best, has some faults, and at its worst is terrible. But it should be given its due. The way it has supported this war, and the people conducting it, is one of the brightest features of these unpleasant times. The latest example is the passage of the biggest naval appropriation bill in all history, by both Houses of Congress, without a dissenting vote.

This is by no means an isolated case. There have been several other notable examples of unanimity in Congress, and the whole handling of the war on the legislative side has been surprisingly free from opposition or delay. Regardless of political complications in an election year, and the inevitable antagonisms of policy and prejudice, first things have been put first, and there has been better cooperation so far than most observers would have thought possible.

Public Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Roanoke Leader of Friday, May 5, 1944, entitled "Another Red-Letter Day for Public Education."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANOTHER RED-LETTER DAY FOR PUBLIC EDUCATION

The May campaign of 1905 is always referred to by friends of public education in Virginia as the first outstanding event in public-school circles, following the establishment in 1870 of the public-school system of Virginia, at the point of Federal bayonets, because, as a result of that campaign, our high-school system (Mr. Jefferson's academies), became a part of our public-school system and the stigma of pauperism which had dogged the steps of public-school children from the outset began to wane.

The increased patronage of our public schools and especially of our high schools placed a constantly increasing public-school expense upon the localities because the conservative machine politicians of the State could not forget the fact that they had been forced by "damnyankees" to establish our public-school system and would not, therefore, loosen their hold on the State purse strings.

In 1928, when the burden upon the localities almost reached the breaking point, the machine in control of Virginia politics chose to relieve the burden of the localities by taking over the public roads rather than by taking over the public schools, despite the fact that the Virginia Constitution imposed upon the State the burden of establishing and maintaining an efficient system of public free schools throughout the State. Incidentally, the State also took over practically all sources of taxation except real estate and tangible personal property.

As was to be expected, the constantly increasing popularity of our public schools and especially of our high schools again overburdened the localities. Since 1937 friends of public education have been demanding that the State make increased appropriations for public-school purposes. In 1940, again in 1942, and again in 1944 the machine politicians grudgingly increased State appropriations for public schools, but in each instance much less than the situation demanded, even though the State treasury showed a large surplus.

The striking thing in connection with the 1944 general assembly, which convened shortly after a special session thereof had set aside a fund with which to pay the entire State debt, was that it met with an enormous surplus accumulated at the expense of 17,000 underpaid public-school teachers and still refused to increase to $1,200 per year per teacher unit the State appropriation for public schools. It made no difference to the machine politicians that the State chamber of commerce had made an exhaustive study and report covering high-school education in Virginia, which showed the necessity for a greatly increased State appropriation for public education, and that the State superintendent of public instruction and the State board of education had recommended the $1,200 per year per teacher unit appropriation as a minimum appropriation.

Nothing that the machine politicians of Virginia could have done would have shown more clearly their contempt for the welfare of the children of school age in Virginia than their refusal to appropriate sufficient money to secure and to hold good public-school teachers during this critical period when efficient public-school teachers are being lured away from classrooms by offers of a living wage from industries of all kinds, and their places are being filled, if they are filled at all, by high-school graduates. Nothing that these politicians could have done would have shown more clearly their power over the people of Virginia who are denied the right to vote.

But another red-letter day for public education has dawned.

The spring conference of the Virginia Association of School Trustees (school board members), at Hotel Roanoke on May 1, proved to be the most significant meeting of friends of public education since the May campaign of 1905.

Representatives of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the Virginia Manufacturers Association, the Virginia State Chamber of Commerce, the League of Virginia Municipalities, and the Association of Virginia Counties joined hands with the president of the National Education Association, the president and the executive secretary of the Virginia Education Association, the president of the Virginia Branch of the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, the superintendent and the assistant superintendent of public instruction of Virginia, two members of the State board of education, the president of the Association of School Superintendents, the president of the Association of School Trustees, and many other notables in the field of public education in Virginia, to discuss the past, the present, and the future of public education in Virginia, and to make plans to meet the crisis with which the public-school system of Virginia is now confronted.

It was the considered opinion of those present that the past of public education in Virginia is deplorable because the General Assembly of Virginia refused to take seriously the constitutional mandate to establish and maintain an efficient system of public free schools throughout the State; that the present of public education in Virginia is critical because the appropriation of State funds for public schools at the last session of the general assembly was not sufficient to secure and to hold efficient teachers in the face of competition of industries of all kinds; and that the future of public education in Virginia must be made brighter because education is a necessity, not a luxury, and because both the State of Virginia and the United States are financially able to pay the bill.

When business leaders and public educators reach an agreement along these lines, it can truly be said that another red-letter day for public education has come and that it is time for "machine" politicians to tremble in their boots.

St. Lawrence River Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Seaway and Power Project," which appeared in the Rutland Herald of May 10, 1944.

I also ask unanimous consent to have inserted an editorial entitled "St. Lawrence Development Could Play Major Role in Post-war Employment Plans," which appeared in the Montpelier Argus of May 10.

In connection with this editorial I wish to state that there is one slight error in it. The estimate that the St. Lawrence project would furnish employment for 100,000 men over a 4-year period was not made by the War Department engineers, but those were figures presented by the Niagara Frontier Planning Board when that organization appeared in opposition to the plan a few years ago.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Rutland (Vt.) Herald of May 10, 1944]

SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT

Two recent addresses on the St. Lawrence seaway and power project by Senator AIKEN in Rutland and at Watertown, N. Y., have created considerable local discussion. We are prefacing our comment on the St. Lawrence development with the statement that this paper is for it, because we think it will benefit Vermont as well as the rest of the country in the long run from an economic standpoint.

Whether an individual, corporation, or organization is in favor of the St. Lawrence development or against it, however, will not affect the desirability of making plans to take advantage of its benefits and to attempt to forestall its detrimental aspects. Many business interests have long opposed the project, but we doubt that realistic industrialists have failed to outline a strategy of action for the day when the development is authorized by Congress.

Senator AIKEN has offered a glowing picture of the benefits to be derived by Vermont, New York, and the Nation as a whole from cheap power and a new transportation medium which will be provided by development of the St. Lawrence. He has not analyzed so far the arguments of the opposition, and he hasn't dwelt upon the detrimental aspects of the project upon some individuals, interests, and sections of the country, as they may be expected to develop.

The opposition side of the case is important primarily because all drawbacks of the proposal should be carefully examined and every effort made to modify them by careful advance planning.

There are two points relating to the development which were not discussed in all details by Senator AIKEN, and which we consider important. One is the question of low power rates and their effect on industrial development in Vermont. Cheap power encourages new industries and expansion of industrial activity. While private utilities cannot compete with power delivered in Vermont at 2 mills per kilowatt-hour, it would help their business if they could buy such power.

Industrial power rates in Vermont are comparatively low already. The last Government figures we have at hand show Vermont considerably lower on industrial rates than any neighboring State. In fact Virginia is the nearest State geographically to Vermont which has industrial rates lower than ours. Cheap power from the St. Lawrence would improve our position in this respect and place the State in an even more advantageous position on industrial power rates, except, of course, in competition with New York, which now has, or did have, among the highest industrial power rates of any State in the country.

A second point which is particularly important to this section of the State, which the Senator mentioned only generally, is the effect the St. Lawrence development would have on the Rutland Railroad. It seems to be generally understood that the Rutland would lose some of the business it now has and has had for many years, if the seaway is built.

It has been argued that in time there would be enough new industrial development resulting from the seaway and power project to give the Rutland Railroad a new lease on life. However true that hopeful prediction may be, the Rutland is in a condition which requires as much attention to short term economic influences as to the long-range viewpoint, if not more.

The railroad's condition makes it necessary to investigate any possibilities for new business as soon as the war is over. The Rutland road cannot wait for industrial expansion to come 10 or 12 years hence. If construction on the seaway is started immediately after the war, it would seem to offer the biggest and best chance so far for new business. The Rutland should stand to benefit more by the business activity which would be stimulated during construction of the seaway than any other railroad. It has been estimated that the services of 100,000 men for 4 years would be required to complete the project. This activity, requiring thousands of tons of construction materials, would be going on in any area serviced by the Rutland Railroad.

We know of no other post-war project or possibility which offers an equal opportunity to the railroad.

[From the Montpelier (Vt.) Evening Argus of May 10, 1944]

ST. LAWRENCE DEVELOPMENT COULD PLAY MAJOR ROLE IN POST-WAR EMPLOYMENT PLANS

Much has been said about the economic and industrial facets of the proposed St. Lawrence River power and seaway development bill introduced by Senator GEORGE AIKEN, of Vermont, and aside from those needed constructive aids is the fact that this great undertaking, as a post-war project, would employ some 100,000 men, 80 percent of them skilled or semiskilled, over a 4-year period, and a majority of them hired from the ranks of the returning war veterans. The tremendous undertaking of the St. Lawrence project would mean more than the surface hiring of 100,000 men—it means the support of a half million people, business for the railroads, the coal mines. More than that, too, it would play a major role in obviating such make-work projects as the W. P. A. and relief rolls, projects which have been proved to be of humiliating nature but which may have to be resorted to if the returning veterans cannot find honest jobs. If the St. Lawrence undertaking will require these 100,000 workmen (the figures presented by War Department engineers) then it will stand out as one of the most important public works that can be undertaken.

There is enough work in our 48 States that ought to be done to give the returning servicemen honest jobs that are worthwhile in every sense of the word. The United States is a growing Nation, and economic life is far from static, as may be seen in the statistics that the electrical output has increased from 14,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours in 1914, to 220,000,000,000 in 1943.

The opponents of the seaway, maintaining that the project should not be undertaken because it would require the labor of so many men, have themselves made one of the most potent arguments in favor of its construction—the providing of work for thousands of returning soldiers in the post-war years.

The Columbia Basin Project—Today and Tomorrow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAL HOLMES

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 10, 1944

Mr. HOLMES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of F. A. Banks, Regional Director, Bureau of Reclamation, before the Seattle Chamber of Commerce, Seattle, Wash., on Friday, April 28, 1944:

The Cascades, which I crossed yesterday to accept this invitation to address you, form, as you know, the barrier which holds back from the eastern half of the State rain clouds drifting in off the sea, and makes it necessary, if we are to have sustained agricultural production in eastern Washington to utilize the water in our streams. This is the mountain range which corrals the cloud formations along the coast and causes this area to be showered by copious quantities of rainfall.

I wondered, as I crossed these mountains, if this natural obstruction, which so distinctly divides this State into semiarid and humid halves, is not also somewhat of a barrier, unnecessarily so, to the ready exchange of information and knowledge between the two sections. If this is true, it is high time, figuratively speaking, that we leveled these high peaks as we have literally leveled some of the hills at Grand Coulee Dam. For it is of paramount importance to the welfare of the State and to this region that you be fully cognizant of the results accomplished to date by the Bureau of Reclamation on the Columbia Basin project and understand thoroughly the many benefits that the State and this region will reap from its full development.

Engrossed in lumbering and trade, I suspect that some of you have been inclined in the past to look upon these lands somewhat as an empty backyard. But, as in other respects, time marches on. The first major step toward the development of these resources—the construction of the Grand Coulee Dam and its large power plant—has, in a very real sense, been the reason why Seattle and other coast cities have been able to take their important part in the prosecution of the war. The advancement of the development will aid materially in the solution of post-war problems, which I know many of you view with considerable apprehension. If you choose to make it so, this great region east of you can become an increasingly important and attractive part of your front yard.

Perhaps the Bureau of Reclamation has not been boasting enough about what it has done and is doing toward enriching your commonwealth—about progress on the project in the production of electric power for war and in laying a solid foundation for the post-war development and settlement of a million acres of desert land. To bring you up to date in both the fields of power and reclamation is the objective of my talk here today.

While I will confine my remarks primarily to the Columbia Basin Project, I want to point out that our interest in the Pacific Northwest is not limited to this development. There are many proposals for irrigation in this region, and we are launching a region-wide survey of the various proposals with the object of formulating a comprehensive post-war construction program. The Bureau of Reclamation is making numerous similar studies throughout the West with the same goal in mind. Incidently, the work in this area and elsewhere will be greatly facilitated through the recent establishment by Commissioner of Reclamation Harry W. Bashore of six regional field offices, headed by Regional Directors of Reclamation. This decentralization seeks to bring the Bureau in closer touch with the people affected by its functions and with area problems and the needs and potentialities of each area. The region for which I have been given responsibility embraces, in addition to the State of Washington, the States of Oregon and Idaho, and the Snake River drainage basin in Wyoming.

On the Columbia Basin Project, production of electric power now holds the spotlight. Electric energy is one of the basic yardsticks by which this Nation's capacity for war may be measured. In modern war the strength of armies and navies is gauged by the industrial power behind them. Behind 90 percent of American industrial might is electricity. Highly essential in times of peace, it is a matter of life and death in time of war. Every new kilowatt brought into service has helped add to the mighty crescendo of thundering planes, tanks, guns, and ships that are destroying the evil forces arraigned against us. As the result of Yankee initiative and perseverance, the combined capacity of this country's powerplants is today without parallel in the history of the world.

But we were not always leaders in electric-power capacity. When the war clouds first gathered the yardstick found the United States short. It was producing a third less energy than the Axis Powers, and we had to stretch our muscles to the utmost to catch up with the threat across the seas.

The Pacific Northwest's natural resources played a major role in erasing our national power deficit and in accelerating the output of fighting equipment and supplies. When an unprecedented demand for power for war production suddenly developed at the start of the war, the Bureau of Reclamation with its plant at Grand Coulee Dam, the Corps of Engineers of the War Department with Bonneville Dam, public and private agencies in Seattle, Tacoma, and other cities, and the Bonneville Power Administration, which distributes Grand Coulee and Bonneville energy, were prepared to meet the challenge.

Those who shouted "white elephant" during the building of the Grand Coulee Dam saw it turn into one of the greatest "work horses" the Nation has ever seen. More than 90 percent of its power output goes into war service, either directly over Federal transmission lines or indirectly over the lines of private companies. Between 800,000 and 900,000 kilowatts are now being generated, and there is capacity in the plant for more than twice that total. By way of comparison, and without seeming to speak disparagingly about the two systems serving this area, the present output at Grand Coulee Dam is about three times the combined production of all the plants operated by City Light and the Puget Sound Power & Light Co.

Three years ago last month the powerhouse at Grand Coulee was an empty shell. Not a kilowatt of electricity was being produced. Today, on the basis of output of the last 3 months, it is the world's largest power producer, its monthly gross generation averaging about 600,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

The Grand Coulee installation is the key link in the Pacific Northwest power grid system through which 150 generating plants, publicly and privately owned, in Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, and Utah, have been interconnected to make available to war industry every single kilowatt-hour in the region. This vast network of transmission lines, 13,000 miles in length, serves an installed capacity of 3,353,500 kilowatts—equivalent to that of all the power plants in the New England States. From 33 to 38 percent of the power transmitted by the Northwest power pool in the 5-State area is contributed by the Grand Coulee generators.

The immense blocks of Federal power made available in the Pacific Northwest has made possible its amazing industrial growth. Energy from Grand Coulee and Bonneville Dams drives half a dozen large aluminum plants and a magnesium plant, which, to a large extent, were instrumental in overcoming the pre-Pearl Harbor superiority of the Axis in the manufacture of these important light metals.

Energy for the biggest carbide plant west of the Mississippi comes from the two huge Federal dams through the Northwest power grid. Also served by this system are metallurgical plants, major shipyards, important air bases, Army, Navy, and Coast Guard bases, including a naval training unit, an Army quartermaster depot, a holding and reconsignment depot, airfields, and other military encampments.

The expansion of power-generating facilities for war will offer the Pacific Northwest a challenge in times of peace. We must assure the continuance of huge production to provide security and good life for all the people after the war has been won. We cannot tolerate idle generators, for if we do, we must tolerate idle industrial capacity, and if we tolerate idle industrial capacity, we must tolerate idle men. If we accept idle men, we will find ourselves in the midst of another emergency as perilous to the democratic way of life as is the present conflict.

Not only is it imperative that we utilize our newly found power in the furtherance of the peacetime pursuit of happiness, but if this region is to grow from its present state of economic immaturity to full stature of industrial and agricultural supremacy, we must harness additional quantities of the greatest potential block of cheap hydroelectric power in America.

We are inclined to, but we must not, take our natural resources as a matter of course. Said a California newspaper recently: "If the Columbia River would only flow through Los Angeles County, you could give Detroit and Pittsburgh back to the Indians. In such a case, southern California would be the greatest industrial empire in America."

We cannot sit in a rocking chair on the back porch while the other sections are "making hay." For this vast electrical empire, which we have just begun to build in this region, is yet in its infancy. It was little more than 60 years ago that the steamship Willamette, equipped with arc lights, steamed into nearby Elliott Bay, cast anchor, and exhibited the first electric light in the State of Washington. The first major hydroelectric plant in this half of the State was built but 40 years ago at Snoqualmie Falls. Even today we have developed less than a fifth of the potential water power available in the Pacific Northwest, the present combined hydro installation in the States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho being about two and one-third million kilowatts as compared with a potential capacity of 15,000,000 kilowatts. Thirteen million of these are in the Columbia River and its tributaries.

Just as power produced at Grand Coulee Dam has filled a critical need in the Pacific Northwest during the war, so will development of the Columbia Basin play a major role in the region's conversion to a peacetime economy.

Because circumstances beyond our control have prevented a start upon construction of the irrigation works, some people have assumed that we have been idle on that phase of the project. Nothing, I assure you, is farther from the truth. In the remaining time allotted to me, I want to tell you about the place, as we of the Bureau of Reclamation see it, which the irrigation project can assume in the post-war period and about the preparations we have been making to assure that it does take that place.

The contributions which development of the irrigation project can make toward cushioning the impact of post-war demobilization are of two general sorts. First, in the construction of dams and canals and other irrigation facilities, employment can be immediately provided for thousands of men discharged from the armed services and war factories. If circumstances require it more men can be employed than were put to work on the construction of the Grand Coulee Dam during the slack employment period of the middle 1930's. Secondly, as canal construction is advanced down the hundred-mile length of the project, opportunities for permanent settlement will be opened for thousands of other families. In addition, of course, these developments by the Bureau will prime the pump for a related expansion in private construction and business.

How hard the demobilization may hit the Pacific Northwest you are undoubtedly better qualified to gage than I. In the minds of people who have studied the problem from a national standpoint, however, this region ranks high in prospective difficulties of post-war adjustment. With respect to your city, it is my understanding, studies of your chamber indicate that, even excepting the tremendous wartime expansion of the Boeing plant and of your shipbuilding industry, no less than 22 percent of all local industrial employees are working with firms which have no background of peacetime production. The prospects of maintaining wartime levels of employment, I dare say, are problematical in your minds, insofar as the years immediately following the war are concerned.

As one who grew up at the opposite side of the Nation, and then became attached to this part of the country, I can understand and I take heart in the fact, as I am sure you do likewise, that so many of the newcomers attracted here by war industries want and plan to stay. In the long-term growth of the Pacific Northwest the availability of adequate opportunities cannot be questioned. It is the readjustment immediately following the war which may be difficult, and which promises to tax our ingenuity and our preparedness.

Everyone hopes that the plans you in private business are preparing will assure a smooth transition from the war economy to a prosperous peacetime economy. We of the Bureau of Reclamation also have definite progress to report. Moreover, our plans promise to complement the developments initiated by private industry.

The Columbia Basin project is ideal as a post-war undertaking because the speed of the construction can be readily geared to the volume of employment needs. In the event that private industry is able to meet work demands, a relatively slow development, at a rate of perhaps 50,000 acres or less per year over a 20- to 25-year period, will be in order. If, however, it becomes necessary to take up slack in employment, the irrigation development can be hastened just as the anticipated peacetime schedule of power production at Grand Coulee Dam to meet war demands was multiplied many times. The construction will, of course, not be just a program to create work. Even if the job is done at a maximum rate, the contribution of every laborer will have tangible and lasting value in the many benefits that will accrue from the irrigation development.

The construction of the irrigation facilities will be a bigger undertaking than the building of the Grand Coulee Dam. About 140,000,000 man-hours of labor at the site—twice as much as has been expended to bring the dam and power plant to its present stage—will be required.

Furthermore, the Bureau's building activities will serve to stimulate a great development of private construction and energize activity in business channels of the Pacific Northwest. Farms will need irrigation machinery, houses, barns, and other structures, wells must be drilled, domestic water systems installed, and roads constructed to join farms with the towns. The new communities and existing ones will require additional housing, public and business buildings, paving, water and sewer systems, and electrical distribution systems. Jobbers will do a brisk trade in construction machinery, and retailers and wholesalers in clothes, automobiles, radios, and other supplies and equipment needed by the workers.

The number of settlement opportunities that can be made available each year, as the canals are extended, will depend, of course, upon the rate of construction. At a relatively slow rate, water can be brought to about a thousand farms a year over a period of about 20 years. With the rate of construction accelerated, the number of settlement opportunities available annually, would, of course, be increased accordingly. For every family taking up land, one additional family will find livelihood in the villages and towns that will spring up in the wake of the development, and a third family, elsewhere in the Nation, will gain a living by providing the farm implements, automobiles, etc., which residents of the new communities and farms will require.

At full development, the project area should support 200,000 to 250,000 people, and some estimates go substantially beyond these figures. That is to say, the 1940 population of eastern Washington would be increased by 50 percent. You probably would welcome the business involved in developing from scratch, let us say, a city the size of Tacoma. Although the character of the demands involved in developing the Columbia Basin Project obviously will be different, that development will be like adding two pre-war Tacomas to the State, insofar as the number of people are concerned.

To bring the potentialities of the Columbia Basin into being, to give the project development its significant and appropriate place in post-war years, three things will be required: One, the appropriation of funds by Congress; two, the support and active participation in the development and settlement program by the people of the State and region, and by their agencies; and three, the completion of a workable plan by the Bureau of Reclamation—an understandable and acceptable blueprint—ready to put into effect.

We do not anticipate that Congress will make appropriations for construction available before the close of the war, or at least not until the end of the war can be foreseen more clearly than at present.

Certain groups within the State and region have been giving us loyal support and are participating enthusiastically in the formulation of project plans. That active interest must become more widespread and later find expression in State programs if the State and this region are to reap maximum benefits from the development.

Now, finally, what has the Bureau of Reclamation been doing to get a blueprint ready? The work accomplished covers so much territory that I shall be able to give you only the highlights.

Among the first steps taken toward ultimate irrigation of the project, after reconnaissance surveys indicated that more than a million acres of land were suited to irrigation, was to determine in detail exactly what the project lands were like and what they were worth. These steps involved: (1) A retracement survey of section lines; (2) a very detailed topographic survey; (3) a classification of lands to determine their utility under irrigation; and (4) an appraisal of the lands at their present dry-land value. Under antispeculation legislation, the noninflated appraisal values are the prices at which lands will be available to settlers.

These four basic studies were completed some time ago, and many of you are familiar with them. The classification and appraisal data for any tract in the project are available free of charge, upon request, at the Coulee Dam office of the Bureau, and no prospective settler should purchase land without first having obtained this information. There is no need to pay more for land than the appraised value.

One of the most important elements of the blueprint for the development of the Columbia Basin, obviously, is the layout of the dams and canals of the irrigation system. During the past 3 years the Bureau has made exhaustive studies to determine the most feasible location of these features. No less than 19 different plans have been considered. The most desirable plan has been selected and approved, and work will now go ahead on the detailed design for structures and on detailed field locations of the canals so that a great folio of work will be ready for immediate use when construction can be begun.

Design data for major features of the irrigation system are being accumulated rapidly. Preparation of designs for the pumping plant at Grand Coulee Dam and for its equipment has a high priority in our engineering office in Denver, and the work is well advanced. The 12 pumps to be installed, incidentallly, will be the largest in the world. Each will be capable of pumping a stream of water 12 feet in diameter. Just one pump operating only 1½ hours would meet all the needs of the city of Seattle for 24 hours.

The short canal leading from the outlets of the pumping plant to the balancing reservoir in the Grand Coulee has been designed and its final location in the field has been made. We are prepared to place this work under contract on short notice.

More than 75 percent of the land required for the balancing reservoir in the Grand Coulee has been purchased. Foundation drilling for the two dams which will form this reservoir has been completed and construction materials have been located. Specifications can be issued with little delay. Similar work has been completed for the dam at the foot of Long Lake, farther down the main canal, and drilling is well advanced at the site of the dam in the Potholes area behind which the return flow from the northern third of the project will be recaptured for use in irrigating areas to the south. This reservoir will be about 10 miles long and 5 miles wide. Final locations have been made for about 20 miles of main canal and preliminary locations for another 200 miles. The site for the Pasco pumping plant and its canals and laterals, which will serve 15,000 acres direct from the Columbia River in the vicinity of Pasco, has been selected and specifications can be issued quickly.

The land surveys and the layout of the irrigation system are basic preparations for bringing water to the Columbia Basin, but our concern does not stop with the mere delivery of water. The man who takes that water and uses it—the settler—is, in a sense, the keystone of the project.

To insure that the conditions under which settlement takes place provide the settler with every reasonable prospect for success, a comprehensive series of investigations of settlement and development problems were launched in 1939. Because the problems have local and State significance, and because their solutions will necessitate local and State action, the investigations were set up on a cooperative basis. Committees composed of representatives of local, State, and Federal agencies have been studying 28 separate but related problems. These studies, known as the Columbia Basin joint investigations, are now largely completed.

The reports of the investigating committees are not designed to collect dust on official shelves, and many recommendations which lie within the province of Federal action have already been put in force. The recommendations in other reports, in which representatives of State and local agencies have participated, will call for action by local and State groups. That needed action, we trust, will receive your consideration and support at the appropriate time.

Of key importance among recent preparations for the development of the project, which spring in part from the studies mentioned, is the Columbia Basin Project Act of March 10, 1943. The new act, which strengthens and supersedes the original Antispeculation Act of 1937, incorporates important changes relative to the size of the farm units to be established. Whereas the farm sizes were restricted by the act of 1937 to 40 acres for a single man and 80 acres for man and wife, the new act permits subdividing the land into farm units of such size, considering soil, topography, location, and other factors as will support an average-sized family at a satisfactory level of living. Sizes, recommended by one of the investigating groups, range from 45 to 60 acres on lands of the best class to 100 to 160 acres on lands of the poorest class for which water will be provided.

In accordance with recommendations of another committee, the act permits adjustment of farm boundaries to topography in such a manner that irrigation and other farm operations can be carried on with maximum ease and at minimum costs. Rights-of-way for a road net, in locations proposed by another committee, can be incorporated in the farm plats.

Also important is the provision of the act which gives the Federal Government authority to purchase project lands from private owners, to subdivide them into farm units, and to sell or lease them on equitable terms to settlers. This provision was found necessary for a number of reasons. It was demanded by the large landowners in the project area. Under the act which seeks to establish settlement opportunities for as many families as possible, these landowners will be allowed water for not more than 160 irrigable acres. To obtain water for such acreage, they must agree to dispose of their excess lands at the Government-appraised value. Inasmuch as many of these landowners hold hundreds, or even thousands, of acres, they would be compelled to subdivide their lands and go into the real-estate business in order to meet the project requirements unless the Government stood ready to buy up all of their excess land in one transaction. Hence, they urged a provision of the kind included in the act.

This provision also will afford the means for applying a settler-selection program. It has been demonstrated on other Bureau of Reclamation projects in the West that selection of settlers on the basis of experience, capital, and other qualifications is of great value in helping to protect from failure both the settlers and the projects. Such a selection can be made, of course, only for lands owned by the Federal Government. But 2 percent of the irrigable area of the project is now in the public domain. Funds for land purchase have not yet been made available.

The act of March 10, 1943, also provides that lands acquired by the Government may be used for town sites, and dedicated for public purposes. This will assist in the establishment of new towns in places best calculated to serve the needs of the settlers, and least apt to create wasteful competition between towns, which so commonly results in loss to everyone concerned except the promoter. Ability to dedicate lands acquired for public purposes will be helpful in developing an adequate system of parks and recreational areas. Major responsibility for such a program, however, will rest with the State. A thorough report on this matter has been prepared. The proposals in it are among those for which energetic State action will be required.

Before any construction work may be done on the canal system, a contract for the repayment of that part of the construction costs of the project allocated by the Secretary of Interior as repayable by irrigation must be negotiated between the Federal Government and the irrigation districts. The Bureau of Reclamation last month held preliminary discussions concerning the contracts with the boards of the districts, and a draft of contract, which promises to be acceptable to the Government and the districts, is now being prepared for presentation to the water users this summer.

You will be interested in some of the proposed provisions of the contract. The amount which the districts will repay for construction of the irrigation works will average $85 per irrigable acre. The total construction costs per acre will considerably exceed this figure, but the balance above $85 per acre will be paid out of power revenues. Extensive and difficult studies of project-cost allocations preceded the official establishment of the $85 per acre average construction obligation. The Federal Treasury is to be reimbursed for the entire cost of the project, except for a small allocation to navigation and flood control.

The terms of the repayment are very reasonable. No payments will fall due during a 10-year-development period. Thereafter, farmers will pay off the indebtedness in 40 annual installments. Those payments, moreover, will be adjusted in accordance with what is known as the normal and percentage plan. Without going into detail that plan involves adjustment of the average annual installment up or down in accordance with the relative value of the crop return. That is to say, in years of higher than average crop returns, the annual payments will be higher than the average payments, and conversely, in years of lower than average crop returns, when the farmer needs relief in meeting payments, the amounts paid will be lower than average.

The burden of repayment will be equitably adjusted in another way. Everyone is well aware that the better lands in the project are more productive and will yield more than the poorer lands. The land classification was made in part to discover those differences in productivity. The better lands, therefore, can afford, without hardship, to contribute more to the cost of construction than the poorer lands. Accordingly, the amount allocated to lands of better than average quality will be more than $85 per irrigable acre and the amount allocated to lands of less than average productivity will be less than that amount. This adjustment will serve to give settlers on lands of differing qualities equal opportunities, and minimize the unfair burdens and not infrequent failures which have commonly been associated with poorer lands during the past.

These are some of the steps we have taken to insure that the conditions which the settler will face in the Columbia Basin are as favorable as possible for his success, and for the success of the project. Many other proposals directed to the same ends are springing from the work of the investigating committees. For example, the cost per farm of a domestic water system is apt to be excessive because ground water lies at comparatively great depths. It has been demonstrated that the cost per farm may be reduced from $1,000 or $1,500 to a few hundred dollars if a community system capable of serving several farms is installed instead of an individual well being sunk on each farm. Exhaustive studies also have been made of the types of farming which promise to yield the most satisfactory returns.

The results of all of these studies will be made available to the settler. The findings are tools, so to speak, made accessible to him. If used effectively, they will help in the task ahead of him. No one supposes, however, that they will automatically guarantee his success. That clearly will depend upon his individual initiative and ability.

As I have indicated earlier, many of the proposals made, and others to be suggested shortly by committees, on which State and local agencies have membership, lie largely or entirely within the jurisdiction of State and local agencies. I might cite the program advocating the establishment of State parks at some of the unusual and scenic sites in and close to the project area, or I might draw your advance attention to the State action which will be suggested by a committee, headed by your State planning council, to enable counties of the project area to discharge effectively the enlarged functions with which they will be faced when the project is developed. The prompt provision of roads will be another responsibility of State and counties. The counties, without adequate resources during earlier years, may well require financial assistance from the State. The provision of school facilities, as required, also lies within the province of State and local agencies.

I think it is clear by now that all of the major lines are entered on our blueprint for development of the Columbia Basin. Only relatively minor details have yet to be added. With adequate appropriations, we could start putting the plans into effect the day the irrigation districts, through adoption of the repayment contract, assume obligation for return of their portion of the construction cost.

In conclusion, let me say that of the 150 to 200 potential irrigation and multiple-purpose projects which the Bureau of Reclamation is investigating in the West, the development of the Columbia Basin rates as the No. 1 post-war development—first because of its huge size and the flexibility its construction affords in gaging employment to post-war needs, first because of the extent to which it will enrich the area in which it is situated, first because the plans for its construction are furthest advanced, and first because of the wholehearted and universal approval and support which the State and the region in which it is to be developed are giving it.

Address by Mrs. Emma Guffey Miller at Convention of General Federation of Women's Clubs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Mrs. Emma Guffey Miller, member of the advisory board of the National Woman's Party, at the convention of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, St. Louis, Mo., April 26, 1944. The Public Printer estimates that the address will occupy two and two-third pages of the RECORD, and that the printing will cost $138.66.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It has been 30 years since the General Federation of Women's Clubs endorsed the suffrage amendment. Many of you are too young to remember that momentous occasion, but those of you who do, know that it was this endorsement that put the suffrage amendment on the high road to victory. Today, I believe you are on the verge of another great endorsement—that of the equal rights amendment, which will be the final step in the long struggle for the emancipation of American women.

The opposition to the equal rights amendment comes as nothing strange, for all progressive ideas are opposed by persons and organizations who, though they may be sincere, seem to lack true vision—"the broad horizon's wider view." One of the most amusing chapters in the history of our country will be the story of the women who organized against their political freedom through antisuffrage leagues, but the most incomprehensible chapter of the world's history is being made right now and right here in our own country where women, who once worked for suffrage, now oppose the equal-rights amendment, which is but a corollary to the suffrage amendment. The suffrage amendment gave us only political freedom. We should now be granted legal and civil freedom.

The equal-rights amendment reads: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex." We might understand that some men do not approve of equality under the law for women because it might interfere with their personal position or gain, but it seems incredible that women should organize to oppose other women who desire equality for all women. The opposition to the equal-rights amendment comes mostly from women whose motives may be humanitarian but whose sense of justice is still dulled by a Lady Bountiful approach of the mid-Victorian era.

When our Constitution was written it was based on the old English common law which considered women as chattels. Though our Constitution gives the greatest measure of liberty to the people of the United States, the courts generally have interpreted the laws in the light of the eighteenth century when women were not persons and, therefore, when women have been removed from the chattel class it has had to be done by special statutes. The latest available report of the legal status of women in the United States by the Department of Labor, states: "Any conclusions bearing on woman's status under the laws of the United States of America must take into account the common law, on which the fabric of the Nation's jurisprudence is woven. In general, it has been the rule that where specific statutes abrogating them have not been enacted, common-law principles apply." Hence, the need for the equal rights amendment as a part of the Constitution. I believe most of our opponents acknowledge that justice should not be based on sex, but until the principle of equal rights, like other basic principles such as freedom of religion, speech, press, etc., is placed in the Constitution, laws discriminating against women merely because they are women can continue to be enacted by State legislatures.

In a public debate on this question about 2 years ago, Miss Mary Anderson, director of the Women's Bureau, Department of Labor, was asked if she believed "that justice should be meted out impartially to men and women." Her reply was: "It should not. I think justice has to be tempered with law and justice cannot be legislated. It is a matter of justice between men and women in everyday life, which no law can ever meet." A jurist, when reading that statement, remarked: "Justice is something fundamental. Laws are passed to insure justice and justice to be real must apply to all alike." Over the main portal of the beautiful white marble edifice which houses the Supreme Court in Washington are carved the words "Equal Justice Under Law." When Miss Anderson was asked why those words were there, her reply was: "Because we in this country are having equal justice under the law, but that does not mean we should have equal justice all through life." Why not? Isn't justice through life the aim of democratic governments? Now, I admire Miss Anderson for her long years of work to better the conditions of women and children in industry but I feel that her work has blinded her to what constitutes justice because her entire thought is centered only on women in industry and not on the millions of other women, who together with women in industry, suffer under unjust and unfair legal discriminations. Only last year Miss Anderson wrote "women are still the lowest paid workers." Why? Because for the most part women are still paid on the basis of sex.

Life is more than at the half-way mark for many of us and, therefore, it is for our children and our children's children that we must work and plan because in them we feel we have an earthly immortality and, as citizens of this great country, we want to insure for them the fullest measure of freedom and justice.

The United States Government almost daily makes a plea for women between the ages of 21 and 45 to join the Women's Army Corps which when first formed was under the Army. Now it is a part of the Army, just the same as the regiment in which your sons may serve. Among other enticements in this Government broadcast, the offer is made that any young woman wishing to join the service may have several choices of jobs in the flying forces—she may ferry planes, she may work on the ground in various branches of the service; she may be sent overseas and may be ordered to carry a weapon to protect herself when she is in some lonely outpost transmitting radio messages for the safety of thousands of fighting men. Though there is a small proportion of married women among the WAC's, WAVES, Women's Marine Corps, SPARS, and WASPS, the majority of these famous organizations is made up of unmarried women and thus they can control their own property and earnings.

However, when the war is ended and these young women will marry and assume the duties of wives and mothers, they will no longer have the freedom they had before they said those binding words "I do." Let us suppose that one of them marries and settles down in sunny California and aids her husband in business. According to the California law, all property acquired after marriage is under joint ownership of husband and wife. This seems an excellent idea. However, at the death of the husband, the wife pays a tax on all this property acquired after marriage, but at the death of the wife, the husband pays no tax. Should one marry a generous West Virginian, who in the first happiness of married joy presents her with some property, she had better make sure he is not in debt for her property becomes liable for her husband's debts.

The aftermath of every war has meant that more women are obliged to earn a livelihood for, after the death of so many men, there just aren't enough husbands to go around and many unmarried women and wives are obliged to earn a livelihood to help out in the family income. Thus, should one of these new wives wish to enlarge the family income by taking a position, she better not choose Vermont or Virginia as a residence, where the husband will have the right to control her earnings. Nor should she move to Georgia, for there her husband may control her earnings unless there is some agreement to the contrary.

Some of these young women will naturally feel that their experiences have fitted them to engage in business, but they should not marry anyone from North Carolina or Texas, for there the husband will have to go to court to make them business women in their own right. Neither should they choose Nevada, for there the husband's creditors may prevent them from becoming business women in their own right. It would be a mistake to go to Michigan, for there they will have to have the husband's consent to enjoy their own earnings. In the State of New York, if a woman has a job outside the home, what she earns belongs to her, but if she does sewing or keeps boarders or engages in other business within the home her husband, even a drunken one, may take what she earns. In Ohio no woman may drive a taxicab, but in almost every part of the world today American women are driving cars and many of them trucks to help with the war effort.

Naturally, these women look forward to having children, and perhaps at some future date during times of sickness or stress, some of the children under age may try to earn a bit to aid the household. However, I want to warn any married women who live in Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, District of Columbia, Pennsylvania, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New York, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Vermont, Virginia, or Wyoming, that the father has the right to the custody, services, and earnings of the children.

It may happen that the husband gets into some legal difficulty but if she lives in Indiana, the wife may not assume liability for her husband, however much she may desire to do so. Perhaps, through the sufferings of war, later on the husband may need a guardian, but she better not select Florida as a residence, because there the wife cannot serve as such.

Delaware is a fine little State, but whatever property is acquired there after marriage through the cooperative efforts of husband and wife is subject to the husband's control. In the neighboring State of New Jersey, since a married woman cannot make a valid contract of employment with her husband, either express or implied, she cannot recover, under the State's Workmen's Compensation Act, for any injury sustained while rendering service in her husband's business. Way down east, in Maine, though a woman assists her husband in his business, even caring for money which is the product of their joint labor, this does not make any part of the money her property. In the charming State of South Carolina a woman's clothes belong to her husband, but the North goes South Carolina one better, for it is reported that a Michigan judge decided a woman's hair was the property of her husband.

Suppose both husband and wife wish to go into business together and their property is defined as "common." If they live in Arizona, California, Louisiana, New Mexico, Texas, or Washington, the wife's earnings are under the control of the husband.

In some States the bond of a woman will not be accepted, even though she may be a successful businesswoman supporting her husband and family. In my own State of Pennsylvania a man may endorse a note of any sum for a friend, but a married woman dare not put her name down as an endorser even for a few dollars. In most States an unmarried woman is considered competent to handle her own affairs, but once she takes unto herself a husband, she somehow becomes incompetent in some way in every State. Suddenly she becomes a widow, and then she again becomes competent. Is this a reflection on husbands?

There is a curious confusion apparently, in men's minds who have made the laws, as to just when a woman is competent and when she is not. In Missouri, a woman must be 21 to make a valid will, but a man of 18 can will personal property. In Wisconsin a married woman can dispose of her property at 18 but an unmarried woman must be 21. After a careful study of the question, it appears that she is competent or incompetent according to the advantage it brings to a man.

The ambition of all married persons is to own a home and at death, living occupancy may be available to either survivor in 13 States, to the widow in 15 States, but not in Arizona, Idaho, Illinois, Montana, or Nebraska.

Although men have always outnumbered women in the jails and penitentiaries, it is possible that some of these young women we have in mind may commit a crime or get into difficulty which will require a jury trial. The Supreme Court has decided—in the famous Scottsboro case of Alabama—that a Negro man could not have a fair trial unless there were Negro men on the jury panel. However, there is no assurance to our young women that they can have the same justice in Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Carolina, Missouri, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, Wyoming, and what a famous Governor of Maryland used to call "the great free State of Maryland."

Many of the young women doing such wonderful work for freedom in the WAC's, the WAVES, the MARINES, the SPARS, the WASPS, are highly talented in lines other than the work they signed up for, but should some of them be musical, I advise them not to settle in Connecticut. Should they want to earn some extra money there by playing in a band or an orchestra, they are forbidden to do so after 10 o'clock at night. It might be well to add here that night work usually pays better so naturally men musicians in Connecticut feel that women should not stay awake after 10 o'clock, even to play a harp.

I might go on with many warnings and multiplications of discriminations ad infinitum, but I think I have given you sufficient proof for the need of the equal-rights amendment.

To correct State by State the thousand and one injustices under which women now suffer would take a hundred years and then all the gain might be dissipated by the next legislatures; therefore, the only way to make certain that women have equal justice under the law is to add this amendment to the Constitution.

You will recall that 2 years ago there was a very strong movement in Congress to pass a mandatory joint income tax law forcing husbands and wives to make such returns in order to bring in more revenue. This proposal, like many laws in existence, would impose a penalty on marriage, and again make a wife a chattel. Mrs. Roosevelt, in commenting on the joint income tax proposal, said, "some other way of obtaining money would be wiser than a measure which strikes at the roots of a fundamental principle which we in this country have been establishing over a long period of years; the right of women to be considered as persons." There is the heart of our argument—"the right of women to be considered as persons." We are persons everywhere when it comes to paying taxes but we are not persons in many States when it comes to controlling our own income, property, earnings, the right to earn a living, to sit on juries, to contract, etc. Women are not persons and wives are chattels, so in effect ruled the Comptroller General of the United States and two judges in Baltimore. This wasn't in the nineteenth century, but recently in the twentieth century.

We women gladly bear all the burdens and responsibilities of citizenship. Why should we not share all the privileges that go with these responsibilities? In our asking equality before the law, we are not opposing legislation which seeks to raise standards for labor or prevent the exploitation of workers. What we are asking is equal economic opportunity for all and fair legislation for all workers, men and women alike. The Fair Labor Standards Act which affects interstate industry, which is 90 percent of industry, declares for equal pay for equal work. Why should anyone approve of any other principle than the one for which we stand—that wages should be paid not on the sex of the workers but on the work accomplished. When women are unduly restricted in industry by special hours or minimum wage provisions the tendency is lowered wages for all, for during hard times men underbid women and the standard of living is lowered for both. Do you ever hear of men asking for minimum wages for themselves?

There is nothing confusing in the meaning of the amendment. It simply means that under the law all citizens, regardless of sex, shall be equal in rights and that the laws shall not apply one way to men and another to women. Women are now equally amenable to the laws with men and penalities for violation of laws apply equally to women as they do to men, and as previously stated, there is no distinction in rights when it comes to filling tax coffers. The amendment does not mean that all persons are equal any more than the Declaration of Independence means that. What it means is equal opportunity for all. Men's strengths and mentalities differ as women's do. Under the amendment women would have equal rights with other citizens and not be legally handicapped by the Government or suffer under legal discriminations based on sex alone.

When we were struggling for the right to vote we heard a great deal about chivalry, and we were told by statesmen in heartbreaking tones that they did not want us to vote because we were too ethereal to enter such a base building as a voting booth and thus they could better represent us at the polls. There are still men in Congress who tell us they are opposed to the equal-rights amendment because of their chivalrous feelings. One statesman, only a few weeks ago, declared, "In my State we still place women on a pedestal," even though in his State a woman has no control over her earnings, little over her property, and less over her child.

Well, we agree the days of chivalry are not over, but now it goes by another name—protective legislation. Laws forbidding women from working certain hours or in certain occupations are only enacted when women are to be paid for the work; no chivalrous man ever suggests these so-called protective laws apply to women for work for which they receive no pay, nor for work in which men do not want to engage. It is only the competitive woman worker to whom these restrictive wage-and-hour laws apply. New York State passed a law a few years ago forbidding women to work in ice-cream parlors after 10 o'clock at night, when work is easier and tips higher. New York also has a law forbidding women in the printing and binding business to work after certain hours, and thus, when a rush order which might keep her an hour or two longer comes in, she loses the opportunity for overtime pay. Nurses, charwomen, telephone operators, and women in offices do not receive such tender thought. Can it be men do not want these jobs?

The "gay nineties" statesmen have now been joined by certain labor leaders and both not only want to keep women on a pedestal but keep her chained there. However, the war has temporarily broken her chains, for restrictions have been abrogated or winked at for the duration, because we poor weak females are spraying paint on battleships, oiling and cleaning steam engines, directing traffic, operating switches, riveting, welding, and speeding the war effort by filling millions of jobs previously done by men. The latest figure is 18,000,000 women in industry, and a radio call went out early in the month for a million more. There are no longer valid reasons against the amendment, so what possible excuse can there now be for still withholding from women equality of rights under the law?

These opponents are loud in their declarations that they believe in equal opportunity and equal pay for equal work. Why, then, did they not protest when Regional Labor Board III, including the cities of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh, issued an order August 6, 1943, setting different standards of pay for men and women bookkeepers—men to receive $35 a week, women to receive $22.

Most opponents of the amendment base their opposition now almost entirely on laws affecting working women. This is particularly true of the League of Women Voters, which does not even recommend that their members make a study of the amendment, and the two Communist newspapers, the Daily Worker and the New Masses.

Why place working women in a class by themselves? That is not democracy. Why not make all women equal under the law and give all women the right of choice of occupation, hours of work, the right to control their earnings, property, etc., the same as men? There are working women who oppose the amendment because they have made gains under the system of taking half a loaf when they couldn't get a whole, instead of realizing that they may be reduced to a crust, because there is a determined movement among certain labor leaders to take women out of industry. Under the equal-rights amendment they could have the whole loaf.

Protection to properly protect must apply to both men and women. If certain machines and certain chemicals are hazardous and injurious to women, they are to men as well, and both should have equal protection.

Certain labor leaders state that under the equal-rights amendment women would be robbed of their rights and protections. This is entirely contrary to the Fair Labor Standards Act, and what has been done for labor in interstate industries could be done under intrastate industries. The amendment does not require uniformity among the several States. On this point the Senate Judiciary report of 1943 concurs. When the amendment is passed there would be no difficulty in the States adjusting their laws for equal protection for men and women. No rights would be taken away from either workers or the States, except the right which should not exist in a democracy—the right to base justice on sex alone.

Maternity legislation would not be affected by the equal-rights amendment. Under the amendment maternity aid could be granted to certain groups of women on the same principle that would permit aid to certain groups of men, such as pensions to veterans for service in wars. All women are not mothers any more than all men are soldiers.

Aid for dependent children would not be affected by the amendment. Such aid is for the benefit of the children concerned and is money voted for the children alone and may be administered by others than mothers. There would be no difficulty, as some have stated, regarding guardianship of children, as most States give equal guardianship to parents except when living apart, and then the courts decide according to the best interest of the child. The amendment would justly require husbands and wives to be treated equally in regard to the responsibility for support of the other spouse and the children, which is already the case in about one-third of the States with no dire results. In regard to alimony, the amendment would require husband and wife to be treated equally in the matter of support on the dissolution of marriage or during divorce proceedings. This is already the case in 13 States, where no unfortunate results have occurred because this equality was established.

The question is asked, "How would the amendment affect divorce laws?" In Kentucky a wife may not divorce her husband for drunkenness unless it is accompanied by nonsupport and property waste, but drunkenness on the part of the wife (though not accompanied by additional faults) entitled a husband to divorce unless it is shown he is equally at fault. Under the amendment such unjust provisions of law would be done away with in all States and any State could make its own divorce laws provided men and women could be divorced on the same grounds.

Fear has been expressed that under the amendment wives might have to support their husbands. Of course, this is something entirely unheard of, but such a fear has already been realized without the amendment, for in Long Island a judge ordered a woman to support her husband out of her own earnings though they were living apart.

The opposition to the equal-rights amendment comes from various sources; some is sincere, though mistaken; some is based on prejudice; much on fear of women as industrial and business competitors and, alas, much on ignorance of what the amendment really means. Incredible as it seems, there are persons who declare that supporters of equality under the law want to be like men in a physiological sense. This seems too ridiculous to be noticed but let me assure such objectors that under the amendment men would still have the right to be fathers and women to be mothers, but mothers would gain an added dignity and respect by being raised to the same legal status as men.

It has been stated that the words "rights" and "equality" would confuse the courts. May I suggest that anyone who makes this statement regarding the word "rights" is not familiar with the Constitution. The same word is used in our much beloved Bill of Rights. The Supreme Court has made clear in several decisions, one only recently, what the word "equality" means.

According to the wording of the equal-rights amendment, it would not take effect until 5 years after it is passed and thus the States would have ample time to adjust their laws to its provisions.

Every woman member of the General Federation is devoting some part of her life to the war effort. There is nothing that we, as women, would refuse to do in order to save the American way of life. We all believe in the "four freedoms," but how can we advocate those freedoms for the rest of the world when we still deny fully justice here to women?

There is a great invisible weapon which is as necessary to winning the war as any tank, gun, or bomber. It is the source of strength of the Chinese; it is what has kept England from being overwhelmed; it is what has kept Russia from being conquered; it is what has given Norway its strength to resist its Quislings; it is what has kept alive the hope of survival in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Greece. Though invisible it is an invincible weapon forged by the women of freedom-loving nations to protect the future of their children. It is this weapon plus determination which fills the hearts and minds of us women here tonight to make certain that the American way of life is preserved. Alas, however, this invisible and surely victorious weapon is constantly being threatened by the specter of fear—fear that when the war ends women will not have a right to their children, their wages, their property, their right to enter business and all those fundamental American rights which are denied us as women. To sum it up, all we ask is the right to live as free individuals, enjoying the same impartial measure of justice meted out to men. We women are made equal in war—will we want to continue unequal in peace? From all sides come praise for what women are doing to win the war, and we are doing it gladly and proudly. We are giving our times, our money, our strength, and our children. Can we do more?

Yes we can!

Though we cannot bring back from the far-flung battle fronts the men and women who have given their lives in order that we may live in a free world, we can make a better land for the young people who do return by placing both men and women on a status of equality. We are all equal in the sight of God, men and women of whatever race, creed, or color, and within each individual is something divine, something that no outer force can destroy—a God-given longing for justice and freedom that rises above all material things. Take away every external advantage and possession there still remains for each individual that greater thing—"the right under God to call his soul his own." It is the outward expression of this inner right which will come to every American woman through the passage of the equal-rights amendment.

Women of the Federation, you have done so much to enlarge the outlook and advance the interests of the women of the United States, yours is now the glorious opportunity to go forward for the equal-rights amendment. I know you will not fail the millions of other women who are awaiting your decision and your untiring efforts to speed the victory.

Dependency Allowances for Disabled Veterans

REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include with my remarks the text of two amendments which I shall offer to the veterans' bill which is now before the House, unless some other Member does so. Both of those amendments, incidentally, are taken from bills introduced by the chairman of the committee which brings the bill before us and both of them have to do with the provisions for disabled veterans. Both amendments also are directly in line with legislation which has been on the statute books in Canada for many years. One of the amendments will provide for payment of dependent allowances to permanently and totally disabled veterans. The other one will provide for payment by the Veterans' Administration of any net loss suffered by any workman's compensation fund resulting from injury of an employed disabled veteran. The purpose of this latter bill is to remove any prejudice which may now exist against the employment of partially disabled veterans on the ground that they might become injured and thus over a period of time insurance rates might be increased. The fact is that the accident rate as to employed disabled people is frequently lower than that of the able-bodied, but this fact is not widely recognized.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The text of the two amendments follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOORHIS of California: Page 66, line 18, insert a new section, as follows:

"Section 2, part VII, paragraph 5, of Public Law No. 16, approved March 24, 1943, be amended to read as follows:

"'5. (a) It is hereby declared to be the major purpose of rehabilitation to restore employability lost by virtue of a material and permanent handicap due to service-incurred disability. The Administrator shall have the power and duty to cooperate with and employ the facilities of other governmental and State employment agencies for the purpose of placing service-connected disabled veterans in suitable gainful employment.

"'(b) To remove the prejudice against employment of honorably discharged veterans having 10 percent or more service-connected disability, and to aid in securing employment of such veterans, where an injury or death of such veteran is incurred under such circumstances as to result in payment of benefits under State employees' compensation laws or by recovery from or settlement with or on behalf of the employer, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall reimburse the insurer or the fund from which such payment is made to the extent of the net loss suffered by such insurer or fund: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as authorizing payment of benefits under an Employees' Compensation Act for such injury or death, and under paragraph 4 hereof for the same period of time to a veteran or his dependents, but such veteran or his dependents may elect which benefit to receive: And provided further, That the appropriations of the Veterans' Administration shall be available for any expenses incurred under this section.'"

"Paragraph II of part I of veterans regulation No. 1 (a), as amended, be amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(p) (1) If and while the disability is rated total or if and while the person is disabled as set forth in subparagraphs (1), (m), (n), or (o) of this paragraph and where the person has a wife, child, children, dependent parent or parents, the monthly pension, including as to total disability, increased pension, if any, under subparagraph (k) of paragraph II, shall be increased by the following amounts and subject to the conditions specified:

"'(a) If he has a wife but no child living, $25.

"'(b) If he has a wife and one child living, $40.

"'(c) If he has a wife and two children living, $52, and $10 for each additional child.

"'(d) If he has no wife and one child living, $15.

"'(e) If he has no wife and two children, $27, and $10 for each additional child.

"'(f) If he has a mother or father, either or both dependent upon him for support, then in addition to the above amounts, $10 for each parent so dependent.

"'(2) If and while the disability is rated less than total under any one of the subparagraphs (a) or (i), inclusive, of paragraph II of this part and where the person has a wife, child, children, dependent parent or parents, the monthly pension, including increased pension, if any, under subparagraph (k) of paragraph II, shall be increased by a percentage of the increased pension that would be payable while totally disabled under subparagraph (p) (1) above.

"SEC. 2. Paragraph II of part II of Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), as amended, be amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"'(p) (1) If, and while, the disability is rated total, or if, and while, the person is disabled as set forth in subparagraphs (1), (m), (n), or (o) of this paragraph, and where the person has a wife, child, children, dependent parent or parents, the monthly pension, including as to total disability, increased pension, if any, under subparagraph (k) of paragraph II, shall be increased by the following amounts and subject to the conditions specified:

"'(a) If he has a wife but no child living, $25.

"'(b) If he has a wife and one child living, $40.

"'(c) If he has a wife and two children living, $52, and $10 for each additional child.

"'(d) If he has no wife and one child living, $15.

"'(e) If he has no wife and two children living, $27, and $10 for each additional child.

"'(f) If he has a mother or father, either or both dependent upon him for support, then, in addition to the above amounts, $10 for each parent so dependent.

"'(2) If, and while, the disability is rated less than total under any one of the subparagraphs (a) to (i), inclusive, of paragraph II of this part, and where the person has a wife, child, children, dependent parent or parents, the monthly pension, including increased pension, if any, under subparagraph (k) of paragraph II, shall be increased by a percentage of the increased pension that would be payable while totally disabled under subparagraph (p) (1) above.'

"SEC. 3. That paragraph I of part III of Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a), as amended, be amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"'(i) If and while the disability is rated permanent total under paragraph I, part III, and the person has a wife, child, children, dependent parent or parents, the monthly pension under subparagraph (f) of paragraph I of this part shall be increased by the following amounts and subject to the conditions specified:

"'(a) If he has a wife but no child living, $25.

"'(b) If he has a wife and one child living, $40.

"'(c) If he has a wife and two children, $52, and $10 for each additional child.

"'(d) If he has no wife and one child living, $15.

"'(e) If he has no wife and two children living, $27, and $10 for each additional child.

"'(f) If he has a mother or father, either or both dependent upon him for support, then in addition to the above amounts, $10 for each parent so dependent.'"

Urges Termination of Land-Grant Concessions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY SAUTHOFF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article appearing in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen's magazine, by D. B. Robertson, of May 1944:

URGES TERMINATION OF LAND-GRANT CONCESSIONS

(By D. B. Robertson, president)

(Arranged from comprehensive statement made by brotherhood's international president, appearing before subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on March 21, in support of H. R. 4184, a bill to amend sec. 321, title 3, pt. II, of the Transportation Act of 1940 with respect to movement of Government traffic.)

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, having a membership of approximately 117,000, is in favor of the proposed amendment to the Transportation Act of 1940, terminating the exception to section 321 (a). That exception, which permits the transportation of military or naval property of the United States Government, and of members of the military and naval forces on official duty at reduced rates over the so-called land-grant railroads, has a direct and unsettling influence upon the railroad industry, and adversely affects the welfare of railway employees. Its final repeal, we believe, will be of benefit to the industry and its employees, as well as to competing transportation agencies, to shippers generally, and to the governmental regulatory bodies whose task is to attain the maximum order and efficiency of American transportation service.

The history of the land-grant rate concessions is an illustration of how a small matter may grow into a major economic problem, notwithstanding the primary purpose fully justified its institution. The roots of that problem lie far back in American history, in those early days when the Louisiana Purchase and the Mexican War had made the people of the United States possessor of a billion and a half acres of unsettled land. The Federal Government quite properly sought to make this land available to new settlers, and to encourage them to make new homes for themselves in the western Territories. The stream of migration that made the covered wagon a symbol of our national expansion at the same time proved that wagon transportation was too costly, too slow, and too limited to meet the needs of our rapidly developing lands beyond the Mississippi. Moreover, both before and after the Civil War, national leaders realized that if we were to insure American unity we must develop cheap, fast, and efficient transcontinental transportation.

That imperative need could be met only by extension of the railroads into the newly opened regions and across the continent. During the early period of railroad construction the foremost leaders of the Nation, including Henry Clay, Stephen Douglas, and Abraham Lincoln himself, sought by every possible means to assist the builders of railroads in the difficult, perilous, and expensive task of providing transportation in the Western States.

Such governmental aid took the form, in part, of grants of land to some of the companies building the railroads in the South and West. That land was the Government's only great resource; it was being given away to new settlers and being sold at nominal prices to all buyers. The late Commissioner Joseph B. Eastman estimated, after a study of the land-grant problem, that the average value of Federal lands when the railroads were being assisted was 97 cents per acre. On that basis, the 130,000,000 acres of land given the particular companies was worth approximately $125,000,000. Only 18,000 miles of railroad out of the 240,000 miles in the United States were actually constructed with the aid of land grants from the Government. Land-grant aid was thus supplied on only 7.5 percent of the mileage of American railways, and its total value was less than one-half of 1 percent of the investment in their construction.

PROBLEM OF MAJOR PROPORTIONS

In making these land grants, the Federal Government attached the condition that its materials and troops might be transported without "the payment of tolls." That phrase was later interpreted to require that railway rates for Government transportation over land-grant roads should be approximately one-half the regular rates for freight and 80 percent for mail. The Federal Government thus immediately began the recapture of the aid it had granted. That recapture has continued right down to the present time, with some variations in the method and scope, but with a steady increase in amount until today the land-grant rate reduction has become a problem of major proportions.

Among the primary causes of the growth of this evil was the extension of land-grant rebates to other railroads by the so-called "equalization agreements." That extension came about by this process: When Government agencies secured rate reductions over the land-grant roads alone, those roads were naturally given preference in the routing of freight, mail, and Government personnel. That preference not only cut down the volume of business of other carriers but it also had a considerable influence on nongovernmental shippers, whose business frequently tied in indirectly with Government activity in the developing regions beyond the Mississippi River. In order to get their fair share of Government transportation, therefore, and to escape the related effects of governmental discrimination, other railroads agreed to give to the Government the same rebate as was required of the land-grant roads. Consequently, this discrimination and the unstabilizing effect of unequal railroad rates went far beyond the railroads originally involved. Land-grant rate reductions became a national problem, one which should be solved as a part of the transportation policy of the Federal Government.

The total value of the land granted to the railroads during construction was only $125,000,000—and by the end of 1937, according to the late Commissioner Eastman, the Government had been given rate reductions totaling $155,000,000. The railroads had returned to the Federal Government not just the amount advanced, in land, but actually over 20 percent more than that advance, up to 7 years ago. At that time, and as a matter of fair dealing, it would seem the Government could have justified an action completely relieving the railroads of the obligation to continue land-grant reductions. The service rendered by the railroads, in opening up the West and in tying this Nation into a single great economic region, should have been recompense enough for whatever aid the Federal Government had advanced. But even in terms of dollars and cents, the Government had gotten back at least 20 percent more than the value of those early land grants.

This general situation was put before the United States Congress, through its Interstate Commerce Committees, when the land-grant problem came up for consideration in connection with the Transportation Act of 1940. As a consequence of the investigation then made, Congress included in the Transportation Act its section 321, which provided in its paragraph (a) that:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, but subject to the provisions of sections 1 (7) and 22 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, the full applicable commercial rates, fares, or charges shall be paid for transportation by any common carrier subject to such act of any persons or property for the United States, or on its behalf, except that the foregoing provision shall not apply to the transportation of military or naval property of the United States moving for military or naval and not for civil use or to the transportation of members of the military or naval forces of the United States (or of property of such members) when such members are traveling on official duty; and the rate determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission as reasonable therefor shall be paid for the transportation by railroad of the United States mail."

We believe it was the expectation of the Congress—it was certainly our expectation—that this clause put an end to the manifold abuses growing out of the land-grant rate reductions. The remaining exception, that relating to movements of military and naval materials and personnel, we thought would be an annoyance to the carriers, but not enough of a problem seriously to unsettle railway accounting or revenue. We, of course, were not the only ones whose expectations were completely overturned by American defense preparations and our subsequent entry into the Second World War.

TRICKLE BECOMES A FLOOD

What has happened is that the volume of military transportation, which we thought would be only a trickle, has grown into a flood that is now the main current of railway business. Transportation of military and naval supplies and personnel is the major job of American railways today. The conversion of American industry to war production, and the expansion of our armed forces by millions of men, began almost immediately after the Transportation Act of 1940 became law. From that day until today the shift to military transportation has rapidly increased. The amount of freight and personnel movement upon which rate reductions must be granted is now a larger proportion of railway traffic than it has ever been before, in spite of the purpose and effect of the new Transportation Act.

The money value of the exception clause in the Transportation Act cannot be exactly calculated as yet, but it can be estimated with reasonable accuracy. In the middle of the year 1942 railway rate reductions arising out of land-grant provisions totaled about $20,000,000 per month, according to the estimate of the Board of Investigation and Research. The volume of Government transportation, both of war materials and the armed forces, has increased by leaps and bounds since that time. It is a conservative estimate that the average for the past 2 years has been $250,000,000—a total of a half billion dollars in rebates to the United States Government because of those ancient land grants.

The railroad industry has probably paid for that Government land twice a year—four times in all—since the attack on Pearl Harbor. And the land grants had already been paid for in full and more before 1938.

CAUSE OF GROWING CONFUSION

Problems incidental to these rate reductions have grown in proportion. It has become increasingly difficult to be certain upon just what freight and just what personnel movements the reductions apply. Large amounts of revenue are in question, pending final action by the General Accounting Office of the Government. The confusion even extends into the fields of collective bargaining, since in the discussion of wage changes railroad managements have felt it necessary to point out that they could not know definitely what revenues might be available to meet operating expenses until the land-grant reductions had been finally determined.

Your committee has doubtless been advised of the unanimity of opinion upon this question among all those interested in the railway industry. The railway companies, the shippers, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the employees of the railways, and even the Congess itself have expressed themselves on the desirability of eliminating this unstable and unjust regulation. We believe that the Congress intended in 1940 to remove all but a negligible element of the land-grant rate reductions; only the unexpected expansion of our military and naval establishments raised this minor remaining factor to a dominant position in railway finance.

During the years when the land grants were being made to aid in the construction of American railways the Federal Government was compelled to fight and finance 4 years of Civil War. Those 4 years of war cost the Government $3,065,000,000—about $750,000,000 per year. That was the scale of Government expenditures when the land-grant rate reductions were originated.

During the first 2 years of this war we spent $153,000,000,000; during the month of November, 1943, the Federal Government paid out in cash $7,800,000,000 for war purposes. In 1 month we spend 10 times the annual rate of Civil War expenditure, and twice as much as the 4 years of Civil War altogether. A governmental railway policy, devised in the days when a war involving our whole national existence was costing $2,000,000 a day, is being applied now when our war cost is $250,000,000 a day. The value of the war materials being transported must be roughly 125 times what it was when this rate reduction policy was laid down—and the railways are being required to reduce transportation rates on that tremendously multiplied volume of military traffic.

The President's Committee on the General Transportation Situation, appointed in September, 1938, was asked to consider the transportation problem and to recommend legislation. Reporting in December 1938 the committee recommended the repeal of the reduced rate provisions of the land-grant statutes. The need for complete repeal is today even greater than it was at the time that committee reported. The report and recommendation of the committee, of which I was a member, was as follows:

"Certain statutes by which grants of land were made by the Government in aid of the construction of 17,627 miles of railroad in pioneer days stipulate that the Government shall forever have the use of such roads for the transportation of troops and property of the United States free of any toll or charge. Early in the history of these acts the Supreme Court construed them as not contemplating free transportation service for the Government but only free use by it of these roads in performing its own transportation service. It further found that about 50 percent of the total railroad costs was incident to the provision and maintenance of the roadway and tracks and so established 50 percent of the normal commercial rate as the proper basis of charge to be made by the railroads for transportation services performed by them for the Government over land-grant lines.

"Routes in competition with those containing land-grant mileage must meet the reduced rates of the latter on through Government traffic. The total so-called land-grant reductions in rates on Government traffic, including mail, now amount to about $10,000,000 per year. There are now 69 different agencies and departments of government which receive the benefit of these reduced rates, and the number is constantly increasing. This traffic has grown to a volume far in excess of anything that could possibly have been in contemplation of the parties at the time the land grants were made. The Government received more than full consideration for the lands granted in the enhancement in value of the adjoining lands retained by it which resulted from the construction of the railroads, to say nothing of the amount already received by it in the way of reduced transportation charges.

"The Government should recognize the inequity of requiring transportation for itself at rates below those fixed by one of its own regulatory agencies as reasonable for application to its citizens.

"We, therefore, recommend the repeal by the Congress of the reduced-rate provisions of these land-grant statutes."

The Shock Absorber

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to insert an editorial which recently appeared in the official organ, Railroad Yardmaster of North America, Inc. The need for action along the lines suggested by Editor Franks are so apparent that the Congress should immediately apply itself to the problem of providing a shock absorber for American industry to be ready for operation immediately hostilities cease. I particularly commend the editorial to the members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate. The editorial follows:

THE SHOCK ABSORBER

Day by day our industrial highway is becoming more rough and at the pace we are traveling on this highway it will not be long until it becomes bumpy. Up to the present time little has been done to offset this condition. Speaking in plain language, our industrial condition today is nothing short of chaos, and simply because good business acumen is not being applied to offset an unnecessary shock which we will all face when this war is ended.

Industries, large and small, are being forced to operate on a basis absolutely contrary to good business tactics, through a system of taxation based on fabulous wartime production. Few industries are able to lay aside enough surplus to take care of a sudden emergency, such as the abrupt ending of this war. The ending of this war means the immediate reconversion of industries, and under the present system of taxation these industries face an inevitable crash.

It seems to this writer that our Government would do well to establish a plan whereby all business, large and small, would be allowed to set aside a reasonable amount of their profits to guarantee no stoppage of employment during the reconversion period. Or safer yet, allow all business enough surplus to guarantee stability. Some people believe 5 percent of the gross would be an adequate amount. This may or may not be correct. For gigantic industries, this would invariably be in excess of the requirement, and yet for small industries this amount may prove inadequate. This plan should be drafted to take care of conditions without making "fish of one or flesh of the other."

Under our system of free enterprise we must accept the slogan of "what helps business helps you," and by this same token we must recognize the fact also that what hurts business hurts you. Therefore it is important to all of us, whether we be workers, labor leaders, or the general public, to see to it that all legitimate industry be kept profitable, because unless it is, we are headed for another depression, which means unemployment and its natural effect—destitution for millions of workers.

To tax industry to the point of jeopardy is to place it at the mercy of tax collectors, bureaucrats and politicians who have little, if any, knowledge of how to operate business. This is a very serious problem and warrants attention right now—not after the war, or after the next election. That would be too late to save our industrial structure. We must act now.

With the ending of the war will come the ending of war contracts and the resumption of competitive business which has been the backbone of our American system of free enterprise. Unless all business is permitted, through sufficient surplus, to enter into this competition it will mean that business in general is going to go for a very rough ride over our industrial highway. And those who cannot stand the shocks are going to be shocked to death. Therefore, it is obvious that a reasonable amount of current profits set aside to surplus would be the shock absorber.

Frankly yours,

MAURICE R. FRANKS, Editor.

Mother's Day

REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. CURLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, upon May 14, America pays its tribute of love and affection to the mothers of the Nation. God's harbinger of the spring, sweet flowers are worn by all in memory of man's best friend—mother. Pure white blossoms for the mothers who have departed this life, with its surcease of joy and sorrow, laughter, and tears. Bright red blossoms for those who are still unceasingly and with light or heavy hearts, in the sunshine or shadow bearing their burden until the end.

It is a day of joy and sorrow; joy for those who are blessed with a mother who shares with her children success and failure alike, and sorrow for those with only a blessed memory of a loved one gone to a place where care and sorrow are unknown.

Father Ryan, the poet of the South, in his beautiful and inimitable manner has penned a poem entitled "Mother's Way" which is particularly applicable to this day:

Oft within our little cottage, as the shadows gently fall,
While the sunlight touches softly, one sweet face upon the wall,
Do we gather close together, and in hushed and tender tone,
Ask each other's full forgiveness, for the wrong that each has done.
Should you wonder why this custom, at the ending of the day,
Eye and voice would quickly answer, "It was once our mother's way."
If our home be bright and cheery, if it holds a welcome true,
Opening wide its door of greeting to the many—not the few;
If we share our Father's bounty, with the needy day by day,
'Tis because our hearts remember, this was ever mother's way.
Sometimes when our hands grow weary, or our tasks seem very long,
When our burdens look too heavy, and we deem the right all wrong;
Then we gain a new fresh courage, and we rise to proudly say,
"Let us do our duty bravely—this was our dear mother's way";
Then we keep her memory precious, while we never cease to pray
That at last, when lengthening shadows mark the evening of our day,
They may find us waiting calmly to go home our mother's way.

Mother's Day is a blessed institution, memorable and memorial alike. It arouses in us blessed memories and inspiring sentiments that speak unselfish sacrifice for the happiness of humanity. Upon Mother's Day there comes to us a realization of the debt each individual owes to the mother that bore him, the journey into the valley of death cheerfully and uncomplainingly that we might come into being; the long weary hours spent in watchful care ministering to our every want, waiting for the only reward ever enjoyed by mothers, the hour when baby lips might utter the magic word—"mother."

Then the days of childhood when our troubles, always appearing so momentous, could find but one sympathetic soul to whom they could be unfolded.

Then manhood and womanhood and the battle of life, replete with failure and heartache, and there, ever patient, ever watchful, ever loving, the mother who bore us to comfort us in our afflictions, to cheer us in our sorrows, seeking but one reward—our affection and love.

During the day she does not mind,
There are a host of things to do,
Caring for ones he left behind;
Dishes and dusting, mending, too,
Flowers to tend by the garden walk,
Ribbons to tie in golden hair,
Voices uplifted in playtime talk,
Patter of feet upon the stair.

And oh, it means so much. It might perhaps suggest to our minds the words written by the most beloved of most recent poets, who passed to his great reward, a hero of the World War, Joyce Kilmer, who, speaking upon this particular subject, said:

Gentlest of critics, does your memory hold
(I know it does) a record of the days
When I, a schoolboy, earned your generous praise
For halting verse and stories crudely told.
Over those boyish scrawls the years have rolled,
They might not bear the world's unfriendly gaze,
But still your smile shines down familiar ways,
Touches my words and turns their dross to gold.

Or as has been so beautifully epitomized in a single sentence by our own beloved Washington who once said, "All that I am and all that I hope to be I owe to my mother."

The sainted Emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, who touched every depth of sorrow, poverty, misery, and adversity, said that the inspiration of his life that made it possible for him to make any character of sacrifice cheerfully in behalf of some other individual was the inspiration that he received from his mother.

I sometimes feel that the real tragedy of Mother's Day, not only in our own land but in every land in the world, lies in the fact that the human family have always made provision to honor the destructive forces in the world. We build monuments to men who have displayed courage on the field of battle, unmindful of the danger and death that are daily faced by countless millions of women in the world, who go down into the valley of death that the human race might be perpetuated without complaining. So there is no tribute too great and no honor too glorious to pay to the mothers of men.

America has expanded amazingly in things material; but she has not held fast to the spiritual things that are the safeguards of national health and strength. There has been a distinct lowering of our ideals of character. Liberty has degenerated into license, and in many directions the standards of family life have grown lax; divorce is assuming the character of a national menace, making a mockery of motherhood, a jest of marital fidelity, and the home and its sanctities mere tradition.

And so, in the spirit of motherhood, I ask that everyone be just a little kinder and just a little more considerate of the mothers that are still with us, but whose stay is altogether too short, and not only on Mother's Day, but on Memorial Day bring some sweet token of affection to the places where the mothers rest who we shall never again know in life.

That eccentric genius of the Sierras, Joaquin Miller, in his tribute to motherhood, has epitomized the story of their contribution:

The greatest battle that ever was fought,
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the maps of the world you will find it not;
It was fought by the mothers of men.
Nay, not with cannon nor battle shot,
With sword nor nobler pen;
Nay, not with eloquent word or thought
From minds of wonderful men;
But down in a woman's walled-up heart,
Of a woman that would not yield,
But silently, patiently bore her part,
Lo, there on that battlefield.
With little cheer, no bivouac song,
No gleaming banners that wave,
And oh, those battles they last so long,
From babyhood to the grave;
But faithful still as a bridge of stars,
She fights in her walled-up town,
Fights on and on in endless war,
Then silent, unseen goes down.

At no time in the history of America will there be more mothers with heavy hearts, anxious for the security of their sons and daughters in the armed services of the Nation than upon this Mother's Day. For the sons and daughters which with heroic spirit they have gone down into the valley of the shadow to bring into being. It has been the same sad story almost from the beginning of creation, a story of sadness, a story of sorrow, a story of heartache and heart breaks, a story of tears and mental anguish upon the part of the mothers of the world. Ah, if we had the courage displayed by the mothers we could end this tragic situation which takes place with unfailing regularity every quarter of a century. It is a tribute to the greed, avarice, lust for power, and the cowardice of mankind. The opportunities are presented perhaps for the first time in the history of the world to end the slaughter of humanity in the settlement of national and international differences by resorting to arms and the killing of one another. Time and experience have proven that the system which has obtained in the past is wrong and has been wrong so long that there is no way in which to justify a further continuance of that system. At the end of the present war provided the Nations now allied with the United States of America continue united and are willing to substitute unselfishness for selfishness and aggrandizement they can make possible a program of peace and security for the world and serenity and comfort for the mothers of the future.

The Atlantic Charter, hailed as a panacea for the ills which have afflicted humanity in the past, must be preserved even though it may mean the relinquishment of the holding of territory and subjection of the people of India, of Ireland, of Hong Kong, and of other possessions by Great Britain, and even though it may mean the relinquishment of portions of Poland and the Balkan States by Russia and the withdrawal from Chinese territory by the Japanese. America presents at this critical period in the life of the world an example of the unselfishness and decency that the rest of the world must accept and follow provided we are to save the mothers of the future from the horrors of other wars—perhaps even more disastrous than the present one.

Unity among the Allies and adherence to the Atlantic Charter with control of the wealth of the world, the food supply of the world, the agencies for the conduct of war in the world, should make it possible to embark upon a program that would mean peace and security for the people of the world to the end that the mothers of the future might never again be required to look forward to the slaughter of their children.

The Ghost City of Kingsford Heights

REMARKS
OF

HON. ROBERT A. GRANT

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the irresponsibility of the New Deal and its utter lack of concern for the taxpayers of America, and the staggering load that they bear, is nowhere better shown than by the story of the ghost city of Kingsford Heights, Ind.

In the early days of the emergency program, a large shell-loading plant, Kingsbury Ordnance Plant, was constructed in La Porte County, Ind., within the district which I have the honor to represent. Following that, the master minds of the New Deal housing program acquired some 775 acres of fertile farm land immediately adjoining the ordnance plant and constructed a city of 2,974 homes at a cost of some $13,000,000 and probably more.

They built 18 miles of streets; 72 miles of sidewalks; spent $133,350 for landscaping; built a permanent sewage-disposal plant at a cost of $166,738.40; a permanent water-distribution system, including wells, pumping station, concrete reservoir, and so forth, at a cost of $559,530. They bought, and thus removed from the market, 2,974 electric refrigerators and 2,974 bottled gas ranges—items that many of our people at home needed badly and were unable to acquire. Some of these have been removed to other projects, but 1,404 electric refrigerators still remain at Kingsford Heights, and many of our folks are still unable to get refrigerators for the preservation of food for their children and their families.

Three hundred and twenty-four families have moved into this ghost city of 2,974 homes. Two thousand homes of the ghost city of Kingsford Heights have already been dismantled, or are in the process of being dismantled and moved to other sections of the country. We are now told that the ghost city is to be stripped down to 500 homes, but there still remains, and there will remain, those 18 miles of streets and 72 miles of sidewalks running through those fertile fields of northern Indiana.

Now comes the crowning blow of all. Mr. William K. Divers, regional representative for the National Housing agency, has just announced that studies will be undertaken to determine the possibility of moving existing dormitory buildings from Knox and Walkerton, Ind., into the Kingsbury Ordnance Reservation in order to eliminate a major problem of transportation for future employees. While 2,400 homes from the ghost city, which adjoins this ordnance plant, are being dismantled and moved to other sections of the country, the National Housing Agency plans to move other dwellings back into that same area. It is the most absurd, reckless, and wanton waste of public funds which could be imagined.

Mr. Speaker, under date of April 12, 1944, I directed a series of 30 questions to Mr. John B. Blandford, Jr., Administrator of the National Housing Agency, and he has supplied me with answers to these in a letter just received. My questions, together with Mr. Blandford's responses, concerning the ghost city of Kingsford Heights are as follows:

1. Question. When was the project planned?

Answer. January 16, 1942.

2. Question. When was the first land acquired?

Answer. April 14, 1942.

3. Question. When was construction begun?

Answer. May 5, 1942.

4. Question. When were the first units ready for occupancy?

Answer. March 20, 1943 (283).

5. Question. Please give me the name of the individual and present office who recommended the project, and also the name of the individual who gave final approval to the proposal to build Kingsford Heights.

Answer. The program was based on employment estimates of the War Department and the War Manpower Commission, as were later adjustments. The resulting recommendation was made on January 7, 1942, by Philip M. Klutznick, representing the former Division of Defense Housing Coordination.

Final approval was given by C. F. Palmer, then Coordinator of the Division of Defense Housing Coordination, January 16, 1942.

6. Q. How many acres of land comprise the area occupied by the project and what was the cost of same? (Please let me have this by parcels.)

Answer. Number of acres and cost of land comprising project by parcels:

Parcel	Amount	Acres
A	$6,449.55	109.99
B	2,657.00	53.14
C	4,796.00	59.95
D	414.00	4.14
E	2,150.00	22.01
F	5,024.72	40.43
G	6,750.00	40.45
H	1,867.50	24.90
I	2,531.20	36.16
J	5,138.25	79.05
K	6,488.25	86.51
L	1,881.00	20.90
M	11,198.05	148.09
N	7,692.85	49.89
Total	65,038.87	775.61

7. Question. How many one-bedroom units are there? Two-bedroom? Three-bedroom? Four-bedroom? What is the cost per unit of each size unit? (These figures to be based on completed project before present dismantling was begun.)

Answer.—

Units	Number	Cost per unit
1-bedroom	413	$2,509.67
2-bedroom	1,776	2,747.07
3-bedroom	779	3,137.13
4-bedroom	6	3,527.19

8. Question. How many commercial buildings were erected within the project, and what is the floor space of the various units? What was the cost of same? What is the rental of these units?

Answer. Three commercial buildings were built in the project, as follows:

	Square feet
Building A: A. & P. store and post office	12,600
Building B: General merchandise store and 5 small shops	14,400
Building C: Drug store and lunchroom, 1 large and 2 small shops	14,000

Total cost, $124,070.

Rental for 9,636 square feet, $982.16 for first quarter 1944.

9. Question. Were any other commercial units contemplated in the original plans? What were they?

Answer. Two additional commercial units were originally planned but not built: Theater building; recreational building, containing restaurant and bowling alleys.

10. Question. How many miles of streets are there within the project? How much of this is newly constructed roads? How much comprises roads already constructed in that territory and usable in laying out this project? What was the cost of same?

Answer. There are 18.2 miles of streets within the project—all newly constructed. Cost of streets, $174,488 (68 cents per square yard).

11. Question. How many miles of sidewalks were constructed within the project and what was the cost of same?

Answer. There are 72 miles of sidewalks, including all street and yard sidewalks. Cost of sidewalks, $212,713.20 ($1.68 per square yard).

12. Question. What was the cost of landscaping within the project?

Answer. Total cost of landscaping within project $133,350.

13. Question. What type of sewage-disposal plant was installed, and what was the cost of same? Is it a permanent type of installation?

Answer. A sewage-disposal plant of the Imhoff type was installed with primary and secondary treatment at a cost of $166,738.40. It is a permanent type of installation.

14. Question. What type of water system was installed, and what was the cost of same? Is it a permanent type of installation?

Answer. A complete water-distribution system was installed, including wells, elevated water tanks, pumping station, concrete reservoir, and fire hydrants. Cost of entire system, $559,530; permanent type of installation.

15. Question. What is the source of the electricity for the project? How is the cost of the utilities handled?

Answer. Northern Indiana Public Service Co. F. P. H. A. constructed electric distribution system on project, purchases electricity from the above company wholesale through master meter prorated to tenants as part of rent. Cost water and sewer based on cost of operation of these two utilities and prorated to tenants as above.

16. Question. How many school buildings were planned, and what was to be the cost of each? How many were actually built?

Answer. Three school buildings planned:

School No. 1	$135,300
School No. 2	157,785
School No. 3	135,320

School No. 3 was the only one built.

17. Question. What is the cost of maintenance of the project?

Answer. Cost of maintenance, July 1, 1943, to March 31, 1944, $24,124.12.

18. What is the cost of management and operation? (Give break-down.)

Answer. Cost of management and operation, July 1, 1943, to March 31, 1944, $23,080.62.

Cost of public services that are customarily provided by community (not included in above), July 1, 1943, to March 31, 1944:

Public safety	$17,624.04
Street and roads	214.10
Sanitation	7,253.77
Health education	45.23

19. Question. What is the present rent scale on the various size units?

Answer. Present "shelter" rent schedule:

	Per month
1-bedroom unit	$27.50
2-bedroom unit	30.00
3-bedroom unit	32.50
4-bedroom unit	35.00

20. Question. What is the total gross income?

Answer. Total gross income for period July 1, 1943 to March 31, 1944, $109,424.92.

21. Question. How many units are presently occupied? Of this number, how many are whites? Negroes?

Answer. Units occupied April 15, 1944, 324; of this number:

White	273
Negroes	51
Total	324

22. Question. How many units have been moved to other cities? What was the cost of moving in each case?

Answer. Units moved or scheduled to be moved to other cities—1,930 dwelling units. The unit costs of demounting, transporting, and reerecting these houses on the projects handled by this region are as follows:

Newton, Iowa, $1,300 per dwelling-unit project. Iowa-13,051.

South Bend, Ind., $1,234 per dwelling-unit project. Indiana-12,183.

Evansville, Ind., $1,154 per dwelling-unit project. Indiana-12,187.

Ottawa, Ill., $1,100 per dwelling-unit project. Illinois-11,212.

Indianapolis, Ind., $1,397 per dwelling-unit project. Illinois-12,180.

23. Question. Are any plans in process for the immediate removal of other units? Where will these go?

Answer. Plans are in process for the removal of 470 units to Detroit, Mich.

24. Question. How many are to be removed in all?

Answer. 2,400 units in all are to be removed according to present plans.

25. Question. How many units is it intended to keep at Kingsford Heights?

Answer. It is intended that 500 units are to be kept at Kingsford Heights. This requires that 70 units are still to be deprogrammed.

26. Question. How many electrical refrigerators are still there? How many were moved? Where?

Answer. One thousand four hundred and four electrical refrigerators are still on project. One thousand five hundred and sixty-nine have been removed as follows:

Port Clinton, Ohio	200
Wayne, Mich	749
Burns City, Ind	250
St. Mary County, Md	117
Jersey City, N. J	75
Belkamp, Md	176
Destroyed by fire	2

27. Question. How many "bottled gas" stoves are still there? How many were removed? Where?

Answer. Five hundred and sixty-eight "bottled gas" ranges are still on the project. Two thousand four hundred and six have been removed as follows:

Port Clinton, Ohio	200
Brunswick, Ga	913
Project MD. 18264	210
South Bend	51
Indianapolis, Ind	73
Newton, Iowa	80
Rittman, Ohio	100
Chambersburg, Pa	172
Ottowa, Ill	120
South Bend, Ind	100
Evansville, Ind	185
Senaca, Ill	200
Destroyed by fire	2

28. Question. Are there any bathtubs in the town?

Answer. There are 24 bathtubs on the project. Each dwelling unit is equipped with a shower bath.

29. Question. What is the outlook for continued maintenance of the town?

Answer. The project will be maintained by F. P. H. A. as long as it is required to house war workers.

30. Question. In the event Kingsford Heights is to be abandoned, what plan of disposal of all properties will be followed? Who will make the decision in each of these instances?

Answer. In the event the Kingsford Heights project is abandoned, the disposition of all properties contained in it will be in accordance with N. H. A.-F. P. H. A. procedures.

It is expected that F. P. H. A. will have final decision as to disposing of all properties after the project is abandoned.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH MRUK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. MRUK. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WILLEY], at Wilmington, Del., on Sunday, May 7, 1944, before a meeting arranged by the Polish societies and clubs of Delaware:

This meeting, held in honor of Polish patriots who were instrumental in the adoption of the constitution of the 3d of May 1791, recognizes an achievement of lasting importance. Only last Wednesday exercises in commemoration of an event that took place 153 years ago were held in the National House of Representatives. On that day remarks were made by a large number of the Members from different sections of our country, and with reference to that same constitution. What was so significant about a constitution in 1791 that such attention should be given to it today? One answer is that it was unusual. Another is that it marked great progress forward in the age-old struggle for liberty.

As to its significance, the words of the English statesman, Edmund Burke, are most complimentary when he said:

"We have seen anarchy and servitude at once removed; a throne strengthened for the protection of the people without trenching on their liberties; * * * not one man incurred loss or suffered degradation. All, from the King to the day laborer, were improved in their condition. Everything was kept in its place and order; but in that place and order everything was bettered. To add to this happy wonder—this unheard-of conjunction of wisdom and fortune—not one drop of blood was spilled; no treachery; no outrage; no system of slander more cruel than the sword; no studied insults on religion, morals, or manners; no spoils; no confiscation; no citizen beggared; none impoverished; none exiled. The whole was affected with a policy, a discretion, a unanimity such as have never been known before on any occasion; but such wonderful conduct was reserved for this glorious conspiracy in favor of the true and genuine rights and interests of men. Happy people, if they know how to proceed as they have begun. Happy prince, worthy to begin with splendor or to close with glory a race of patriots and of kings and to leave a name which every wind to heaven would bear."

Under that constitution the Government was divided into an executive, a legislative, and a judiciary. A strong executive was formed by making the monarchy hereditary and increasing its powers. The King and the council of ministers were to form a permanent executive body responsible to the Diet. The Diet became a real independent legislative body. The idea of the state finally trumphed over provincial separation. The gentry gave up their immunity from taxation, the middle class was enfranchised, and municipal autonomy was restored. Complete toleration for all religions was confirmed. The peasants were taken under the protection of the law and freedom to all was advanced.

That millions of Polish descent consider this day to be the national holiday of their mother country, and that they continue to honor it by appropriate observances here and elsewhere is most remarkable. For Poland existed as an independent state under its constitution of May 3, 1791, only 4 years, after which it ceased to exist as such. Then for 123 years the Polish people were under the rule of others. Not until 1921, after the First World War, did Poland rise again under a government of her own choice. Then after an independent existence of about 18 years she was again invaded and overwhelmed by the forces of neighboring countries.

Poland was first to fight the German aggressors. By her people's enormous sacrifice and courage she gave Great Britain and us in America time to realize the danger and prepare. For her lone resistance against overwhelming odds Poland has paid a tragic price. Her people were made slaves. Her wealth was appropriated. Her culture, schools, libraries, were destroyed. Her churches were closed. Two hundred and sixty thousand soldiers and civilians (including 60,000 in the heroic defense of Warsaw) were killed during the military campaign. Two and a half million were executed or died in concentration camps. About 2,000,000 civilians and prisoners of war were made slave laborers in Germany. Some 386 villages were burned to the ground and all inhabitants killed.

These facts emphasize the lesson which the Polish people have impressed upon the liberty-loving nations of the earth. Only the unquenchable spirit of liberty and the desire for freedom that a century of foreign domination could not take away can explain the exercises of this day and the significance of the 3d of May to the Polish people everywhere.

Poland did not sign an armistice. In spite of merciless wholesale persecution, Poland is still fighting, has been fighting since September 1939—almost 5 years. Poland's armed forces now number fifth among the United Nations—over 200,000 men in the field.

If history in appraising the past has correctly informed us that we are indebted to ancient Rome for our law; to ancient Greece for much of our culture and to early Palestine for our religion, is it too much to assert that we are indebted to the people of Polish blood for an example of devotion to constitutional government that remains unparalleled in all the annals of mankind? Were there no other contributions that could be mentioned, if Polish blood had been spilled in no other worthy cause, this alone would entitle Poland to our everlasting gratitude and praise.

But this contribution, significant as it is, by no means stands alone. The history of many countries including our own contains the names of Polish patriots who participated in the struggles for liberty. In our own cause, Polish talents were expended and Polish blood was shed.

We must not forget that 1st day of September in 1939 when the Hitler forces attacked their Polish neighbor without any declaration of war. We must not forget the power that was hurled against a liberty-loving people that desired to live in peace with their neighbors. That people treasured so greatly the independent existence which they had so briefly enjoyed, that they were unwilling to surrender it without a struggle even when resistance seemed hopeless.

There are features so tragic in the history of the Polish people that we marvel at their continued devotion to the ideals and beliefs expressed in their constitution of 1791. Four times their country was partitioned by conquering and neighboring nations. Four times were the boundaries changed and the inhabitants placed under the domination of different rulers and peoples. And now after the crowning tragedy when the country had begun to function again under a constitution, after the murder and deportation of many of its people, it continues to resist and continues to cherish the hope of liberty and independent existence.

It is difficult to point to a nation with a history more tragic, and it is difficult to find a people who are fighting the enemy more desperately from day to day in this present conflict. Poles are fighting on many fronts of this war. They are fearless sailors and intrepid fighters in the air. They are on foot with the infantry and on horse with the cavalry. Everywhere they make their presence known—spurred to deeds of valor by their love of country and by burning hatred of a foe that has shown no mercy to their kinsmen and that has despoiled their homeland of its products and its treasures.

And now what can we say about the future of Poland? On August 14, 1941, the so-called Atlantic Charter was promulgated, which among others, sets forth these principles:

"1. Their countries seek no aggrandizement, territorial or otherwise.

"2. They desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned.

"3. They respect the rights of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live, and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them."

On September 24, 1941, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics endorsed these objectives, and on January 1, 1942, joined the other United Nations in dedication to "the common program of purposes and principles embodied in the Atlantic Charter." Poland is a party to these principles, along with us. If these principles mean anything, and I am hopeful they do, then Poland, as an independent, free nation, will rise again to her former glory. Certain it seems, the peace of Europe and perforce the world cannot be secure until the independence of Poland is restored. Its geographical location makes it the archstone upon which the foundations of everlasting peace must rest. There are certain facts with respect to Poland that must be considered when we think of future peace in the world. She is a country of small holdings of land—48,198,207 acres of her total cultivated area of 6 ,232,145 acres consists of small holdings of less than 123.6 acres, or 76.22 percent. In 1931 the density of her rural population was greater than that of Yugoslavia, greater than that of Germany or Hungary, greater than that of France. Land hunger and the attempts to forcibly appease it have been productive causes of war in the past. How can Poland's will to peace be strengthened if much of her territory in the East is to be taken by another nation and an Allied Nation at that?

It was not so with France. Two of her provinces were taken from her as a result of the Franco-Prussian War. She never ceased to desire their return. As a result of the First World War they were returned to her. Now they have been taken from her again.

Then, too, there are treaties which fix the eastern Polish boundary. That frontier was agreed upon in the peace treaty signed on March 18, 1921, by the representatives of Poland and of Russia, White Russia, and Ukrainian Soviet Republics. It was a compromise line accepted by a victorious Poland. It has been reaffirmed. Poland desires that agreed line to be her boundary. Can she be blamed for that, especially when she is dealing with an Allied Nation with which she concluded a nonaggression treaty? Russia is 54 times as large as Poland, and has the largest land area in the world. She has contributed mightily to the efforts of the Allied Nations. She will have much to say about the future peace of the world. We are concerned then about recent events with respect to the Polish eastern boundary.

Peace with justice was described by our State Department on July 23, 1940, as "The policy of this Government is universally known. The people of the United States are opposed to predatory activities no matter whether they are carried on by the use of force or by the threat of force. They are likewise opposed to any form of intervention on the part of one state, however powerful, in the domestic concerns of any other sovereign state, however weak." That policy is sound. It should be restated and repeated. Peace cannot come from broken agreements and it cannot be based on injustice. First we fight for victory; first we fight to win in this terrible struggle; but beyond that day of victory we want to see a better world where peace will last longer than two decades.

With their tradition of liberty, it is not strange that the Poles who have come to our country have become owners of property, believers in stability, and staunch upholders of our Federal Constitution. These attributes can be observed among the Polish population here in Delaware, where almost their first objective is the ownership of a home. Once acquired, their homes are maintained with great care and pride.

Our own Constitution is the great unifying force in our country today. It will live only as long as it has popular support. May our devotion to its principles be as constant and unyielding as the shining example which the Polish people have shown to us and to the world.

And there is need for constancy in our devotion to our Constitution. Men urge that its provisions be relaxed for this reason or that, and that some clause be disregarded due to emergency such as war. But to relax or disregard one provision means that any may be nullified. Then what becomes of our liberties and rights?

To answer that question, it might be well to consider the case of one Milligan that was argued and decided near the end of the Civil War. Milligan was a civilian resident of Indiana. He had never been in the military or naval service of the United States. Yet, he was arrested by the military, tried by a military tribunal, and sentenced. Milligan insisted that the military commission had no right to try him and that he was guaranteed the right of trial by jury by the Constitution of the United States.

The following quotation from the opinion of the court in this case is worthy of our study:

"No graver question was ever considered by this Court, nor one which more nearly concerns the rights of the whole people; for it is the birthright of every American citizen when charged with crime, to be tried and punished according to law. * * *

"The decision of this question does not depend on argument or judicial precedents, numerous and highly illustrative as they are. These precedents inform us of the extent of the struggle to preserve liberty and to relieve those in civil life from military trials. The founders of our Government were familiar with the history of that struggle; and secured in a written Constitution every right which the people had wrested from power during a contest of ages. By that Constitution and the laws authorized by it this question must be determined. The provisions of that instrument on the administration of criminal justice are too plain and direct to leave room for misconstruction or doubt of their true meaning. Those applicable to this case are found in that clause of the original Constitution which says, 'That the trial of all crimes, except in case of impeachment, shall be by jury; and in the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of the amendments. The fourth proclaims the right to be secure in person and effects against unreasonable search and seizure; and directs that a judicial warrant shall not issue 'without proof of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation.' The fifth declares 'that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment by a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.' And the sixth guarantees the right of trial by jury, in such manner and with such regulations that with upright judges, impartial juries, and an able bar the innocent will be saved and the guilty punished. * * *

"Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors; for even these provisions, expressed in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than 70 years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper, and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence." * * *

Ridiculous Order Threatens to Close Small Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, there has been much criticism in Congress, in the press and over the radio about the ever-changing draft and manpower situations. Hardly a day passes but what some new regulation, some new interpretation, some new control is announced by those in authority. As a result, the War Manpower and Selective Service officials have created such a confusion that local boards find it increasingly difficult to interpret and administer the maze of instructions that is being heaped upon them.

The confusion is shared by the general public and has made a "no man's land of understanding." Selective Service registrants have been called for induction only to be told they were not needed. In the meantime, these men, many of them with families, disposed of their personal effects and property only to be returned to their homes to live in a state of wonderment until orders and regulations have been clarified.

We all appreciate that problems of this nature may easily arise. Selective Service has a tremendous task to perform. Meeting the military's manpower needs is a big job. After all, we were a Nation geared to peace when we entered this world conflict. We were not a militaristic power geared to war and privation. Our wartime controls are new and we must realize that mistakes are inevitable.

The job has been so complicated and so vast that cooperation of all existing Government and civilian organizations has been necessary to the full prosecution of the war both on the military and production fronts. Under acts of Congress and Executive orders, various groups have been assigned their particular jobs. The Army and Navy engage the enemy; the War Production Board furnishes the materials; the Selective Service System furnishes the fighting men; and the War Manpower Commission is responsible for gearing the manpower capacities of the Nation to all production requirements.

It is natural that there must be close cooperation between these various departmental groups. Solidarity demands an interwoven pattern designed to eliminate overlapping, duplication, and conflicting orders. This program must affect all phases of action, whether it be legislative, executive, military, or productive effort.

With such all-absorbing activities going on it is shocking to learn of some of the peculiar and damaging socialistic controls that have been "slipped in" under the pressure of the war effort.

Millions of men have been called from their normal walks of life into the various governmental agencies to aid in planning and prosecuting this gigantic war program. Our ablest business men and women head these bureaus and agencies. The majority are working shoulder to shoulder in the civilian effort which, together with the great industrial machine, has become known as the battle of production. Of course, many varied philosophies and personalities bring their individual influences into this great program. Some of these philosophies are good, others fair, and some have no place in the war effort. Some of these men and women are seeking to foist socialistic reforms upon America during this great crisis.

Some of these dreamers and planners are meddling in the programs of other agencies with damaging results. One of these instances was recently called to my attention. I investigated it, and as the result of my findings I am in conscience compelled to bring it to the attention of this House.

A short time ago the owner of a laundry company in southern Michigan told me that he had been denied a locally needed designation by the War Manpower Commission. When I asked him why this designation had been refused he told me that the area director of the War Manpower Commission had denied this status merely because he happened to have a few women and school girls working in his plant who were receiving less than the going rate of pay established by the War Labor Board for that region.

I sought to determine just what the designation of "locally needed" actually meant. I not only learned what it was, but what it is and further what it could be if these dreamers and planners are permitted to continue in authority in government. Secondly, I learned the great importance of this designation to industry. I found, in the administration of this designation, the evolution of an order which is the product of the brain of one of those so-called long-haired professors whose sole effort in wartime is apparently directed toward changing the Nation's economic structure.

Mr. Speaker, early in the war, Selective Service asked the War Manpower Commission to establish a committee on essentiality. An interagency committee was formed with representatives of the War, Navy, and Agricultural Departments, Selective Service, War Production Board, and the War Manpower Commission. The chairman of this committee is Mr. Collis Stocking, a college professor who has never met a pay roll, but has been placed in a position of power in the War Manpower Commission.

Soon after its formation this committee hastily designated a number of industries on what became known as list of essential activities. Persons engaged in these essential places of employment were to be considered by their local draft boards for deferments in order that the great production effort could get going.

It was not long until the War Manpower Commission found that the list did not include all of the war supporting agencies. However, rather than change, or to add to the established list on a national basis, the old dodge was used and a new program was born, and with it this so-called locally needed designation. Activities of this group were not to be raided of their employees for others. For instance, it was quickly found that unless the housewife could get her laundry done in a professional laundry she had to take time off from her employment in an aircraft plant to do the family wash. This automatically created an enforced absentee and production suffered. They found too, that distribution of food and fuel; that restaurants and hotels, laundries, dry cleaners, and linen suppliers were necessary to not only the war effort, but for the health, welfare, and morale of the Nation.

Therefore, the interagency committee surveyed the field and developed a list of activities for which the locally needed designation might aid in the general stabilization program. In a news release, O. W. I.–1413, dated March 10, 1943, the War Manpower Commission said:

In overcrowded industrial areas, the facilities required for serving the minimum needs of the community are extremely important to the maintenance of working efficiency in war production. These services and facilities, such as restaurants, laundries, dry-cleaning establishments, hotels, and milk, food, and fuel distribution, may require the same recruitment and placement services as any actively classified in the national list and index of essential activities.

Further—

Where the area director finds that certain activities, primarily local in character, are necessary to meet the basic manpower needs of the area, he may designate them for including in an area manpower stabilization program. However, the inclusion of such local activities in no way establishes their eligibility for consideration by the Selective Service System for occupational deferment. The designation of an activity as locally needed gives it the same status as essential activities under the employment stabilization program and permits the local United States employment office to give priority in service to such activities over other activities in the community not designated as essential or locally needed.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, if the services of these various business places were considered as contributing to the war effort, they could be designated as locally needed. That is as it should be. That is good judgment, and right thinking. However, and unfortunately, the administration of this program came under the directon of the dreamers and the planners. As the result, the program has run into a succession of rules and regulations for compliance and subservience, reports and reports and more reports, and reams and reams of red tape.

Standards were developed, compliance with which was required for a businessman to obtain a "locally needed" designation. One part of the standards was designed to streamline the services and provide for full utilization of existing manpower. Frills were eliminated and basic vital services were made the basis of essentiality and to meet the demands of the community.

The Chairman of the essentiality committee, Professor Stocking, developed a manual of operations, or set of rules and regulations, governing the application of the locally needed status. These were in the form of operating instructions to regional and area directors. It is interesting to point out that members of the essentiality committee have never participated in the setting up or the continuance of these qualifications or specifications which must be met.

On March 13, in Field Instruction No. 15, area and regional directors were notified that the designation could be used only in groups 1 and 2 areas. These so-called areas are known as groups 1, 2, 3, and 4. The designation is determined by the stage of critical production and manpower in the area. For instance, areas in group 1 are considered as "tight or critical manpower areas," where needs are as great or greater than the supply of labor.

In addition to compliance on full utilization of available manpower, establishment of a minimum workweek and elimination of luxury services, this particular qualification was inserted:

Wage and working condition standards are comparable with similar types of activity in the area requiring similar skills.

No objection was found to such qualifications, and therefore many groups eligible for the locally needed designation, requested the designation and it was given to them. That was on March 3, and the program was announced, as I mentioned before, March 10.

Now, note this, Mr. Speaker, 2 months and 22 days later, Mr. Stocking, without consideration of the essentiality committee, mind you, sent a new and revised instruction to the field. In this revision, dated May 25, 1943, the "locally needed" designation was made available in areas group 1, 2, and 3. But, lo and behold, that little sentence on wages and working conditions underwent a tremendous transition. Let me read the new wage condition.

Wages paid to workers engaged in the activity are not below the lower limit of the wage rate brackets established by the War Labor Board for the occupations in the labor market area where the workers are employed, unless the employer has applied to the War Labor Board for approval to increase the wage rates to at least those levels.

Now, more evolution, more change, Mr. Speaker. Because the War Labor Board had established the figure of 40 cents per hour, below which was considered substandard throughout the United States, and in many tight critical areas handed down a higher minimum wage, socialized planning took another step. In W. M. C.'s Field Instruction No. 2, dated September 10, 1943, the evolution of this order became quite complete. In that order, the "locally needed" designation became available in all types of labor areas and the wage qualification was changed as follows:

Wages paid to workers engaged in the activity are not less than the rate established for the region or area by the War Labor Board as necessary to avoid substandards of living. If no such rate has been set and approved, the activity must be paying wage rates at least equal to 40 cents an hour.

Many establishments that had been assigned the "locally needed" status under the provisions of the first field instruction were told that they would have to comply with the new wage provisions or the "locally needed" designation would be taken away. It was taken away in many instances. Others, requesting it, were told that they could not be so declared unless they met Professor Stocking's qualifications.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you see how an employer is required to meet certain minimum wage qualifications before he can get his business designated as "locally needed." In other words, to be recognized as contributing to the war effort the employer must certify that he does not have one single employee making less than an established war wage. If a man has 500 employees, 499 of whom earn at least or above the minimum rate, and one person, let us say a part-time school girl, a messenger—just one person receiving less than the rate established by the War Labor Board—his business cannot be declared locally needed. If the service or product of a plant is essential to the community it is difficult to conceive how wages paid has any relation whatsoever to its essentiality.

Within the framework of the area stabilization programs providing for the recruitment of workers, it can easily be understood that U. S. E. S. is not, nor should it be, bothered with referral and protection of persons employed at substandard wages. That is protection for the individual. Criteria of the U. S. E. S. does not freeze those receiving lower wages in their jobs. Employers are required to present certificates of availability to such persons upon request and employees receiving wages in the lower brackets can move around from job to job without being frozen. Protection, on the other hand, is afforded the employer for those employees above the established wage rate so as to minimize movement of workers between one essential job and another.

Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that this minimum wage provision was written in to protect the individual employee. Unfortunately, it is applied not to one employee, but to an entire business. The application has been entirely in reverse. In actual practice today, through Professor Stocking's plan, employment is and may be considered "war contributing," based not alone on the essentiality of the service rendered, but on wages paid to any one employee in any one business place.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a lengthy definition and explanation of the "locally needed" designation. Now, let us see how all-important this program has become.

Originally, Selective Service took men for the armed forces based on the following: First, type of employment; second, age; third, family status; fourth, physical condition.

Gradually one type of employment would change in its direct importance to the prosecution of the war. Such changes resulted in revisions of draft requirements. It would be almost humanly impossible to describe the many phases through which changing draft regulations have passed. That is history.

Recently, however, as we approached the estimated peak size of the military forces, military officials began to stress the importance of securing men under 26 years of age. The draft had begun to take so many fathers and, as the backwash of complications and changes washed upon the shore of public opinion, insult was heaped upon injury by almost daily interpretations and misinterpretations of manpower requirements.

Finally, in a dramatic and unexpected order, General Hershey told draft boards that they were to withhold the processing of all men over 26 years of age who were considered to be in employment that was "contributing to the war effort." Because my constituent has laid his troubles also before the American Institute of Laundering, officials of that association wired General Hershey to determine if laundries were considered as contributing to the war effort. On April 21, General Hershey sent the following reply:

> Retel 20th: Laundry service may be considered war supporting activity where designated locally needed.

On April 19, Col. George H. Baker, Chief of Selective Service Manpower Division, wrote Mr. A. C. Hill, deputy vice chairman for civilian requirements on this subject. I quote from Colonel Baker's letter:

> The term "war supporting activities" is used in exactly the same sense as "activities in support of the war effort" in which registrants may be considered for deferment in class II–A. Such activities "in support of the war effort" are considered to be the list of essential activities designated by the War Manpower Commission plus those activities declared to be "locally needed." We believe that this is clearly understood by most local boards, but if any local board is in doubt about the matter it can obtain full clarification from the State director.

There has been so much talk about national-service legislation to better utilize physically handicapped persons in jobs "contributing to the war effort." In a combined newspaper release from General Hershey and Paul V. McNutt, dated April 7, please note the following sentence:

> Paul V. McNutt, Chairman of the War Manpower Commission, and Maj. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, Director of Selective Service, today said that draft registrants classified as IV–F, who are not already so employed, should seek employment in an activity listed on the War Manpower Commission's list of essential activities or in activities designated by the War Manpower Commission as locally needed.

That is how important the designation, "locally needed," is to the employer. If a business place has this designation, IV–F employees may not only remain in that employment, but those not so employed will be told by the draft boards to get into such work. Men over the age of 26 engaged in locally needed activities are to be considered for occupational deferment. Naturally, it follows that if the employer does not have this locally needed designation, he will lose his IV–F and overage registrants. Here is where the discrimination due to wage rates is made.

My constituent has been denied this designation by the War Manpower Commission. He does not have one single man in his employ making less than 70 cents per hour, but because there are a few women and school girls making less than 50 cents an hour he cannot qualify for the "locally needed" designation. I have in my possession a photostatic copy of the letter denying his application. Therefore, the entire plant of my constituent is denied the coverage and protection to which it is entitled. The owner is not considered as "in support of the war" simply because he cannot get the "locally needed" designation. If he raises a few women's wages he automatically will become eligible for the "locally needed" designation and can secure occupational deferments of his over-age men and also not lose his IV–F workers.

"Locally needed" designation is all important. Unfortunately, under Professor Stocking's standards, wartime essentiality is being based on wages paid any one employee in any one business.

Representatives of the laundry industry in a letter dated April 27 called this discriminatory practice to the attention of selective service officials. No answer has been given them to this date.

It is not my intention to appeal to this House to adjust the problems attendant upon wage controversies. I do, however, vehemently protest against these unethical and ridiculous provisions which are all too often important to the application or usefulness of a war program. This is a time to fight the war. It is the time for full and productive effort. It is the time to protect the health, welfare, and morale of our people. It is not the time to initiate social reforms. At least, they should not be used to the detriment of a full and orderly prosecution of the war effort.

Such participation by the War Manpower Commission and Selective Service in problems that involve controversial wage issues which tend to destroy the entire historical structure of one man's business is unethical and certainly unfair.

In Cleveland, Ohio, which incidentally is in the same labor region as southern Michigan. War Manpower officials have extended the "locally needed" designation to the laundry industry only to take it away because of this minimum-wage provision, then give it back to them, only to withdraw it later. On again, off again, gone again, Finnegan.

A week ago a Cleveland draft board called in a IV–F laundry employee and because the plant in which he worked had lost its "locally needed" status, he was told to get himself into other essential or locally needed employment. In this particular case, if the laundry owner would apply to the War Labor Board for a few wage increases, not for the IV–F man, but for some other employee, not concerned or considered in draft problems, he could retain this man and others in the IV–F classification. In my opinion such discrimination on a wage basis is ridiculous, unethical, and certainly an example of social reform injected into this all-important war program by our Professor Stocking.

My blood boils when I think this administration permits its little dictators to issue such discriminatory and bungling regulations in times like these.

Here is a case where a little "Nero" fiddles while laundries, dry cleaners, hotels and restaurants are being forced to close their doors because of the resultant drain of manpower. Service to industrial plants, military establishments, and civilians as well suffers the consequences.

I realize there is little Congress, as it is now constituted, can do about it aside from demanding the removal of all men from key positions who use their temporary authority to bring about reforms.

Progressives and the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY SAUTHOFF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me at the State convention of the Progressive Party held in Milwaukee on Sunday, May 7, 1944:

Abraham Lincoln once said, "Whenever there is a conflict between human rights and property rights, human rights must prevail."

Wisconsin liberals in all parties have fought for that same principle for at least half a century. We are confronted with the same struggle today and must pledge ourselves to carry on. Again we must rally to fight for those liberal principles which hundreds of thousands of our people have carried on for several generations. Under the guise of war emergency, monopoly is acquiring a firm hold on the production of this country. Even the free production and commerce of food products is losing ground to these monopolistic practices. It is a strange paradox that we should spend billions of dollars and wreck thousands upon thousands of lives to crush our enemies abroad, only to be victimized by these enemies at home. It is your duty, and my duty, to protect our people from these practices in the future as we have done in the past.

PROGRESSIVES AND THE WAR

This war was not of our seeking. We Progressives pledged ourselves in our platform to give the people a referendum on fighting abroad. A similar pledge was in the platforms of the Democratic and Republican Parties of this State. As far as I know, I am the only one who kept that platform pledge. The people of my district had the opportunity to express themselves on that question. In my case, at least, it was not just campaign oratory.

We Progressives have been denounced for taking an ostrich attitude toward this matter and sticking our heads in the sand; that we were unrealistic and failed to understand what was going on.

Let's look at the record:

In 1935, the first year that I came to Congress, I found a small group, made up of all political parties, attempting to do something to strengthen the Air Force of the United States. That group was led by a Progressive, Jerry Boileau, of Wausau, now a circuit judge. Again and again we attempted to amend appropriation bills by adding an item for air power, but at most we could muster but 60 votes. Yet this war has demonstrated that a nation without air power is without strength, and cannot succeed against those that are mighty in the air. That fact has been reluctantly admitted after 9 years of debate on the subject, because air power today gets first priority. Were we unrealistic in this case?

Again in 1937, on two separate and distinct occasions, I introduced resolutions in the House calling for embargoes on arms, munitions, and implements of war and critical war material to Japan. Neither of these resolutions ever got a hearing, although some of us tried to be heard on this all-important subject. We have been advised that 60 percent of the critical war materials used against our boys were purchased in this country, and that 85 percent of such materials was purchased from the British Empire, the Kingdom of the Netherlands, and the United States of America. Less than 6 percent of Japan's war materials have come from Germany and Italy. On March 19, 1941, I warned that Japan was getting ready to strike; that we should arm ourselves as speedily as possible, and strengthen our defenses so as to be ready when the blow fell. Was that being unrealistic?

On April 2, 1941, 2 months before it happened, I pointed out that Hitler would invade Russia and that when he did it would be the beginning of the end for him and his gang. I claimed that he could not conquer Russia because a second-rate paperhanger could never achieve what the greatest military genius of all time was unable to accomplish. Was that being unrealistic?

At the same time and in the same speech, I said that when we were sufficiently involved in the Atlantic Ocean, Japan would strike; that when she did strike, the Philippines would fall. Was that being unrealistic?

I also stated that it would take 5 to 6 years to defeat Japan. The late Secretary of the Navy said, in a statement before Pearl Harbor, that we could defeat Japan in 7 weeks, while a prominent Senator stated that we could blow the Japanese Islands out of the Pacific Ocean in 6 weeks, but they were called realistic while we were not.

Had there been a little more of our realism and a little less of our critic's realism, there never would have been a Pearl Harbor with a shocking loss of life and the worst naval defeat in our history. Someone was to blame for the 4,000 lives that were lost on that eventful Sunday, and as long as I live, whether in public office or out of it, I shall work for a full, free, and untrammeled investigation of the whole bloody business.

War has a strange fascination over man. You can pass a declaration of war through both Houses of Congress in an hour. You can pass an act conscripting the youth of this land through both Houses of Congress in 2 days, but you cannot pass an act through even one House of Congress conscripting war profits, although we have been trying to do so for 27 years. Worse than that, you cannot even bring forth to the light of day the income-tax reports of these war profiteers. Line up and regiment the farmer—tell him what he can sow and plant and reap—tell him what help he can have and what machinery he can use and what he can charge. Line up the laboring man and tell him to be a patriot—tell him to speed up production—take no time off no matter how many injuries result—and what he can charge for his work. But don't, whatever you do, don't do anything about profits. You are destroying the profiteer's morale. You are spreading disunity, you radical. Keep your mouth shut. Truly, "silence is golden—for the thief." Eight and one-half billions of dollars after taxes were made in profits by corporations last year. In time of peace that amount would be questionable; in time of war it is utterly unjustifiable. No law of God gives the right to such profits at the cost of others' misery, and no law of man ought to permit it.

Today, western civilization hangs in the balance—the great powers of the world are in a death grapple. It is the second time within the present generation that man has tried to destroy himself. When will it happen again? A poll just conducted by the University of Denver showed that 59 of the first 100 people interviewed said that the next war would take place within 50 years. If these recurring catastrophes cannot be ended, the white man and his civilization cannot survive. Is there nothing that we can do about it? I think there is.

Our first task is, of course, to win this war. It is my guess, and yours is as good as mine, that the war in Europe will be finished before the next election, but that the war in the Far East will not be over the latter part of 1945 or some time in 1946. The invasion of western Europe is now at hand. We know that the cost will be heavy in "blood, sweat, and tears." We know that there will be a blood bath of some of our finest boys in western Europe. Shall these sacrifices be made in vain? It would be an outrageous betrayal of our dead if we permitted a drifting back into the old order of things and made no determined effort to prevent its recurrence, if it is at all humanly possible to do so.

Our foreign affairs are in the hands of Cordell Hull, a man of vast experience. I have every confidence in Secretary Hull. He is a man of ability—shrewd, capable, and fully informed. No one is fooling him. He sees clearly and his feet are on the ground. However, no one man, no matter who he is, should have the power and authority to bind this country by any commitments with any foreign nation.

Last Tuesday I had an interesting visit with our Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull. I requested this interview because of certain statements made in Mr. Hull's talk over the radio a month ago on our foreign policy, so I said to him at our meeting:

"Mr. Secretary, I heard your remarks over the radio and have since read them twice. I am in accord with them, but there is one thing which I would like to have cleared up, and that is this: You say that we will drive out all Nazi and Fascist elements in control in Europe, and then later on you say that when peace has been restored, the people of the different countries will have an opportunity to vote for the kind of government they want. My question is this: What do you propose to do if the people of some country vote for a Fascist government?"

He answered, "Congressman, I think the people of Europe will be so sick and tired of Fascists and Nazis that they will be glad when we throw them out and will vote for a democratic kind of government. That is what I expect them to do."

I said, "Yes, Mr. Secretary, I am inclined to agree with you, but I recall that after the First World War, Germany voted for a republic and had one for a while, but it failed to get the support that it ought to have had from Britain, France, and the United States and collapsed, giving Hitler an opportunity to move in. I do not want to see the same thing happen again."

The Secretary replied, "Of course, there is the danger that governments set up following the war may be temporary, but if they are democratic governments, I feel we have got to help them stay on their feet and get themselves established, and it is my hope that we can get the support not only of this country but other countries in that respect."

I certainly can agree wholeheartedly with our Secretary in this regard, and I refer to this part of our conversation to indicate the difference between Secretary of State Hull's approach to this grave problem and that of General Patton and Winston Churchill, who are very friendly to an Anglo-American alliance. Personally, I believe such a move would be dangerous, as it would at once arouse the suspicion of other countries and create a countermovement on their part to offset it. This is just the thing we want to avoid, and I feel that Secretary Hull's efforts to promote the republic idea among countries of Europe is more in accordance with our ideals and will result in greater and more permanent benefits for the future, than the imperialistic idea.

For thousands of years man has settled his differences by force and violence. Again and again and again hordes of fighting men have overrun the earth and destroyed everything of value—spiritual, moral, physical, and financial. Might has made right, and he with the most powerful legions at the moment was the conquerer. But not for long, because other leaders, uniting temporarily for their own advantage, would destroy what had been done and all that went with it, and so the merry dance of death has gone on down the pages of history through all recorded time.

One conclusion can be reached from these lessons, and that is this: That problems settled by force and violence are not settled right and therefore are never settled permanently. What shall we adopt in place of force and violence? To me it seems clear that agitators and demagogs find fertile soil wherein they can sow their seeds of envy and malice and hate, only when the people feel themselves sorely aggrieved. Popular discontent and popular unrest are the result of social injustice and economic insecurity. A happy people is not a warlike people. The best proof of that fact is our own country. We are not warlike—we do not covet another's territories nor his possessions. Our people are slow to anger and frequently will bear with ills rather than resort to violence. That is because we are a peace-loving people who are happy and content and do not make it easy for the agitator or the demagog to rouse us to a clamor for war. Bombs and bullets have never solved any national or international problem, and they will not do so in the future. Give the people of any country an opportunity for clean living, for decency, and for security, and they will not rush to arms.

I feel, therefore, that certain underlying principles must be patent to all of us.

1. No country can establish world peace by itself.

2. International cooperation is absolutely essential to any scheme for a lasting peace.

3. Social justice and economic security are a sounder foundation for law and order than might and brute force.

There are several corollaries that should go along with these three:

(a) No secret agreements by any government with any private firms or other nations should be allowed.

(b) Eventually all nations must be included in this family of nations, not only some; and

(c) All discussions among nations should be open and above board so that every member of the family can hear and take part in the discussion.

Therefore, I believe that a super state, with a super army and a super navy and a super air force, is not the answer to our problem, nor can these make a people happy, peaceful and contented. Some mechanism for participation in and cooperation with the nations of the world is absolutely essential, with a tribunal impartially composed to hear the grievances of those who feel themselves discriminated against. In this respect the League of Nations was an utter failure because peoples under mandate had no power to voice their complaint. In my judgment, the court of the world must be open to anyone who seeks redress from his wrongs, and such court must be as fair and impartial a tribunal as the frailties of human nature make it capable of being.

There is a group in this country that is more British than Churchill, and another group that is more Russian than Stalin. I admire both Mr. Churchill and Marshal Stalin. Churchill loves Britain and works for her morning, noon, and night. He makes no bones about his loyalty to Britain first. Marshal Stalin loves Russia and works for her morning, noon, and night. He bluntly says what he wants for Russia and is devoted to the task of securing these wants. I honor these men for their devotion to their countries. And I pledge myself to devotion and loyalty to the United States of America. I would rather be for America first, than for America last.

Giving away the wealth of the United States will not save the world, nor can we save it by destroying the standards of living of our own people. Some sacrifices will be necessary, but I would rather sacrifice a little of my money or my ease and comfort than the life of my son.

"Old men make war which young men have to fight," and every war is a confession that those in power were not able to solve their problems peacefully. There is no justice in sacrificing a generation because of the failures of its rulers. Every generation has its right to a normal life and should not have that right destroyed by a generation that preceded it and over which it had no control. Therefore, we are faced with the task of making the world secure for the next generation.

This is not a simple task. On the contrary, it offers so many disturbing and difficult problems that it will take years of slow and careful and persistent effort to bring it into working order. In Europe alone there are today 30 disputes over boundaries between countries, any one of which will produce vexations and irritations. Anyone who stops to think of unhappy Poland will realize the enormity of these boundary disputes. With boundary disputes will come trade disputes, and with trade disputes will come disputes over shipping, air lines, communications, and so forth. All of these have got to be worked out slowly and carefully, and with the least possible amount of friction. No single nation can or ought to be permitted to corner the markets of the world by tariffs, trade routes, shipping tonnage or international cartels. It will be a case of give and take, but not a case of put and take—we put and they take. Many of the old formulas will be brought up again, such as balance of power, spheres of influence, and union now. Let no one hold hard and fast to any of these because every one of them can and no doubt will have its hostile counterpart. "Pleasant relations with all—entangling alliances with none" is still a pretty good motto. That does not mean we must hold aloof—on the contrary, I firmly believe we must cooperate to the best of our ability, but I also believe that we should not tie ourselves up with any one nation, as it will at once create suspicion and hostility in the attitude of other nations.

The Western Hemisphere has demonstrated that a pan-American alliance can be had to the advantage of everyone concerned. No doubt other continents could profit by that example. Napoleon once said, "Europe will never be at peace until it is all Russia or a republic." It is my hope that it may be a republic within the next decade or two. Certainly it is something for them to strive for, as the lessons of peace must have told all of them that they cannot continue along the old lines. Russia is working out her problems with an amazing degree of success, and it is to be hoped that when the Jap is driven from her shores, China, too, will be a free and independent nation, fully united along the lines of democratic principles. The great nations of the world, China, Britain, Russia, and the United States, are charged with the duty and the burden of working out these problems along mutually agreed lines so that mankind may have security and peace.

Of these great powers, the United States is the oldest government without a major constitutional change. It is the wealthiest government and the most peaceful, and by precept and example we can show the world how to keep happy and prosperous. Our unselfishness in the past, and our willingness to help in the present and in the future, should be the surest indication of our national good will and the generosity of our people. It is your task and my task to uphold our Government in its efforts and to maintain peace and security at home and aid in securing peace and security abroad.

The eminent American historian, Charles A. Beard, summarized the Progressives' concept of the sound basis upon which a truly American foreign policy should be built: "The supreme object of American foreign policy should be to protect and promote the interests, spiritual and material, of the American people, and subject to that mandate to conduct foreign affairs in such a manner as to contribute to the peace and civilization of mankind."

Bureaucracy Is a State of Mind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette of May 10:

THE MAN WHO WATCHED POLITICS

(By C. W. Dressler)

BUREAUCRACY IS A STATE OF MIND

Bureaucracy, said the man who watches politics, is a state of mind and not a condition of servitude, and while it is generally applied to Government service it is likely to appear almost anywhere given the proper combination of a little authority and the desire to exercise it upon the customer.

This term has become highly disparaging, said the man who watches politics, and it has almost come to the point where when somebody calls somebody else a bureaucrat he first looks around to see whether any ladies are present because everybody knows what he means although in general it is customary to put a couple of adjectives in front of it.

However, said the man who watches politics, the state of mind which is generally implied by the word "bureaucrat" shows up in various places, as for instance when the receptionist or clerk is very nasty about taking your name in to Mr. Big or when you are running for a streetcar and the motorman takes great pleasure in shutting the door in your pan just as you are about to get on the first step or when people in any walk of life take delight in demonstrating that you are a nuisance and are bothering them unnecessarily and make you feel like a heel for having interrupted them and you go away swearing at yourself for having come there in the first place, and when this happens, it is safe to say that you have just met a bureaucrat even if he or she, as the case may be, doesn't work in a bureau at all.

Now, said the man who watches politics, when the Government goes in a big way for bureaus to take care of this or that and hires a lot of people to tell the rest of the people where to get off and how, and why they can't do something they always did before without hurting the body politic, the Government makes it possible for many of these new employees, if they are inclined that way anyhow, to look down their noses at the taxpayers or even at Congressmen if they happen to be high enough in the scale of bureaus to get away with this practice, and this gives the rest of the people who work for the Government a bad name although as a matter of fact most of the people who work in this bureau are not bureaucrats at all but just ordinary citizens who have a job with the Government.

But it is also true, said the man who watches politics, that this disease takes on aggravated forms when it occurs in Government service because the average citizen approaching the Government is a little bit scared about it anyhow, especially if he has been shoved around here and there before he finds the proper place to go, which is very likely to have happened to him because the citizen who hits the proper governmental bureau first crack out of the box is either very lucky or else has an I. Q. much above the average, and this is something the man who watches politics said he had never succeeded in doing himself but he has the highest admiration for anyone who can do it twice in succession.

So the average citizen who gets into a bureau starts out assuming that he is in the wrong place and arrives in an apologetic mood, said the man who watches politics, and this makes him a "sitting duck" for any bureaucrat who happens to be around because the customer figures he is in the wrong anyhow and this affords an incipient bureaucrat a perfect opportunity and one not to be wasted, whereas the same citizen in his normal habitat is not to be sneezed at with impunity and is likely to complain to the management.

And this is where the danger lies in bureaucracy, said the man who watches politics, since it is very difficult to complain to the management of a Government bureau who probably got there because he is on good terms with somebody higher up in the Government service and this is a vicious cycle which is hard to get to the end of because Mr. Roosevelt is busy with the war and other matters, and therefore bureaucrats can do about what they please and get away with it which is hard on the customers and leaves them in a state of mind which is not conducive to unity but, in fact, otherwise.

A Practicing Dentist of Washington State, a Distinguished World War No. 1 Veteran, Discusses the Dental Corps, United States Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, a warm personal friend, Dr. Harry Deegan, of Shelton, Wash., not far from my congressional district, has sent me an article in which he discusses his own appraisement of the Dental Corps and suggested improvements with respect thereto. Many friends have requested me to have the same inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It contains matter of wide interest to the dental profession, and constitutes an analysis of a controversial subject drafted by one of the most eminent dentists in the State of Washington.

Here is the article:

In the April issue of the American Dental Association magazine, Robert H. Mills, D. D. S., had an article relative to the Army Dental Corps. I am assuming that he is General Mills, ranking officer of the Dental Corps, United States Army. The history that Dr. Mills gave was interesting, but the history of the Dental Corps, previous to World War No. 1, is of little importance now. There are; however, some vital changes that would seem in order, for instance:

1. Just how long is the Dental Corps going to be subordinate to the Medical Corps and what has been done to correct this evil? If you will pardon the personal element, I might relate one experience out of my many while acting as Regimental Dental Surgeon under the direction of a major in the Medical Corps in World War No. 1. I was told to command a regimental dressing station about a half mile from our present location on the front. I stated to him he had picked out a poor site. He immediately wanted to know if I was afraid to go up to it, although he did not offer to go. With two medical men and a detachment of men we established the station and in a short time were shelled. One of the officers with me was killed instantly, the other critically wounded, and I carried him out of artillery range—he died later. When the smoke of battle was over the major received a Divisional Citation and I was discredited for my work. I just cite this case as an example as to what is sometimes handed the Dental Corps up in front by the Medical Corps. To my knowledge, the heads of the Dental Corps have never investigated the record of this officer. The thing that seems uppermost in their minds is the personal element of promotion. This is no reflection, however, on the Medical Corps work.

2. Just how many of the Regular Army Corps dentists that were in the Army a year before Pearl Harbor ever received front-line duty?

3. What has the Dental Corps done toward a post-war adjustment in regard to the dental equipment now being used that will be such a surplus after the war? Why not give the men that are using it a chance to buy it?

4. Why should there be 520 men to each dentist in the Army when there is only 1 dentist to every 2,500 civilians? The men in the Army should require less attention than the average citizen since they are supposedly healthy young men. I think a more equal division could be worked out and no one suffer.

5. Is it necessary to have a dental surgeon acting as a medical first aid man in the front lines when there is such a scarcity of dentists? Don't you think his place could be taken by a person more easily replaced?

6. A few months ago I was solicited by the Molsby Printing Co. to buy a book that, of which I believe Dr. Mills was coauthor, at a price of $10. What do you think about officers in the Dental Corps donating to the profession any knowledge they might have acquired while under Government pay and being educated by the Government?

7. According to the doctor's article, quantity not quality is the objective of his department. Taking his figures, I will give them a break and say there were 7,000 dentists on an average from Pearl Harbor to the date of his article. There were 335 working days. If these men worked every working day, they would have to do the following each day: 13.7 fillings, 1.38 prophylactic and pyorrhea cases, and 1 denture. One denture repair every 10 days, 1 bridge every 5 days, and there was no consideration for extractions, Vincents', post-operative pains or aching teeth. Harry Houdini might be able to perform this magic, but I do not think there are 7,000 Houdini's in the Dental Corps. The regretable feature about this mass production is the majority of these officers doing the work will return to civilian life, as will their patients. Most of these dentists will be building up a practice and if they mention they were Army dentists it will be a handicap rather than an asset.

8. In private practice a patient comes to his doctor through choice, some by reference from other patients. Why not make this a practice in the Army where possible? When a soldier comes to the clinic or infirmary where there are usually several dentists why not give him his choice? It would give the dentist a little more pride in his work and the patient a little more confidence in his dentist.

9. The higher ranking dental officer should not be expected to do paper work. If they are more valuable doing paper work than dentistry they should be in another department.

These are only a few corrections that could be made in the Dental Corps that might be beneficial to the Army, men, and the civilian dentist who, after all, is doing his share in shouldering his responsibility in this war.

Red Lake-Clearwater River Project Should Be Undertaken Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, the passage Tuesday by the House of the bill H. R. 4485, known as the omnibus flood-control bill, will be joyously received by thousands of people in the Red Lake-Clearwater River drainage area of northwestern Minnesota. The population residing in the following counties either directly or indirectly will be benefited by the ultimate results of this project: Pennington, Red Lake, Polk, Clearwater, Beltrami, and Marshall.

After the beneficial results of this program are determined it might be desirable to undertake a number of smaller additional projects to increase the benefits to the people in the surrounding areas, which now may not directly be a part of the present project. Citizens of this section can be sure that every effort will be made to undertake a project which will bring benefits to their communities.

At this time I want to insert into the RECORD a statement which I made before the House Flood Control Committee at the time that hearings were held on the Red Lake-Clearwater River project during the consideration of and hearings on the bill H. R. 4485. The statement I made to the committee at that time follows:

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity that you have given me to present some additional testimony and evidence in support of the project known as Red Lake River and tributaries, including Clearwater River, Minn., the official information on which is found in House Document No. 345 of the first session of the Seventy-eighth Congress.

I also want to thank you for the hearings you held on this project on Wednesday, February 2, at which time you heard some excellent testimony in support of the project by Col. George R. Goethals, chief of engineers, War Department. Colonel Goethals certainly was right when he asserted that benefits will be forthcoming on the completion of this project to all of the people of the area.

There is, of course, an urgent need for the completion of this project at this time. There is a large area of good farming land in the section which is subject to floods, and if this project were completed, a great amount of additional food would be produced to help win the war.

I am enclosing for consideration a copy of a letter which Gov. Edward J. Thye, of Minnesota, wrote to Mr. Marvin Jones, Administrator of the War Food Administration, Washington, D. C., in support of the immediate construction of this project.

Incidentally, my predecessor, United States Representative R. T. Buckler, who retired without running for reelection and who supported me in my campaign, has been very actively interested in this project with me for many years. I give him great credit for bringing the project up to this stage of development.

On behalf of many men in public life and private citizens of the area as well, we also want to thank you and your committee for the excellent help and cooperation that you have given us and all of the others interested in this worthy project at this time and in the past.

It is our hope that your committee will find it desirable to include this project in the bill for presentation to Congress in the near future.

I am glad to say that the committee did include the project in this omnibus bill, and I want to express the appreciation of myself and the people of the area concerned for their action and their fine cooperation.

To add further information and arguments to the statement that this project should be undertaken during the war period as an emergency food-producing job, I would like to insert into the RECORD the following letter from Minnesota's Governor, Edward J. Thye, to Marvin Jones, Administrator of the War Food Administration:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
St. Paul, February 21, 1944.

HON. MARVIN JONES,
Administrator,
War Food Administration,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JONES: I wish to request your consideration of a matter of considerable importance to wartime crop production. This is the project for flood control in the basin of the Red Lake River and Clearwater River in northwestern Minnesota. I enclose a memorandum prepared by our State conservation department, describing the main features of the project, especially those bearing on crop production of wartime significance.

As you will note from the memorandum, the project has been approved in all respects by the War Department and has been submitted to Congress by the Secretary of War, with a printed report, House Document No. 345, Seventy-eighth Congress, first session, Government Printing Office, 1943. The only obstacle is the reservation expressed in Secretary Stimson's letter of transmittal to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, dated October 25, 1943, prefacing the report, to the effect that although the project appears desirable under normal conditions, it would not be of sufficient value to the war program to warrant the use of needed manpower, equipment, or critical materials, and that therefore no appropriation should be considered or construction initiated until after the war.

We are satisfied that the facts to which attention is called in the conservation department's memorandum, apparently not apprehended by Secretary Stimson, are more than sufficient to justify immediate construction of the project by reason of resulting increases in crop production. This is confirmed by what I personally observed on a trip which I made through the area with our State commissioner of conservation, Chester S. Wilson, in the early part of January of this year. There was evidence on every hand of widespread damage done to large areas of fertile improved farm land by successive floods, and it was apparent that a very substantial increase in crop production would be assured by protection against floods and by provision for drainage which would be afforded by construction of the project.

The proposed channel improvements will also make a material contribution to the war effort in another way, by augmenting the essential water supply of substantial communities and important industries located in the valley, thereby safeguarding against possible interruption through water shortage of the operation of plants engaged in handling and processing large quantities of food and fiber materials and in manufacturing finished products for Army, Navy, and lend-lease purposes, as well as for essential civilian use, including grain, flour, beet sugar, dehydrated potatoes, dehydrated eggs, milk products, flax fiber, and various other necessary commodities.

On a recent trip to Washington I discussed this project with the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Minnesota. They were unanimously of the opinion that it deserves immediate consideration, and that it should be possible to secure the necessary Federal appropriation to cover the Federal Government's share of the estimated cost, $902,910.

While I was in Washington Mr. LeRoy K. Smith, director of the north-central region, Agricultural Adjustment Agency, Washington, D. C., was in St. Paul, and while there attended a conference at which the project was submitted and discussed by Mr. Wilson, commissioner of conservation; his deputy and chief engineer, Mr. E. V. Willard, and by representatives of the St. Paul offices of the Department of Agriculture and the United States Corps of Engineers. Mr. Smith can give you a report of the results of that conference, which, I am sure, will support the conclusions in favor of immediate construction expressed in the enclosed memorandum.

If detailed evidence is desired to substantiate the general propositions summarized in the conservation department's memorandum it will be found in abundance in the War Department's report above-mentioned and in the reports of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, which are doubtless available to you. In case a conference or hearing on the matter should be desired either by your office or by a congressional committee or other interested agency, our State conservation department as well as the local agencies interested will be glad to send representatives to Washington for that purpose. However, I believe that an examination of the reports above mentioned will furnish ample proof of the merits of the project without further investigation.

I believe that a statement from your office to the effect that immediate construction is justified from the wartime crop production standpoint, if you so conclude after considering the matter, would remove all obstacles and clear the way for consideration by Congress of an immediate appropriation, as well as for the undertaking of construction by the War Department in case an appropriation is made.

Time is pressing, since work should be commenced as early as conditions will permit during the coming spring, if the essential features of the project are to be completed this year in time to be of benefit for the next following crop season. I therefore urge that you give this matter consideration at your very earliest convenience, and I hope that the project will receive your endorsement.

Thanking you, I am,
Very truly yours,
EDWARD J. THYE, Governor.

Seattle Chamber of Commerce Opposes Repeal of the Webb-Pomerene Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. COFFEE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, the Seattle Chamber of Commerce has taken a strong position opposing the repeal of the Webb-Pomerene Act. It is contended by these distinguished businessmen that such an appeal would place an additional handicap on the exportation of lumber from the State of Washington. The lumbermen of my State are severely hampered in trade by the provision of the Ottawa Conference. Under this Ottawa agreement, the Douglas fir from British Columbia may be exported to any of the British possessions under a preferential duty. The preferential duties make it virtually impossible for the Washington State lumbermen to compete against their British Columbia rivals in any of the United Kingdom possessions.

But let the resolution speak for itself. Here it is:

The Seattle Chamber of Commerce opposes the adoption of H. R. 4493, introduced by Representative MCMURRAY, of Wisconsin, March 27, 1944.

The announced purpose of this bill is to protect and promote trade and commerce among the nations of the world, but it is believed that its enactment would have a diametrically opposite effect upon the foreign commerce of the United States.

In substance, the bill strikes at and would prevent any cartel arrangement or price stabilization program in foreign trade, thus handicapping, if not preventing, the foreign traders of the United States competing with foreign traders of other nations. With such a law on the statute books our foreign traders would find it very difficult, if not impossible, to negotiate with others in foreign countries in foreign trade.

The bill repeals the present Webb-Pomerene Act, which was specifically enacted to permit the foreign traders of the United States to form corporations engaged in foreign trade, and which corporations were authorized to have price-stabilization agreements and enter into cartel agreements in foreign trade. The Webb-Pomerene Act enables our foreign traders to compete on at least an equal basis with traders of other countries.

The following reasons are submitted in support of the recommendation to oppose this legislation:

1. That the repeal of the Webb-Pomerene Act would immediately subject corporations organized under such act to suits under the antitrust laws, with the result that trade built up under that act would have to be immediately discontinued.

2. This bill would establish another commission to investigate and submit findings with respect to trade arrangements with foreign nations, which is unnecessary in view of the already established Federal Trade Commission, and also in view of powers now possessed by the Tariff Commission.

3. If there is any necessity for further investigation, the Federal Trade Commission should be empowered to make such investigation preliminary to any legislation on the subject, and that there not be set up any new commission for the reason that the Federal Trade Commission has much data already with which any new commission would have to familiarize itself. The same may be said with respect to the Tariff Commission.

4. The enactment of this bill would make every foreign trader in this country fear he might be a criminal, liable to such severe penalties as are provided, viz, "a fine not exceeding $25,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 2 years, or by both of said punishments, at the discretion of the court."

5. Before any legislation should be enacted, there should be international agreements specifying what citizens of each country may do with each other in foreign trade, so that traders with that country may know what is permissible and what is prohibited.

6. The proposed bill would throw all foreign trade of the United States into confusion, as its effect on foreign traders would depend upon constructions of any foreign trade activity by the Attorney General of the United States and the courts as to whether or not they were prohibited by the act. The terms of the act are so general that it is impossible to determine the limits of its scope.

7. It is believed that the Webb-Pomerene Act has been a great help to foreign trade and should not be repealed.

8. We are unable to see any feature of the proposed legislation that is desirable, and therefore not only is unanimously and strongly opposed, and it is urged that the Washington State congressional delegation vigorously oppose it.

The Fighting French

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a copy of an editorial from the New Orleans Times-Picayune, of date May 10, 1944, entitled "The Fighting French," as follows:

THE FIGHTING FRENCH

Decortion of a French corvette and a number of its personnel, here in our own harbor last Monday, gave New Orleanians cheering evidence that the French are back in the war. The honored ship, flying the Cross of Lorraine flag of De Gaulle, was cited for 30 months' gallant service in the antisubmarine campaign in the North Atlantic. This reminder that French resistance was maintained during the war's darkest days was scarcely needed here. The decoration ceremony gave local emphasis, however, to the current news of France's military come-back.

According to the current United States news, the French Army of liberation numbers close to 500,000 men today, with 300,000 already equipped for action, the remainder being rapidly outfitted and thousands more awaiting their turn for equipment and training. Units are in the battle lines already. French warships are working with the Allied fleets in the Mediterranean and the Atlantic.

Within the homeland guerrilla forces estimated to total 250,000 are operating in the mountain and hill regions. The underground has enlisted a million more, already helping the fight for liberation and ready to play a larger role when the Allied invasion comes. This formidable muster inside the Nazi fortress has grown despite the most drastic attempts to destroy it and causes no little worry to Hitler and his generals. Its leaders maintain close touch with General De Gaulle and the French committee. When D-day comes, the Fighting French will give a good account of themselves wherever they are placed and whatever the tasks assigned them.

No Discrimination Against Negro Soldiers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following letter from the Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson, in which he sets forth with great clarity the policy of the War Department with regard to Negro soldiers, and in which he denies the charges of racial discrimination, and asserts that Army personnel is assigned according to their qualifications and abilities regardless of race or color:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 9, 1944.

Hon. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HERTER: I have your letter of May 2 and enclosure from Miss Mary A. Willcox, 63 Oakwood Road, Newtonville 60, Mass., concerning the War Department's policy with regard to Negro soldiers.

I am enclosing a copy of the letter to Congressman FISH to which Miss Wilcox refers and wish to invite your and her attention particularly to the following observation which concluded that letter:

"Permit me to emphasize, in conclusion, that any implication that the War Department is deliberately attempting to avoid sending overseas, or to keep out of combat, troops of the Negro or any other race, is entirely without foundation. Our personnel is distributed and employed as required, on duties individuals are qualified to perform, regardless of their racial derivations. Large numbers of Negro troops are overseas or en route and will be given every opportunity to win battle honors and demonstrate their worth in actual combat. The War Department has every intention of continuing its past efforts to make the best possible use of its available manpower in the prosecution of the war without regard to race, religion, color, or other unmilitary considerations."

I feel that the above statement, which has been and remains the policy of the War Department, needs no elaboration.

With regard to the unsatisfactory record of the Nine Hundred and Thirtieth and Nine Hundred and Thirty-first Field Artillery Battalions, as mentioned in my letter to Congressman FISH, this is a factual situation which has been so presented in War Department correspondence on the subject. However, the statement has been distorted in some quarters both in its meaning and purpose. Numerous white organizations also have been found unsatisfactory, and many more white than Negro organizations have been converted to service units. It is not seriously maintained, I am sure, that the War Department would feel it was serving its own interests by finding the performance of any of its units, particularly a combat unit, to be unsatisfactory unless the facts warranted such a finding. My statement concerning these battalions was, I repeat, based on fact alone and had absolutely no racial implications whatsoever.

I might add here that all Negro officer personnel who were assigned to the Nine Hundred and Thirtieth and Nine Hundred and Thirty-first Field Artillery Battalions have been or soon will be assigned to the Ninety-second Division, and, unless found to be unqualified, will replace white officers presently assigned to that organization.

Miss Willcox refers to the World War record of the Three Hundred and Sixty-ninth Infantry. As you know, the records of the personnel compcsing units which saw combat service in World War No. 1 have no bearing, and obviously could have no bearing, upon the capabilities of personnel now assigned to these same units. You will note, in this connection, that my letter to Congressman FISH does not reflect in any manner on the World War No. 1 record of any unit.

My comment in the attached letter that "many of the Negro units have been unable to master efficiently the use of modern weapons" also has been seriously misinterpreted in some quarters. As in the case of the unsatisfactory record of the Field Artillery units mentioned above, this is a factual situation solely and cannot properly be interpreted as a reflection on the Negro race. In utilizing Negro soldiers we have been faced with the fact that in civilian life large numbers of Negro inductees had inadequate educational opportunities. In a recent study of all men processed at induction centers since June 1943, 20 percent of the Negroes and 74 percent of the whites were rated in grades I, II, and III by Army general-classification tests; 80 percent of the Negroes and 26 percent of the whites fell in grades IV and V. These lower classifications certainly do not reflect either the intelligence of the men or their native abilities. However, they do indicate the nature and extent of the problem with which we must deal. To meet it, special training units for all men in class V, irrespective of race, have been established at several posts throughout the country. Courses of instruction are offered to give these men a basic education that will fit them for the proper performance of their Army duties. Very encouraging results have been obtained to date. In the first 6 months of these courses, out of 29,000 Negro trainees, approximately 90 percent were retained in the Army and assigned to more advanced training. Many excellent soldiers have been developed from men who have originally made a low score on the Army general-classification test.

I might add that our decision to convert certain combat units into service organizations has been necessitated primarily by the constantly increasing demands of overseas commanders for service units in excess of those available. This and other factors, some of which were brought out in my letter to Congressman FISH, have required the conversion of both white and colored combat units to meet military requirements. However, I wish to state most emphatically that we have labored diligently in an effort to avoid discrimination against any individual or group, and that all our personnel policies have been set for the past many years without regard to race or creed. Permit me to observe that if Miss Willcox's organization believes that the War Department has pursued a policy of deliberate discrimination against Negroes, this belief is the result of misinformation; and I feel that she would be rendering a signal service to the Nation and the Negro race by assisting in the correction of this misunderstanding.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

Resolution of the Buffalo City Planning Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH MRUK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. MRUK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution, which was adopted by the Buffalo City Planning Association on May 8, 1944, concerning the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project:

Whereas there is now pending before the the United States Senate Commerce Committee a bill introduced by Senator AIKEN (S. 1385), providing for the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project; and

Whereas it is our confirmed belief and conviction that this bill, introduced by Senator AIKEN, of Vermont, in the Seventy-eighth Congress, represents nothing more or less than legislation compelling a clear abdication by the sovereign State of New York to the Federal Government of its inalienable rights in and to the natural resources of New York State, comprised in the State's ownership of the bed, water, power, and power sites adjacent to or within the watershed of the St. Lawrence River; and

Whereas the St. Lawrence seaway could be used only during 42 percent of the year because of weather conditions; and

Whereas the St. Lawrence seaway and power project considered in its entirety as an undertaking which includes navigation as well as power works, is unsound; and

Whereas the seaway would be so generally ruinous to American commerce and industry, labor and capital that its Nation-wide deleterious effects, particularly serious so far as New York State is concerned, would far exceed whatever claimed advantages might redound to the special interests; and

Whereas American industry would be damaged by foreign competition through the free use of the St. Lawrence seaway by alien tramp steamers. Foreign tramp ships manned by cheaply paid foreign crews would have predominant use of the seaway; and

Whereas no route for more profitable trade between American lake and coastal ports would be offered by the seaway because of the extra mileage involved. The distance from New York to Chicago via the seaway would be 2,900 miles; and

Whereas according to the pending agreement, the United States would defray most of the cost of the international rapids section of the project. The United States would virtually subsidize Canadian power to the extent of $55,000,000. Canada would have to pay only some $38,000,000 for power development, while New York State would have to pay over $93,000,000 for the same amount of power; and

Whereas the St. Lawrence project, based on the experience of similar public works, would undoubtedly cost much more than the estimated $1,145,000,000: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we are unalterably opposed to the construction of the St. Lawrance seaway; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the members of the Overton Committee, a sub-committee of the Senate Commerce Committee which now has the bill under study for report, and to Governor Dewey of New York, to Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER of New York, and to all the representatives of the Congress from the Niagara frontier.

Junior Commandos of Bridgeton, N. J.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER H. WENE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. WENE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a radio address of Mr. Jerry Alden, leader of the Stanley-WSNJ Junior Commandos of Bridgeton, N. J., who were recently selected to receive honorable mention in the George Foster Peabody Radio Award:

Ladies and gentlemen, you have learned earlier this week that the Stanley-WSNJ Junior Commandos were selected to receive honorable mention in the George Foster Peabody Radio Award. It is our pleasure, therefore, to bring to you this morning a special program, celebrating this honor. The George Foster Peabody radio award is the same thing in the radio industry that the well-known "Oscars" are in the world of motion pictures. A small group of awards is given each year to the best in the whole United States of America of certain types of radio programs. Bob Hope received top award in his classification; the Stanley-WSNJ Junior Commandos received second top award, or honorable mention, in theirs, which is outstanding service to a local community. And there are only nine possible classifications in all.

It seems difficult, looking back over the less than 2 years this fine organization has been in existence, to realize that the first little meeting of the Commandos in September of 1942, when there were but seven present, could have grown in this short time to the stature and renown it has achieved. But it is not difficult for those of us who have watched their activities and have seen them build, who have been with them at their meetings, in their campaigns, and who have participated with them in their fun. No individual member of the Junior Commandos, I am sure, would claim that he was exceptional, though some of them are. What the Junior Commandos have demonstrated, beyond all possible doubt, is the ability of children at all ages to participate, enthusiastically and effectively, in the doing of useful and valuable things, in a responsible and grown-up way.

The Junior Commandos now number 350 members, which by itself is not so important. But listen to this. In their less than 2 years, the Junior Commandos have collected 9½ tons of tin cans and 30 tons of general scrap. They assisted in the Red Cross drives for the past several years; in the first time, winding up last year's drive with the collection of $497 in a single day; this year handling the distribution of rotogravures advertising the appeal. It was the Junior Commandos who made the house-to-house survey enabling Bridgeton to launch its campaign last year for a child-care center. Of other efforts, the Commandos have taken part in too many to mention. And as to War bonds, which they were organized originally to sell, their total now runs some $300,000. It was the Junior Commandos who received, on March 8, a citation from the American Legion for this activity. And Maj. Jane McGuire, of the Commandos, received the Legion medal for the largest sale of bonds of any girl in Bridgeton. In addition to this, the Junior Commandos has received an important write-up in the magazine of the radio industry—broadcasting. And now comes this new achievement in the George Foster Peabody radio award.

They have earned the admiration of a community that has every reason to feel very proud and very grateful toward them. And I, Jerry Alden, would like at this time to offer some much-deserved thanks to Mrs. Lillian Viole and Mr. Stewart Brenneman, whose untiring work with the Commandos has done much to help put them where they are. Nothing I can say can add anything to this fine honor. But, I do wish to express appreciation for the many fine messages received from friends of the Commandoes throughout the whole country.

This Is Our Kansas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an editorial written by Miss Marjorie Burtscher, a student at Hays High School, Hays, Kans. This editorial won first place in a contest sponsored by the school of journalism at the University of Kansas. It is entitled "This Is Our Kansas," and reads as follows:

THIS IS OUR KANSAS

Since the war they have come—the welders from California; the soldiers and their families from New York, Pennsylvania, from Texas; the war workers from States all over this vast continent. They come to Kansas on business, to see their loved ones, or because Washington demands their presence here. Some of them call our people corn-fed; others say our State is barren and flat. "Where else," they ask, "do they have snow storms one day, dust another, and sunshine the next?" "The people here are so ignorant they don't know a washing machine from a typewriter," they comment. "Where else do you find that but in Kansas?"

"What's the matter with Kansas?" we ask.

"What's good about it?" they reply.

What's good about Kansas? Let them ask any Kansan, for we are proud of our State. Flat and barren? No, for where else but in Kansas do we see the torch of God when the sun rises in the early morning until it sinks again at night? The leaves on every bush, every shrub, yes every weed, if you will have it that way, reflect the glory, the clean shining glory of God. We Kansans corn-fed? The people are good in Kansas! God has taught us to be patient and thankful for the gifts He gives us. We have waited months at a time for a few drops of rain, for our crops to grow, for the dust to stop blowing.

We have great men who love us, too. Men from Dr. Hertzler, our "country doctor," to General Dwight Eisenhower, supreme commander of Allied forces.

We have our great heroes now dead, sung and unsung, Pvt. John Jones who gave his life at Bataan, Cpl. Tom Smith, who died on Guadalcanal.

We Kansans possess a fierce pride in our State, and to our eyes, dusty, dirty, and rain-starved though it may be, this is our Kansas.—M. B.

Address of Julius H. Barnes on St. Lawrence Seaway Power Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, one of the most significant developments in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway power project took place at the annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York May 4, 1944. This group has traditionally opposed this project. Mr. Julius H. Barnes, of Duluth, Minn., offered a motion, and after listening to his talk, 40 percent of the members present voted in favor of his motion, which was to defer adverse action on the St. Lawrence seaway power project until a lot of inaccuracies could be corrected. Most people are asked to vote on resolutions on which they have no information or about which they are furnished with considerable misinformation. I talked with a Member of Congress today who frankly admitted that he did not know anything at all about the St. Lawrence seaway power project. In 1941 I talked to a prominent State official from one of the Southern States who made the same comment, and said that what applied to him was applicable to practically everybody in his State.

Mr. Barnes' short talk before the New York Chamber of Commerce is as follows:

Mr. President and fellow members, I have a good deal of sentiment about your organization and about this hall. In certain national positions which I held for some years this chamber was courteous enough to extend this hall for several national conferences over which I presided, both as President of Herbert Hoover's Food Administration Grain Corporation and later as President Wilson's wheat director; later also as three times president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States; and later still, three times chairman of that body.

Only my sense of loyalty to my home town, Duluth, Minn., depending on this waterway, and to the 40,000,000 people in the Middle West, whom, I believe, constitute a large enough group to discredit the committee references to the benefits of this project as being "confined to a small group of our people," would lead me to take issue with the report of a committee of this body.

In all the conferences I have held here in this hall, men coming from all over this country have been impressed with the atmosphere of this room. They are reminded of its long history. The portraits, themselves, picture the men who have built this great port, but so also there are other parts of America, in process of growth, that have a right to appeal to you for fair play.

In this report there are six pages of reasons given against the waterway. I scan it in vain for one single reason in its favor. The national chamber, in putting out its referendums, always submits to its members the arguments for and the arguments against, carrying thus the presumption that a conviction expressed on such a showing has heard both sides. No such conviction follows this report as proposed today.

I have a simple action I want to suggest to you, and to illustrate why I do that, I point out to you two or three phases in which this report makes statements which, if you act on it without discussion, would prejudice you in the eyes of the great Middle West.

This statement is made, for example, on page 9, that this channel will not permit Liberty and Victory ships drawing 29 feet to use the 27-foot channel, making this "practically worthless except for shallow draft lake boats." Now, I have built ships in Duluth during two wars. My company built, at Duluth, last year the largest ocean-going ships ever built on the Great Lakes—seven of them for the Standard Oil of New Jersey. Being 360 feet in length, they cannot attain access to the sea through the outmoded 260-foot locks of the St. Lawrence which are 50 years old. They reached the ocean through the improved Chicago River and the Mississippi. But on that 9-foot channel, ocean ships thus built on the Great Lakes can only travel light and without cargo in or out. I say, as a ship operator for 20 years, operating a special type ship across the Great Lakes, down the Erie Canal and along our coast, that the statement is not correct; that a 29-foot ship by entirely customary lightening of fuel and its stores on the western end, completing them on arrival at the 30-foot channel at Montreal, can load its full pay cargo on a 27-foot channel.

The proof of that, beyond my single statement, rests on the fact that Admiral Land, who is not only Chairman of the Maritime Commission building these ships, but War Shipping Administrator operating them, in 1941, in writing, expresses the conclusion that the Maritime Commission, "after full consideration of all the factors, approved the project of improving the St. Lawrence seaway in this plan."

The next statement that I would criticize as not fair is on page 9 also. "Shipments through the St. Lawrence do not provide any saving in distance to most foreign ports." I assert, subject to the verification, which you can all make, that from Duluth at the head of the Lakes by water through the St. Lawrence, the distance is 500 miles shorter to Liverpool than through New York; and to Copenhagen, 1,000 miles shorter. Copenhagen typifies all the ports of Northern Germany, Poland, the three Russian Baltic States—Finland, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark.

The statement is then made that "to the Mediterranean and most other foreign ports, the distance is much shorter through the New York Barge Canal."

On the contrary, there is not a port in the Mediterranean nor in all of northern Europe to which the water mileage is not shorter via the St. Lawrence than through the port of New York and the Erie Canal, on which I am a long-time operator and have a right to speak.

On pages 9 and 10 the committee quotes Moulton's report of 1929 analyzing a project at that time which had not yet taken form until the Treaty of 1932 and the agreement of 1941.

Moulton's analysis, with its high-cost estimates, applies to an entirely different project contemplating the development, partly in exclusive Canadian territory, of 6,000,000 horsepower for electric generation, whereas his present project contemplates 2,200,000. Of course, the costs are different, and what he then said in 1929 has no validity as applied to the Treaty of 1932, or the agreement of 1941.

I ask you, in view of these statements which discredit the report as partly inaccurate and inapplicable, whether it is right for you to take action today on that kind of a report. I beg of you not to do it, and I want to suggest instead an amendment to the resolution.

Gentlemen, you must realize there are some factors in favor of this project: Six successive Presidents of the United States, of both parties; the last four Governors of the State of New York; the New York Legislature, this March; Senator WAGNER, changing his position from former opposition to now being in favor; the Governors of seven of the Midwestern States appearing, in 1941, personally, and in writing, to testify their need for it. Don't act in opposition to this project with-

Mr. President, may I offer this amendment to the motion to adopt the report in opposition to the project?

"That the chamber defer action at this meeting and requests the interested committee to review their report eliminating any statements which on the committee's further consideration seem to them inaccurate or inapplicable, and that the president of the chamber be requested to secure a statement of factors favorable to the project, and that the members be provided at an appropriate future meeting with a statement of both sides, thus reviewed, before expressing their conviction on the merits of St. Lawrence seaway project.

The N. W. L. B. Stands Firm

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, on May 8 I called the attention of the House to a very disturbing labor situation that existed in the San Francisco Bay area on that date. E. F. Dillon and Harry Hook, business agents of Lodge 68 of the I. A. M., had defied the National War Labor Board and were continuing their refusal to obey the N. W. L. B. directive ordering them to rescind their actions which prohibited work in excess of 8 hours per day and 48 hours per week.

On Wednesday, May 10, these two gentlemen were called before the National War Labor Board and asked to show cause why they should not obey the Board's directive. As a result of the public hearing the following telegram has been sent to Hook and Dillon and to Harvey Brown, president of the I. A. M.:

MAY 10, 1944.

The National War Labor Board acting pursuant to its powers and duties under the War Labor Disputes Act and Executive orders of the President and after a show cause public hearing, hereby reaffirms its order of May 2, 1944, which directed, "(1) that the union rescind its actions prohibiting work in excess of 8 hours per day and 48 hours per week; (2) that all parties comply in all other respects with the order of the regional War Labor Board." To effectuate this order we call on the local union officials to call an immediate meeting of the union and to use their best efforts to obtain a rescission of the union order which prohibits its members from working overtime. We further call upon the international officials of the union to assert their leadership in bringing about this result which is so necessary to a maintenance of the no-strike agreement with its provision that all disputes which cannot be settled by collective bargaining or conciliation shall be finally decided by the War Labor Board. We wish to make it clear that the Board's order, when complied with by the union, will not require any employee to work overtime against his wishes. The purpose of the Board's order is to remove the restraint which the union has placed upon the individual's freedom of choice, and thereby to restore the status quo until the merits of the dispute can be settled in an orderly way. This is in accordance with the standard practice of the Board. It involves no prejudice to the rights of the union or its members. The Board regards it as unthinkable that in this situation the union would place itself in defiance of the Government at this critical period of the war.

NATIONAL WAR LABOR BOARD,
WILLIAM H. DAVIS, Chairman.

Americanism in Action

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, recently in Jersey City there occurred the annual exercises held in connection with Americanization Day. For many successive years these exercises have been conducted under the supervision of Clinton E. Fisk Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of Jersey City. More than 10,000 persons were gathered in Pershing Field, the terminus of the parade course, to watch 15,000 veterans of World War No. 1 and the Spanish-American War, with their ladies' auxiliaries and other organizations, pass the reviewing stand. Prior to the arrival of the parade these persons were addressed by Mr. Alexander Luken, of Clinton E. Fisk Post, V. F. W., who has been most active through the years in perfecting plans for this great day; by Hon. Frank Hague, mayor of Jersey City; Mr. Carl J. Schoeninger, commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and myself. On the reviewing stand, in addition to those named, were Mr. Henry G. Roberts, State commander, Spanish War Veterans; Mr. Chris O'Dell, commander of the department of New Jersey, Veterans of Foreign Wars; members of the city commission; Mr. William J. Dodd, past national commander of the Disabled Veterans of America; many officials of veterans' organizations and their ladies' auxiliaries; and Mr. Jean Brunner, senior vice commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, who acted as marshal of the parade.

The highlight of the occasion was the able address, eloquently delivered by Commander in Chief Schoeninger, which it is my pleasure to include at this point:

This special observance of Americanization Day in Jersey City has become a magnificent traditional ceremony, and I am highly honored with the opportunity to help perpetuate and promote its significance.

In these critical days, when nearly every home in the land can display a service-star flag, patriotic emotions naturally run high. The average citizen who has a loved one in the service finds that his heart is suddenly deeply stirred by the sound of a marching band or the sight of the American flag on parade. War has definitely brought home to most of us a deeper appreciation of the meaning of Americanism and the importance of real patriotism.

It is good to know that the citizens of this area have always made it a point to celebrate Americanization Day with the same splendid enthusiasm we are witnessing today. It is also good to know that the members of our organization were annually conducting similar patriotic programs—even when the Nation was at peace and when the principles of Americanism did not appear to be in danger of immediate destruction by our enemies. In other words, it is gratifying to realize that those who have fostered this annual program did not need the impact of war to let the world know of their devotion to the ideals of Americanism.

In my opinion, the net results of our Americanism education are plainly evident in the character of our youth of today. Ever since we were organized as a veteran association we have made the promotion of Americanism one of our major objectives. There were those who laughed and scoffed when they accused us of waving the flag in times of peace. These cynics thought it was smart and sophisticated to ridicule veteran organizations such as ours, because were were constantly demanding respect for the American flag and the ideals for which it stands. There were those who stood on the side lines and smiled in friendly tolerance as we passed by on parade, because they were so sure, in their own minds, that there was little need for any organization to devote so much of its time and energy to Americanism education. They chided us with the insinuation that we did not want to forget that the last war was over, and that we were hypnotized by the desire to exhibit ourselves as alleged heroes.

I am happy to say that those who were loudly giving us the Bronx cheer, during those peacetime years, have been awakened to the real significance of our Americanism activities. They know today that millions of young Americans, who have taken part in our Americanism programs, are proving themselves to be real Americans because of the lessons they learned under our guidance.

I must even admit that we ourselves did not realize how thoroughly young America was absorbing the truths that we were constantly trying to emphasize in our Americanism program. The high degree of their understanding of the privileges of Americanism is clearly reflected today in their splendid services to the Nation as members of our armed forces.

We are all familiar with the fact that this is a "young man's war." War Department authorities insist that the average age of our men in the armed forces, who must do the real fighting, must not be permitted to rise above the age of 26. Have you ever stopped to think what this means? It means that those who are doing the actual fighting and dying in this war were born in the year of 1918 or since. Those who are only 26 this year were born while we A. E. F. veterans, of the last war, were still in France. We had barely suppressed Germany's efforts, during 1914–18, to conquer the world while the mothers were bearing children who were destined to endure the sacrifices of the present conflict. Countless thousands of those in uniform today are the sons of men who faced death at Verdun, in the Argonne Forest, and on the Marne back in 1917–18. The eagerness of those who composed the A. E. F., to defend the Stars and Stripes on the fields of Flanders, was stirred to new heights when they were told that they were fighting a war to end all wars. Inspired by this hope they were content to accept the hardships and sufferings of trench warfare against an enemy who was determined and ruthless.

But all that belongs to the pages of history. Today we must live in the present, and we must be conscious of the menace of an enemy who seeks vengeance for the defeat he suffered in 1918—plus the achievement of a cunning plan to control the world, by force of arms, no matter how long, or how cruel, his ambitious struggle might become.

Among those who have witnessed this great Americanization rally today, there are likely some who ask these questions—at least to themselves. Why are such demonstrations necessary in times like these? Why are patriotic ceremonies needed in times when every man, woman, and child is conscious of the fact that we are engaged in a great war?

To these skeptics—let me say this. There is still much need for education in Americanism among our people—and especially among those whose understanding of Americanism truths is no more than half baked. I speak of individual citizens who are inclined to believe that self-loyalty comes first. You know them as well as I. They are the ones who want the Government to regulate your business—but not theirs. They are the ones who buy, beg, borrow, or steal all the gasoline coupons they can get—but would promptly report you to the authorities if they did not think you were entitled to more than an "A" ration card. They are the people who patronize the black market in secret and then publicly damn the bureaucrats because they are unable to make black-market operations unprofitable.

When I speak of persons who lack the understanding of the real true meaning of Americanism—I speak of those men and women, among our own neighbors and friends, who seem to believe they have a special individual right to ignore certain fundamental Americanism principles which all other persons should recognize. They want the other fellow to observe the traffic laws—but they scream to high heaven if they are stopped by a traffic cop themselves. They want the other fellow to shut off his radio at a reasonable hour, but they resent complaints about their own all-night brawls which disturb the peace and keep the neighbors awake.

And then, there is the citizen who vigorously demands the opportunity to exercise his right of free speech. He is very jealous of that right, and he is ready to roll up his sleeves for a fight if he thinks you want to shut him up. But that same chap is also ready to throw you into jail, or to have you tarred and feathered, if you express an idea or an opinion with which he disagrees. If he can't think of an intelligent answer to your arguments—he promptly calls you a Communist, a reactionary, a Tory, Republican, or a new dealer—and with these smear labels he denies to you the same right of free speech which he demands for himself.

In my opinion we shall never be able to teach too much Americanism to a lot of people who profane the name of our Saviour by calling themselves Christians, but who conduct themselves in the manner of infidels. They are the persons who are constantly saying the things that encourage persecution, hate, and intolerance. They are guilty of the crimes which Christianity vigorously condemns—yet the principles of Christianity are undeniably the same principles which inspired the Bill of Rights of the American people.

I have observed that most of those who profess to be Christians, but look with scorn upon their fellow men who do not happen to be identified with the same denomination—are persons who have never even seen the inside of a church. If such persons were truly religious, or truly loyal to any particular church, they would know that religion, like the Bill of Rights, preaches kindness and tolerance, and the right of the individual to worship his God in his own way.

Yes, we need Americanism education in time of war, especially for those hypocrites who are either too stubborn, or too stupid, to realize that 7,000,000 persons are in uniform today because we do not believe the people of Japan or Germany are superior to ourselves; because we do not accept the theory that we Americans—or any other people—are inferior mentally and morally to the Japs and the Nazis themselves.

One of the main reasons why we are fighting this war is our unwillingness to be the slaves of any other people on earth. Yet we have people in America, people who pride themselves on their understanding of Americanism, but simultaneously insist that certain groups of our own people belong to an inferior race—and should be treated accordingly.

I am confident—when the victory is won—that history will testify that America, as a Nation, fought its way to victory in World War No. 2 because we were inspired by an unconquerable desire to perpetuate the principles of Americanism. As a people we feel confident that future historians will make due note of our steadfast allegiance to the fundamental ideals of human liberty for which our own sons are giving their lives.

Whether or not we as individual citizens are doing what we should to earn the respect of our soldier dead proposes a question which each of us must answer for ourselves. In our own hearts we know how far we have permitted our patriotism to govern our personal comforts or our selfish desires. In our own hearts we know how well each of us is practicing the principles of Americanism for which millions are risking their lives to preserve.

Each man must be his own judge and jury. If the verdict finds him guilty of disloyalty to the principles of Americanism—then his punishment is inescapable. He may succeed in fooling others. But he is doomed to eternal damnation within himself when he remembers those who have given so much to preserve our Americanism when he was willing to give so little.

Salute to American Mothers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Maurice Milstone entitled "Salute to American Mothers" from the Washington Post, May 12, 1944:

SALUTE TO AMERICAN MOTHERS WHOSE SONS AND DAUGHTERS SERVE AMERICA IN THE ARMED FORCES, THE GOVERNMENT SERVICES, THE FACTORY, AND THE FARM

Make Sunday, May 14, a day your mother will long remember!

It takes all kinds of people to win a war. It takes soldiers and sailors, politicians and businessmen, farmers and laborers, wives and sweethearts, and mothers. Mothers because they are a part of the force behind the fighting force, because they wait for the peace that will send their sons home to them, and because while they wait, they work. In some ways their work is as important as that of their sons and daughters in service. Theirs is the important job of morale, of keeping intact the American home. For today, as in other wars, the home remains the port of happiness and safety to which men turn first when the war is won.

Because they are the unsung heroines of this war, let's make Mother's Day, May 14, one they will long remember. Because of the look of hope in her eye, because of her smiling courage, your mother this year, is truly the "lady of the hour." Let her know how proud you are of the job she is doing. Remember to tell her that you, like all Americans everywhere, deeply appreciate the letters of hope she sends, the hours of labor she spends in Red Cross work, the faith she has in you and all the others who are all-out to win the war. Tell her so with a gift, a visit, a letter, a phone call. If you want to give her something special inscribed "To Mother—with love."

War bonds sold in honor of Mother's Day will bring her loved ones home sooner.

MAURICE MILSTONE.

Women War Workers and Women's Bureau Appropriation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, the war program with its abnormal increase in women workers has made tremendous demands on the Women's Bureau and far overtaxed its resources.

Today there are over 17,000,000 women in employment—6,000,000 more than in the spring of 1940. By 1944 there will be 18,000,000 or more employed women. They are being drawn into many new fields regarded as men's work in the past. I want to salute these women who have left homes and peacetime jobs to take over tasks far more strenuous than American women have ever been called upon to do. The women whose shoulders ache each night from riveting airplanes, the women whose faces show the effect of arc welding on the shipways in rain and zero weather, the girls who have garnered our market vegetables this summer; all are serving their country as patriotically as are our boys and men. The work that women do today in industry and on the farm is hard work. Many do such work and at the same time cope with all the problems of feeding and maintaining a household.

If these women are to carry on until we have won the war, as they must do to maintain production, consideration must be given to women's physique and home demands by all employers of women.

The Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor is the one Federal agency created by Congress to promote the welfare of women workers. With the foresight that women would be called into war industries and the belief that maximum service to the Nation calls for women's assignment on the basis of physical fitness and aptitudes, this Bureau began, in 1941, without additional funds from the Congress to develop guidance material for the airplane and ammunition industries in order that management could know where women could be employed effectively. The Bureau has furnished and is furnishing scientific data as to the occupations, the reengineering of jobs to suit women's physical limitations, and conditions under which women should be employed, to thousands of employers and other Government agencies. It pioneered in getting over to management the idea that well-trained women counselors were necessary to familiarize homemakers with factory work and working conditions so that much of the strain of adjustment from home to factory could be averted.

In my own State of Washington, the Puget Sound Navy Yard asked the Women's Bureau to make a complete investigation of women's utilization with recommendations that could be used in revising yard policies. In several private shipyards they have advised on additional jobs women may do, on intake procedure, indoctrination courses, personnel follow-up, supervisors' training, as well as on eating and other necessary facilities. In other plants they have addressed the women workers at management's request in order that they might get a better understanding of the importance of the part they were taking in the war effort.

The West Coast Lumber Commission called on the Women's Bureau to make a special survey of several Spokane plant operations concerning the comparability of work performed by women compared to that done by men so that questions of wage differentials might be settled equitably. In fact, the women and men workers of the country are indebted to the Women's Bureau for insisting that the only equitable system of wage payment was based on the job, not on the sex or the race of the worker doing the job.

The Legislature of the State of Washington responded to the demand from our workers and public-minded citizens and enacted into law the principle that women shall receive the same pay as men when similarly employed or when employed on work formerly performed by men. This just legislation prevents anyone from employing women to undercut men's wage scales in peacetime, as well as in wartime. Never again can women be exploited at the expense of men in my State. The sponsoring committee for this legislation writes that the Women's Bureau "has set the record for timely cooperation in this effort."

It is because the Women's Bureau is helpful on all matters having a bearing on the effective utilization of womanpower that it is regarded as so helpful by industry. It gets an over-all view of the problems of a plant and swings into action at whatever point action is necessary.

But the Women's Bureau staff must be augmented if it is to meet practical problems with practical solutions. New problems arise continuously through the employment of this new group of women workers by persons who have never before employed women, on jobs women have never done before this year. There must be sufficient fact finding on these problems to focus attention on the lines of action necessary to cope with new and specific problems. The Bureau is very modest in its request.

The country is dependent on womanpower to turn out its airplanes, its ships, its ammunition, its food. It is dependent on the Women's Bureau for policies that will maintain a stable, healthy staff of women workers able to carry on sustained high-quality production over an extended period of time under war conditions.

Polish Boundary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARLE D. WILLEY

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a copy of resolutions adopted at a meeting held in Wilmington, Del., on May 7, 1944, and sponsored by the Council of Polish Societies and Clubs in the State of Delaware, as follows:

We, Americans of Polish descent, assembled at the Modjeska Hall, at Wilmington, Del., on Sunday afternoon, May 7, 1944, to commemorate the adoption of the Polish Constitution on May 3, 1791, one of the world's great documents of freedom, like our Declaration of Independence, and to pay homage to creators of liberty and equality for the Polish Nation 150 years ago.

Further we, as Americans of Polish descent, upholding the American principles created at the birth of the United States, having our sons all over the world fighting the enemies of freedom, we at home making sacrifices in money and work, giving our Government full support, not only to uphold our American principles of freedom and independence for ourselves but also for all other nations, regardless of size, against all intentions and aims of enemies of freedom, liberty, and independence.

Whereas the progress of international affairs points strongly to the ruination of the Atlantic Charter, most precious to the United Nations in their fight against totalitarianism.

Whereas Poland, the first and most sacrificing ally in this fight with Hitler, is confronted today with the fear of aggression by the Soviet Russia totalitarianism.

Whereas the realization of the aggressive plans in Poland by Soviet Russia would not only constitute a dangerous situation toward the security of our United States of America but it would make the post-war peace conference a mockery for any future lasting peace or stoppage of future wars.

Whereas any pressure from United States or Great Britain upon the only legal and rightful government of Poland in London, to consent to a fifth partition of Poland by Soviet Russia would not only be a betrayal of the Polish Nation, its first ally to fight the might of Germany for freedom, liberty, and independence, but it would also be a betrayal of the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms" which would be an admittance of the weakness of our aims, for which this war is being fought. It would bring about distrust and condemnation from all people loving freedom, liberty, and independence.

We, patriotic Americans of Polish descent, appeal to you, Mr. President.

In consideration of the high ideals of the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms," for which our sons and brothers are fighting and giving their lifes on all battlefronts.

In consideration of the security of our beloved United States of America and in consideration of the future of Poland with its rightful and legal government in London, the most loyal and sacrificing ally of the United States.

To use all your great authority and influence to successfully defend the most sacred ideal of justice, liberty, and freedom toward Poland whose ultimate fate will prove to be glorious victory or a complete defeat of those ideals guaranteed by our American principles.

Furthermore, we here assembled, declare that all attempts aimed at endorsing the criminal action of the predatory powers of more than a century ago in again partitioning Poland and renewing the slavery of the Polish Nation will endanger victory and be ignoble, dishonorable, and contrary to right and justice.

A Liberal Interpretation of Greek Dissension

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, there has been much discussion throughout the United States relating to internal Greek affairs and referring to recent changes within the exiled Greek Government and certain brief uprisings affecting some of the Greek armed forces.

Unfortunately, the American people have not been given the undiluted truth concerning the status of Greek protagonists of true independence.

It is time that the American people were fully informed concerning this fascinating topic. There is, in the city of Washington, D. C., a very talented and charming young lady, who is intimately familiar with every phase of Greek struggles and independence, historically and diplomatically. She has recently written a letter to that great daily newspaper, the Washington Evening Star, in which she discusses in eloquent fashion the whole story of Greece in this war. In this letter, she has incorporated such essential background material as to complete the picture.

I consider the article to be well worthy of study for those who would understand and appreciate all phases of the Greek struggle for democracy in the modern era.

The author, Madeline Karr, is profound and thorough. I commend the reading of this splendid and beautifully written short treatise to all who are sympathetic with our Greek friends.

Greece, historically, is the fountainhead of democracy. From that beautiful peninsula originated the democratic idea. Succinctly, Madeline Karr has given us the unvarnished and unveneered story.

Here is her letter, as printed in the Washington Evening Star of May 5, 1944:

A LIBERAL INTERPRETATION OF GREEK DISSENSION

To the EDITOR OF THE STAR:

Last week you carried an editorial commenting on the current status of internal Greek affairs and particularly on recent changes within the exiled Greek Government and the prevailing difficulties within the Greek armed forces.

While it is true, as you state, that "Greek dissension is deep-seated," this dissension has a very sound basis which cannot be explained by those vague terms which you used, "intense factionalism and localism."

Trouble began in Greece when the Greek people created a new form of government and named it "demokratia." This "demokratia" is the basis of all Greek dissension. Not content with having the idea in abstract, the Greek people wanted to live under that form of government.

But as a great American once said, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." In 1821 the Greek people began to fight for independence from the Turks. Similar movements developed all over Europe and in South America. It took the Greek people 10 years to gain their freedom—10 years of terrorism, starvation, and fighting. The final achievement of freedom was made possible by aid from the British and the Americans, for which the Greek people still are grateful.

After freeing themselves from Turkish suzerainty, the Greeks found that they still had not gotten democracy or individual freedom. There was an enemy within the country ready to grab the autocratic powers of the Turks.

Greece's key geographic position, as you pointed out, made her the prey of many countries which united with elements within the country to gain control against the wishes of the people. Foreign rulers (the present royal family comes from Saxe-Coburg) were foisted on the Greek people by foreign intervention. So the Greek people had to continue to fight for "demokratia."

Today the Greek people still are fighting for freedom and democracy. They are fighting the Germans and Bulgarians who invaded and desecrated their country. Again, in spite of starvation, terrorism, and exploitation, they continue to struggle for their freedom. They have fought for 4 years, and they continue with little equipment against overwhelming odds.

What you refer to as "mutiny" in the Greek Army and Navy in Egypt is just a continuation of that same struggle. Last August, representatives of underground groups fighting in Greece escaped to Cairo to ask King George to agree to stay out of Greece until a plebiscite could be held among the liberated Greek people to determine what form of government they desired. The delegation was composed of three former members of the Greek Parliament (two Liberals and one Royalist), one Independent Democrat, one Conservative, and one Communist. Contrary to your editorial, the Communists are not playing a major roll in Greek politics, as indicated by the make-up of this delegation. Remember, too, that before this war, the people of Greece had been fighting the domestic Fascist dictatorship of Metaxas, over which King George II reigned.

The delegation also asked that the underground resistance groups be given representation in the Greek Government-in-exile. For their efforts, the delegation was put under house arrest by the British and held incommunicado until they were returned to Greece. They received no answer from the King, although the cabinet agreed to their demands.

Through the winter the demands of the EAM and EDES, whose guerrilla forces were risking their lives for Greece, continued to demand representation. Early in April high ranking Greek officers visited Premier Tsouderos and urged him to accept into the government representatives of the EAM, largest and oldest Greek underground movement, whose army is known as the Greek Liberation Army. This demand was considered "undisciplinary" by the Premier and he ordered that the officers be placed under arrest. When the escort joined the officers and freed them, Tsouderos had to resign.

The officers and men of three ships, the destroyer Ierax, corvettes Apostolis and Sachtouris, of the Royal Greek Navy, and soldiers from the crack Greek 1st Army refused to move until adequate representation was given their brothers-in-arms in Greece. This was the revolt that Vice Admiral Petros Voulgaris finally put down, with the moral support of the British Navy surrounding the Greek ships.

The future of liberated Greece is not an enigma. The people in Greece and the Greek soldiers and sailors outside of Greece have become familiar with that concept "demokratia" through the long years of struggle. After the war with Germany and its Fascist satellites is won the Greeks either will get democracy or keep on fighting until they do. They will not compromise, even if reaction bears a Greek name.

MADELINE KARR.

Poll-Tax Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, Thomas Jefferson warned his fellow countrymen that "a single consolidated government would become the most corrupt government on earth," and he again said that the road on which the United States would "pass on to destruction" would be "by a consolidation first, and then corruption, its necessary consequence."

A survey of history prompted Jefferson to again warn the people against centralization of power in these words:

What has destroyed the liberty and the rights of man in every government which has ever existed under the sun? The generalizing and concentrating all cares and powers into one body.

And again:

When all government, domestic and foreign, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington as the center of all power, it will render powerless the checks provided of one government on another.

The Poll Tax Issue, which appears in the Washington Post of May 12, 1944, is timely and should be widely read and digested:

POLL TAX ISSUE

(By Mark Sullivan)

FEDERAL POWERS

The proposal to abolish the poll tax as a requirement for voting in the eight States in which it still exists—and to do this by action of the Federal Government at Washington—fits into a tendency and process that has been under way for several years. It is a process of change in the whole pattern of American government and society—a change so far-reaching that if accomplished it would be, in the words of Dorothy Thompson describing it when it was getting under way some years ago, "profoundly revolutionary."

The attempted change follows four principal lines:

Enlargement of the power of the Federal Government at Washington, and of the Executive, at the expense of the rights of individuals—increased power of the Federal Government to regulate the individual and put compulsion upon him.

Enlargement of the power of the Executive at the expense of Congress.

Enlargement of the authority of the Executive at the expense of judicial discretion on the part of the courts—an enlargement suggested by Attorney General Biddle when, in asking a court to sustain the President's seizure of Montgomery Ward, he said, "Particularly in time of war the court should not substitute its judgment for that of the Executive." (This elevation of the Executive was, of course, inherent also in President Roosevelt's unsuccessful attempt to change the Supreme Court in 1937.)

Immense enlargement of the power of the Federal Government at Washington, at the expense of the States and other local subdivisions of government.

Of all the attempted steps composing this tendency and process, possibly the most deep reaching is the proposal that a qualification for voting, practiced in a small number of States, shall be abolished by an act of the Federal Government. It is deep reaching because it would undermine the very existence of the States as units of government. Of all the functions exercised by any unit of government, that which has to do with voting is the most fundamental. Take that away and ultimately little would remain.

At present the whole function of voting is exercised by the States exclusively, none of it by the Federal Government. The present proposal is that some of this function shall be taken from the States and be exercised by the Federal Government. If, by passage of the pending measure, a part of this function is taken over by the Federal Government it will establish a principle and precedent by which other parts can be taken over. If the Federal Government can abolish the poll tax as a qualification for voting in 8 States, it can by the same principle abolish or change other voting requirements in all the 48 States—such familiar qualifications as those having to do with residence in the State and voting district, citizenship, literacy, and the like. A Senator from New York, for example, who votes to abolish the poll tax as a voting qualification in Georgia, by his action asserts that Congress has power to abolish or change the qualifications of residence or citizenship or literacy or any other in his own State.

The merit or demerit of the poll tax is not the real question. It has come to be commonly disapproved. Member after Member of Congress from States which still have the poll tax, but who oppose abolition of it by action of the Federal Government, have said, in effect, to quote words of Senator RUSSELL, of Georgia: "I do not favor the poll tax." Because of this sentiment, the poll tax is being gradually abolished by action of the States themselves. Formerly common, it was abolished by Massachusetts some 50 years ago. An equivalent, requiring that some kind of tax be paid as a qualification for voting, was abolished in Pennsylvania as recently as some 15 years ago. North Carolina abolished the poll tax 24 years ago. Two other Southern States, Louisiana and Florida, abolished it within recent years. In three of the eight States in which it still exists, movements to abolish it are now under way.

One point should be borne in mind. The poll tax does not discriminate between Negroes and whites—a Negro can pay it and vote, as a white man can pay it and vote. There are voting devices in some Southern States which discriminate between the races—but the poll tax is not one of them. The organizing of Negroes in support of the pending measure before the Senate must have a motive other than resistance to discrimination. In the Senate debate it was asserted that the drive for the measure comes in large part from sources other than Negro.

Address by Glenn H. Bell, District Manager of Bonneville Power Administration, Before the Second Annual Convention of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 12, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am very pleased to insert in the RECORD, the text of an address given by Glenn H. Bell, district manager of the Bonneville Power Administration, with offices in Spokane, before the second annual convention meeting of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, held recently in Chicago, Ill. Mr. Bell's address is a masterly and challenging discussion of the Bonneville power development and the objectives of public power works and agencies, city, State, and national. But let Mr. Bell and his address speak for itself. Here it is:

President Tate, members of the board, and delegates of N. R. E. A., it is a distinct pleasure for me to be here. I have had a little part to play in the public power and cooperative progress out in the Northwest. At one time I was manager of a cooperative and later worked a short time for R. E. A. itself in regard to loans and applications. Later I went to the Bonneville Administration. That part is one nice job and it is really something for public power in the Northwest. Just a few minutes ago I got word that Dr. Raver's father passed away here in Chicago. I was hoping he would be here, as he is our Administrator. He is the one that carries the torch for public power in the Northwest and it is just unfortunate that he couldn't come.

I will tell you just a little bit about what is going on out in the Northwest and a little bit about our problems. The Bonneville Administration as set up doesn't own any dams, just owns the transmission lines. The Bonneville Dam in the lower Columbia was just completed. There are 10 generators in that dam of 55,000 kilowatts apiece, making a total of about 550,000 kilowatts.

Farther up the river about 300 miles is Grand Coulee. Perhaps most of you have heard about that. That is one of the largest, if not the largest, dam in the world. I am not going to try to tell you how big it is, how much cement, or anything like that, but it is awful big. The generators in that dam are 108,000 kilowatts. When it is completed there will be 18 of them—9 in each powerhouse. Those powerhouses are on each side of the dam.

When the war struck us we didn't have two generators—two of the big ones. It was the only place in the Nation that they could immediately get power because it was the only place that they had the enormous dam, had the water, and could go ahead quickly.

It looked for a little time like we were going to be caught in a box for aluminum. Today a third of the Nation's aluminum is reduced in the Northwest by the plants and by the power on the Columbia River. I don't know what that is going to be after the war, but we do hope to continue with some of those plants.

Now, Bonneville has done its part and it is one of R. E. A.'s boosters in the Northwest. We furnish power to many of the R. E. A. borrowers in Washington and Oregon, and we hope to continue that as fast as we can get those transmission lines out.

There is a little difference in rates. Since I have been back here I heard all kinds of figures on wholesale rates. Some are a little foreign to me but our wholesale rate to the cooperatives in Washington and Oregon is in the neighborhood of about 5½ mills to 3 mills. Now that is only the beginning. Bonneville now has before the Federal Power Commission a new rate known as our EZ rating. It hasn't been approved yet but it will substantially reduce the wholesale rate to small cooperatives about 20 percent. So that will help.

When the entire development on the Columbia River is completed we will have, perhaps—the Army engineers think 40 percent of the potential power of the Nation that can be developed in the Northwest. There is still room for seven more dams, and that is not taking in the Clear River and the Snake River which is almost the same kind of river. If that development can go ahead perhaps these transmission lines can be extended eastward. If the water storage of Montana and Wyoming can be dammed and controlled, the rivers, I believe that these low rates will still be pushed eastward. I believe that it will be possible for Federal dams to be interconnected with Shasta and with Fort Peck and others to bring the same rate further east to more of our R. E. A. cooperatives. [Applause.]

The dam at Coulee isn't anywhere near completed. We have six of the 108,000-kilowatt generators now running. There are two 10,000-kilowatt generators that are used just to operate the plant alone. In addition to that, two 75,000-kilowatt generators that were brought from Shasta. They were already built so they were moved into Coulee. The only trouble with them, they are smaller and they rotate in opposite directions. That meant that they had to take and use three stalls to get two generators in. Now, after the war they will be removed and sent back to Shasta and the other 108,000 will go in. If it was just 108,000 kilowatts per generator that would be large, but during this emergency those machines have never stopped and they are carrying an overload now of about 20 percent. There is not a spare generator, not a spare part on any of the Federal dams to take care of any emergency, any break-down, or anything.

The power is sold. Ninety-seven percent of it is going into war industries. The total power now being generated by both Bonneville and Coulee is in the neighborhood of 1,300,000 kilowatts. Ninety-seven percent in war industries. We hope that we can keep that in industries.

We have in my particular district which is the northeastern part of Washington, some new developments. Spokane is now called the capital of the light-metal industry. We have there one of the Nation's largest sheet-metal rolling mills, a 6-pot-mill reduction plant for aluminum, and a magnesium plant. The magnesium plant has some 422 electrical furnaces. To get an idea of the load of the reduction plant alone, the city of Spokane has a population of approximately 150,000 people. The load in the city is roughly 70,000 kilowatts. The reduction plant load alone is 218,000 kilowatts. The magnesium runs about 50,000 and the rolling mill about 48,000. That is all going out of 1 Bonneville substation located just outside the city.

Much of the raw material for the magnesium plant—in fact, all of the material for the magnesium plant—comes out of the county just north of Spokane. The aluminum clay comes from Dutch Guiana and Mobile, Ala. Just recently Congress approved an appropriation for an aluminum clay plant. We have lots of clay deposits in Washington and Oregon and Idaho. This clay plant, if it proves successful, will give us the necessary clay in the future for the development of aluminum for plants located on the coast. We would be independent, after that, of South American clay, and I hope we continue to keep that going because we certainly were in a dark spot at the beginning of the war on aluminum clay.

Now, I am going to tell you just a little bit about some of our problems that we have. Even though we have the dams and we have the transmission lines we have public power and we have cooperatives. We have our problems, too, just like the cooperatives. The advertising that is being used now in the Northwest is just like that we saw here yesterday, only it is worse. I saw an advertisement on the train coming back here in a Great Falls, Mont., paper. I tried to get that paper, but I couldn't get it. The Puget Sound Power & Light Co., which is located in Seattle over on the coast, is advertising in papers throughout the West: "Rural electrification—postwar." They show beautiful farms, barns, silos, corrals, and a figure sitting on a fence with a roll of wire in his hand. At the bottom of the page is a section of land and it tells you to mark your location in that and send that into the company and you will get rural electrification immediately after the war. That is one of the ads that we have.

We also, in the State of Washington, have public-utility districts as well as cooperatives. Public-utility districts were formed before we had R. E. A., were voted in by the people with the right of eminant domain, the right to condemn, take over public or private companies' properties. One of the difficulties or one of the troubles that the people have had to get into business is the huge severance damages, the reason being that the company will have a plant in one location, transmission lines will run across several counties. That county, to condemn that property and get into business means they have to cut the utility line in two. They then take it to court and the company sets a valuation of so many million dollars. The district figures out so many millions and the court puts it in the middle, which is generally eight or ten million too much.

At the time that the districts were being formed, trying to get under way, R. E. A. came into the field and the people in the Northwest States immediately started the cooperatives in Washington. There are public-utility districts and cooperative in the same county, all one. Last month it was our pleasure in Spokane to listen to R. E. A.'s Deputy Administrator, Mr. Neal; Dr. Raver, our Administrator, when all of the power people of the State, the cooperatives and the public-utility districts were all called together. Today we have a united group of people in Washington to go out and win this fight for public power. It isn't going to be easy, for 2 years ago we had legislation passed in our State legislature allowing public-utility districts to combine and go together and buy these properties. But the public utilities were able to defeat that and refer it back to the people for a vote this fall. The companies are spending millions of dollars to defeat it. If it is defeated, we are set back many years.

Perhaps many of you have read a statement by Mr. Murphy. The Electric Bond & Share said it was time the Federal dams and Federal projects were put on the tax rolls to help pay off the war debt. Well, I don't know whether the people of the Northwest or the Nation are going to have that done or not. I rather doubt it. But that is the trend of what is going on.

We in the Northwest have a terrific fight. I noticed an ad, for instance, in Spokane before I left, where our local utility company raised the question, a great big ad, "How do you want your Grand Coulee power, by private business management or by political graft?" Then it went on to say that power being delivered to the industries in the area was over the company's line. The power companies haven't spent a nickel for the construction of transmission lines to war industries. The Bonneville Administration built transmission lines into the area far in advance of the market. And, it was for that reason only that they were able to put those defense plants in the Northwest; because there was power and because those lines were taken out far ahead of market.

The administration has believed that if the lines were developed and taken into the areas that the areas could be developed to load that line. That certainly has proved out in the case of the co-ops and in R. E. A. It is the same program.

At the beginning of the war the War Production Board requested the administration to interconnect with all of the utilities in the Northwest to furnish power. Before that was done our administration decided that if we had to furnish power to the private utility companies we certainly then should be in a position to transfer to the public agencies, the cooperatives. After much battling and fighting we were able to work out transfer arrangements with the utility companies to transfer power to all of the cooperatives in the area. We got that much out of the interconnection. In one case we have been able to transfer through two power companies to several cooperatives in the panhandle of Idaho.

Now, the power situation in the Northwest with all of our dams is still critical. The reason is the Rocky Mountains don't have enough snow this year. Along next fall power is going to be short in the Northwest and the utility companies are going to have to have power due to our interconnection. That is critical. The reason, perhaps, that some of our aluminum plants, some of our industries may have to be curtailed is because we have to furnish power to the private utility companies.

Since this interconnection has been made there has been an enormous amount of advertising. We call it the Northwest Power Pool. I don't know whether those ads are in the paper in this area or not but in the Northwest every paper you pick up there is a big ad in it, The Northwest Power Pool. The utilities show the new people what they think of the Northwest Power Pool. They are capitalizing on what the Federal Government has had to do in this emergency. All of the utilities from Salt Lake City west are interconnected. They are all controlled from Grand Coulee Dam. Now, in the Northwest Power Pool they would make you believe in their advertisements, they list all of the utility companies and the Federal Government's part down in the corner but they don't say what each one contributes. If you would take the Federal Government's dams out of the Northwest Power Pool it wouldn't even be a puddle. But, they are now capitalizing on it. That is why I was impressed yesterday with the different ads and comments that were made by your people. I have felt for a long time myself that the cooperatives, that there should be an arrangement made whereby they could advertise to their own people and those people who did not know them. Our problem and the Federal Government's is that we cannot advertise. You people, it seems to me, could. I believe that if it were possible that you could put local ads in your paper. You could sell your program to those people outside, those people who don't know what your program is. I believe you people could reach many, many homes. I know that you have your local paper that you send out but that doesn't reach the outside people. I hope that after this year, that after the election that we all come out of this fight against us and that the Federal program and that the R. E. A. program can go ahead and grow because there is a lot of room and you are doing a lot of good.

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. O'BRIEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday May 11, on the floor of this House, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] made the statement that one of my constituents, Frank E. Gannett, of New York, is head of an organization and is being assisted by a former Member of this House, Sam Pettengill of Indiana, to amend the Constitution in such a manner that it would prohibit Congress from levying taxes up to 25 percent of one's income. The distinguished gentleman from Texas also referred to Frank Gannett as a Fascist.

I have known Frank Gannett for 25 years and if there ever was a man who has a conscientious regard for the perpetuation of our great Republic, it is Frank Gannett. His honesty and integrity are above reproach. He is courageous and fearless and whether you agree with him or whether you do not, he cannot be in any way whatsoever termed as a Fascist, nor has he ever been in any way whatsoever associated with subversive activities.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is fundamentally, traditionally, politically, and of necessity a New Dealer, and he has proven and shown on numerous occasions beyond the shadow of a doubt that anyone in his estimation who does not agree with the New Deal is a Fascist or is subversive.

I am inserting in the RECORD today a denial by Frank E. Gannett concerning the charges of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]. I sincerely hope everyone will avail themselves of the opportunity to read Mr. Gannett's remarks.

PATMAN CHARGES FALSE, UNFOUNDED, GANNETT SAYS

Frank Gannett, who was mentioned yesterday by Representative PATMAN, Democrat, of Texas, on the floor of the House as one of the leaders in a lobby which was trying to put a limit on the power of Congress to levy taxes, today made the following statement:

"Congressman WRIGHT PATMAN, like Don Quixote, fights imaginary windmills to give himself the hero's role. His every statement yesterday on the floor of Congress was false and unfounded. He also shows gross ignorance of the subject he discussed.

"Personally, I have never spent a cent nor spoken to a Congressman on the proposed amendment. The Committee for Constitutional Government has used about one-fifth of its income to educate the country on sound tax policy, to bring about expansion of private enterprise in the difficult post-war period. Its support came in average amounts of $17.30 per contributor.

"Every one surely is interested in taxation, which has been increasing by leaps and bounds. In wartime we expect to pay high taxes, but for the protection of everyone, from the humblest worker to the millionaire, there must be a limit on what the Government can take out of the pockets of the American people. This also would protect us against much wasteful spending and further development of bureaucracy.

CHARGES RESOURCES DRAINED

"Even before the war, unlimited taxing power by Congress was draining the Nation's resources to Washington and destroying the independence of States and municipalities by making them dependent on Federal doles. That is why the legislatures in 16 States have passed resolutions demanding a peacetime limit of 25 percent that the Federal Government may take from the earnings, income, gift, and estates of citizens.

"To say that this proposed amendment would turn this country over to the rich is silly and absurd. The power to tax is the power to destroy. If there is to be no limit on taxation, then our system of free enterprise will be destroyed and some form of collectivism or socialism take its place. With that will come the loss of jobs to millions now employed in our industries.

"Twenty-five percent taxation of the earnings of our people should be more than adequate to provide for all the real needs of our Government. Certainly it would not, as Mr. PATMAN says, prevent taking care of our soldiers and our social-security obligations.

CITES WORLD WAR NO. 1

"As a matter of fact, a lower rate of taxation will provide more money for the Government than an unlimited high rate. After the First World War, reduction of Federal tax rates from 46 to 25 percent was followed by such expansion in all fields of industry and enterprise that the Treasury's income was actually considerably larger under the lower rate.

"In the opinion of many who have given the question careful study, nothing would do more to provide jobs for returning soldiers and oncoming youth and promote the prosperity of the country as a whole than this plan to limit Federal taxation.

"Taxation and other problems that must be solved if we are to have post-war prosperity are too critical to be dealt with by any such misstatement of fact and demagoguery as Mr. PATMAN indulged in yesterday on the floor of Congress. What he said of me personally is not important, although it was all utterly false and unfounded, but his misrepresentation of facts that concern every wage earner in the country should not be allowed to go unchallenged."

The International Labor Organization Meeting in Philadelphia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Evening Star of the issue of Saturday, May 13, concerning some of the actions taken at the recent world conference of the International Labor Organization at Philadelphia.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOT STARRY-EYED

At one of the closing sessions of the world conference of the International Labor Organization in Philadelphia the other day, the two United States Government delegates—Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins and Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS—offered a proposal of particular interest because it expressed the official view of this Nation regarding the social objectives of the next peace.

Stated briefly, the proposal would make it a matter of international obligation to maintain a high level of employment and promote improved standards of living throughout the world. To this end, a set of clear-cut social principles would be incorporated in the treaties to be drawn up after the war, the chief of these principles being: (1) That all persons wanting to work be given the chance to do so at fair wages, under reasonable conditions and with protection against occupational hazards; (2) that the well-being of the different national populations be advanced through adequate programs of nutrition, housing, medical care, and education; (3) that minimum job standards be established to prevent labor exploitation; (4) that provision be made for the creation of sickness, injury, old-age, and unemployment benefits to insure a steady flow of income to individuals who would otherwise suffer, and (5) that there be general recognition of the right of freedom of association and collective bargaining.

To some critics such a proposal may seem to be a New Dealish effort to make the world New Dealish, but in point of fact it reflects the general sentiment expressed by most of the delegates from the 40-odd nations represented at the I. L. O. conference and is made of much the same substance as the Philadelphia Charter, the statement of social objectives unanimously adopted by the conference. The thing that distinguishes it is the fact that it constitutes an official move by our Government to have these objectives lifted in due time to treaty status, so that the signatories to any international peace pacts would assume more definite obligations in respect to social reform than would otherwise be the case.

Of course, for nations merely to agree in a treaty that it is their duty to maintain employment at a high level and to improve living standards, does not guarantee that the duty can or will be well performed. But the value of such an agreement is that it involves some compulsion to live up to the obligation by taking steps to achieve the objectives—more compulsion, at least, than a broad statement of principles or ideals lacking the force or solemnity of a treaty. Although it may be faulty in detail, the American proposal thus has much to recommend it, especially because the soundness of the next peace will depend largely upon far-seeing and vigorous international action designed to provide a decent livelihood for the masses of people everywhere.

It is certainly true, at any rate, that demagogues and men on horseback thrive best in places where poverty and unemployment exist on a large scale. It is true, too, that national economics are so interdependent that when depression strikes one country, other countries are affected in varying degrees and that if the depression deepens and spreads, there develop those international frictions which all too often in the past have led to war. In the circumstances, the American proposal for a social-minded peace, promoted by treaty, or a similar proposal designed to effectuate the basic principles of the I. L. O., is by no means a starry-eyed idea. On the contrary, if something like it could be realized, the stability of tomorrow's world would be well served.

Declaration of Principles Adopted by Progressive Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a declaration of principles adopted by the Progressive Party Convention in Milwaukee on May 7.

I have obtained from the Public Printer an estimate as to the probable cost of printing. The estimated cost is $156.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROGRESSIVE PARTY DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES

INTRODUCTION

Ten years ago the progressive-minded people of Wisconsin, the farmers, workers, independent business and professional men and women broke away from the old political parties and founded a new party for these profound purposes:

1. To revitalize representative government in Wisconsin and the Nation and to effectuate the principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence.

2. To rehabiliate respect and recognition of the constitutional bill of rights.

3. For the development of progressive principles consistent with American ideals and the American form of government.

In the first campaign a decade ago, the Progressive Party declared its allegiance to all these fundamental principles, and specifically for the following:

1. The right of every American to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience; to express his opinion through a free press and free assemblage; and to have an effective voice in his political and economic life.

2. The right of every American on the farm and in the city to earn his living by useful work and to receive for this work an income which the full productive capacity of society can afford.

3. The right of American youth to develop their talents through public education, adequately supported, and to find a place in the life and work of their country.

4. The right of men and women whose industry has helped to build the Nation to face their declining years free from the fear of want.

5. The right of every citizen to join with his fellows in cooperative efforts and to bargain collectively through representatives of his own choosing.

6. The right of every American to live under a government strong enough to suppress the lawless, wise enough to see beyond the selfish desires of the moment, and just enough to consider the welfare of the people as a whole.

Today, on the threshold of the most challenging era in all the history of America, we Progressives of Wisconsin reaffirm our devotion to these original principles, and, in rededicating ourselves to the struggle for political, social, and economic democracy in this momentous year of 1944, adopt the following declaration of objectives and principles.

POST-WAR ECONOMY

As victory in this war approaches, the American people will face the greatest economic challenge of all times. Simply stated, the challenge is this:

Can the United States, which has built the greatest and deadliest war machine in the world, harness its great skills and ingenuities, its men, money, materials, and machines—harness all these to build an economy of full employment and abundance for all?

Timid souls shudder at the future and shrink from the challenge of the age in which we live. Progressives are convinced that we have nothing to fear but inaction, reaction, hysteria, and fear.

Progressives are determined to fight for a dynamic program which will permit nothing to stand in the way of full production and full employment. We are convinced that it is the destiny of America to show to the whole world that men can have freedom and security, that men do not have to barter away their liberty for a loaf of bread, that economic democracy is possible under political democracy, that a free America can provide a higher and better standard of living for all its people than can any dictatorship or any regimented economy—whether it be of the right or left.

Progressives do not believe it is the function of an all-powerful government to operate or even to regulate our entire national economy. We do believe that it is the function of a people's government to provide equality of opportunity for all, regardless of color, creed, or class.

One of the most effective methods of providing equality of opportunity for all is to destroy the enemy of economic democracy—national and international monopoly. This, we believe, is one of the paramount tasks of our time—to free American enterprise from bondage to the corporate giants, national and international, who have for too long chained us to an economy of scarcity.

Specifically:

1. We demand that our Government prosecute and uproot monopolies which have masked their operation under the guise of wartime emergency.

2. We support strengthening of antitrust laws to permit a more efficient and more relentless campaign to abolish monopolies. We favor revision of the patent laws so as to permit immediate public utilization of all the benefits of science and invention.

3. We protest the administration's reduction of appropriations in its budget for the antitrust division.

4. We call for more effective Government aids to independent business, which is the backbone of a genuine American system of free enterprise. Monopolists have corrupted the expression "free enterprise" by acting as if it means the freedom of monopoly to crush independent business.

5. We advocate that independent business should receive preferential treatment in purchasing surplus industrial war machinery, plants, and materials.

6. We urge more extensive support of producer and consumer cooperatives and public corporations modeled on the Tennessee Valley Authority to provide a continuing yardstick by which to compel the adherence of monopoly business to a program of abundance and full employment.

RECONVERSION TO PEACE

It is important for us to remember that the issues of post-war economics are being shaped here and now. If monopoly is allowed to dictate the policies of reconversion to peacetime product, the consequences will be disastrous. The extension of economic activity in America after the war will depend in large measure upon the opportunity for independent businessmen to pioneer new industry. It will depend upon the ability of the competitive part of industry to prevail over the monopoly philosophy of scarcity.

The disposition of the $15,000,000,000 worth of Government plants will play a major role in determining the shape and course of our post-war economy. Progressives oppose letting these plants fall into the hands of monopolies. We advocate a policy for the disposition of these facilities which will strengthen independent business and at the same time provide employment for returning war veterans and displaced war workers.

Progressives believe in the preparation and formulation now of a sound program of useful public works, to be used only when and where necessary to take up the slack in private industry as may develop in the years after the war. If we wait until the acute need is upon us, the result can only be a hastily formed, ill-advised program of made-work—boondoggling. Action now would accomplish several major purposes:

1. Assure returning veterans that they need not go on bread lines or sell apples if private industry fails to provide full employment.

2. Provide the Federal, as well as State and local units of government, with useful inventories of needed work.

3. Create a reservoir of hope and confidence, so that each little recession need not create a panic. Such a program of public works would serve as an insurance against severe economic dislocations.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Progressives believe in the extension and liberalization of the present social-security laws.

We advocate the adoption of a sound program of health insurance.

We favor a national system of old-age pensions which will provide more generously and equitably for our senior citizens. Pending enactment of a national system we pledge a liberal increase in the benefits paid to pensioners and repeal of the State real-estate lien law. We are opposed to federalization of unemployment compensation and favor retention of Wisconsin's successful system of individual reserves.

MONEY AND CREDIT

Money and credit are the lifeblood of production, consumption, and commerce. Credit should be used and controlled by and for the public. We are for Government owned and operated central banks and the use of public credit for public investment in self-liquidating projects. This will raise the national income and provide adequate opportunity.

CIVIL SERVICE AND PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

We believe in the principle of the merit system in State and local government. We take pride in the Wisconsin civil service law and all the efforts of Progressive leaders to protect and improve the law. We condemn the breaking down of civil-service principles by the Republicans who have enacted legislation to give civil-service standing to ward heelers and party hacks. Progressives have brought Wisconsin to a position of Nation-wide leadership in good civil service. We favor liberalization of the conditions for retirement in both the State and municipal employees' retirement systems, and the lowering of the ages of retirement as one means of creating job opportunities in public service in the post-war period.

We favor the establishment of an adequate retirement system for county employees who are not now covered by any existing retirement program. We favor the adjustment of salaries of State civil-service employees to compensate for increased costs of living and the improvement of State salary schedules to reflect the present employment and economic conditions.

We favor the enactment of a law to provide a maximum work day of 8 hours and a maximum work week of 48 hours for employees of State institutions.

The Progressive Party pledges itself to maintain the highest degree of efficiency in the operation of Wisconsin State government by utilizing the newest techniques in personnel administration and employee training.

AGRICULTURE

Progressives believe that a sound and genuinely American farm program must be rooted in a philosophy of abundance, not scarcity. The foundation of such an American farm policy must be the family-type farm, operated by its owner.

We oppose the development of factory-style farming dominated by large financial interests. We pledge support of such agencies as the Farm Security Administration serving as a major instrument for the rehabilitation of family-sized farms.

Prior to the war the farmer was the victim of an unfair economic and political system. Much of his produce was sold in an unprotected world market while he had to buy in a protected domestic market. Progressives are determined to prevent a return of this unjust situation in the post-war period.

For many years the markets for dairy products have been brought more and more under the control of monopolistic corporations making enormous profits at the expense of both farmers and consumers.

Under cover of the war emergency Government policies are strengthening the strangle hold of these monopolies on agriculture in general and the dairy industry in particular.

We demand a drastic change in these Government policies to stop the growth of monopolistic control in agricultural products. We call for prompt and vigorous action by the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission to end the monopoly control already established.

Full employment and more adequate purchasing power during the war have demonstrated the Progressive position that an ample market exists for farm products.

We commend the important part played by Senator LA FOLLETTE in the development of the food allotment plan to provide a basic minimum diet for people in the lower income groups. We favor the adoption of this plan as a means of helping these people and as an instrument to assist farmers to meet the economic adjustments of war and its aftermath.

We demand that the Federal Government fulfill its promise by maintaining adequate support prices.

We favor a firm price floor at adequate levels to prevent the farmer from becoming the victim of every fluctuation of the market and to assure him of a fair price for his products. The Government should take whatever steps are necessary to maintain these correct floor prices.

Progressives established the Wisconsin Agricultural Authority to promote quality production at home and better markets outside the State. This program, unwisely abolished by the Republican administration, should be reestablished and given adequate support.

We support the soil conservation program and advocate its extension.

We are opposed to any tariff policies which give special privilege to industry at the expense of the farmer.

Progressives have always fought for pure food laws and under the Progressives the best pure food laws in the country have been passed. In order to prevent the consumer from an immitation and in order to protect the farmer from the competition of an inferior substitute the Progressives have had placed on the statute books laws which tax all oleomargarine which is colored or can be colored in imitation of butter. We are not opposed to the sale of oleomargarine under its own natural color and on its own merit.

CO-OPS

Genuine producer and consumer cooperatives have proved the most effective methods for farmer and consumer to help themselves. Certain powerful vested interests are attempting to curtail and cripple the development of the cooperative movement.

Progressives urge, as a means of building a sound post-war economy, the strengthening and extension of the cooperative movement.

SCHOOL LUNCH

We favor the continuation and expansion of the school-lunch program.

FOREIGN POLICY

Progressives believe that there can be no compromise with the forces of Nazi-ism and fascism. We shall continue to give our wholehearted support to vigorous prosecution of the war to an early and successful conclusion. We condemn all efforts to create disunity among our people for selfish political ends.

Progressives are convinced, however, that victory has been delayed by the failure of our Government and the governments of associated nations to formulate and proclaim to the peoples of the whole world a clear and dynamic declaration of war aims which would appeal to the peoples of all countries. Our failure to hold out hope to the appressed peoples of enemy, occupied, and neutral countries robs us of a powerful weapon of political and psychological warfare which could result in the saving of many American lives.

There never was a time when the need of humanity was greater than now for genuine cooperation among nations for the attainment of a just and lasting peace. But to attain this noble objective the basis of our cooperative action must rest upon an American foreign policy dedicated to the elimination of the causes of war.

These declared objectives must be the guiding policies of any organization of free, sovereign nations set up to preserve the peace.

Progressives will cooperate in supporting sincere efforts made by the United States representatives at the peace table to secure a just and lasting peace. We affirm our unalterable opposition to territorial aggrandizement for the purposes of imperialism, discrimination against races or peoples, monopoly or cartel control of trade, insupportable indemnities, the oppression of peoples or the selfish exploitation of their natural resources, and the prolonged military government of conquered or occupied nations.

We oppose the determination of boundary questions without the consultation of the peoples concerned, as in the case of Poland or any other people in similar circumstances.

Instead, we favor the right of self determination for small nations by referenda held under international auspices which will guarantee an expression of the popular will free from coercion in any form.

We believe that the peaceful solution of the complex economic, ethnic, and political problems of Europe manifested by hundreds of years of blood lusts can be solved democratically upon the basis of close cooperation of the nations in a united Europe.

Progressives are deeply concerned by omnious signs that our Government is repeating the tragic mistake which frustrated the fulfillment of the hopes and aspirations of peoples everywhere in World War No. 1. Then we failed to secure the acceptance by our allies of our war aims as set forth in the 14 points prior to the conclusion of hostilities. The result was a peace treaty which violated these basic ideals and sowed the seeds of World War No. 2.

We urge the Government to use whatever bargaining power we still possess as a result of the astronomical amounts of manpower, money, material, and natural resources we are contributing to the war effort to secure now from our allies firm commitments. These commitments must lay the groundwork for a peace devoid of harsh indemnities and vengeance and prepare the way for a peace settlement which will strike at the causes of war; encourage the democratic forces in all countries to join with us in the attainment of political democracy and economic security; and promote cooperation on such specific issues as relief, health, trade, communications, and airways.

The people of this country are generous by nature and tradition. They wish to discharge their responsibility as citizens of a great and powerful nation. They know from bitter experience that the lasting friendship of peoples or nations cannot be bought by the prodigal distribution of our production, wealth, and natural resources. There is ample evidence that the realistic foreign policy of our most powerful allies is dictated by their respective national interests. If the United States is to attain its rightful place in world affairs, our foreign policy must have the continuing support of the American people. To command that support our foreign policy must be firmly based and vigorously conducted on the enlightened self-interest of this Nation.

The eminent American historian, Charles A. Beard, has summarized the Progressives' concept of the sound basis upon which a truly American foreign policy should be built: "The supreme object of American foreign policy should be to protect and promote the interests, spiritual and material, of the American people, and subject to that mandate to conduct foreign affairs in such a manner as to contribute to the peace and civilization of mankind."

Progressives reaffirm their profound conviction that in the last analysis our greatest contribution to world peace will be determined by what America does for Americans. Our primary task is to make democracy and equality of opportunity living realities here at home. By putting our own house in order we can prove to people everywhere that men can have both freedom and security. This is our manifest destiny, for as President Roosevelt has said: "Unless there is security here at home, there can be no lasting peace in the world."

INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM

Progressives favor the adoption of a constitutional amendment for the initiative and referendum. The necessary resolution to make this possible has been defeated by the votes of the reactionary Republicans and Democrats. We proposed to continue the fight to lodge this extension of democratic control in the hands of the people, where it should be.

CONSERVATION

We believe that an effective, honest, and progressive conservation program is one of the first responsibilities of a State administration; that conservation is a basic need for Wisconsin, present and future.

We favor an integration of the forestry- and game-conservation efforts of the Wisconsin conservation department with the soil-conservation and management programs of the State soil conservation committee, the Wisconsin College of Agriculture, and the Wisconsin State Department of Agriculture. We favor continued propagation of fish and game and a greater emphasis upon water and soil conservation as fundamental in a comprehensive conservation objective.

We believe that the farmer and rural landowner, custodians of the land with which all conservation activity is primarily concerned, should be encouraged to collaborate more closely with the game and forest conservation projects of the State government, and that the farmer should be accorded more generous benefits for the use of his land by city sportsmen through an accelerated public hunting and fishing grounds acquisition program.

We favor a continuation and extension of the principle of cooperative forestry by a restoration of forest crop law payments which have been reduced by preceding Republican State administrations. We propose an expansion of the State forests-and-parks program, to the end that the State may offer large tracts of virgin forests for the encouragement of the essential recreational industry.

In vast sections of Wisconsin where lands were denuded by timber barons in past decades local leaders and citizens know that the hope for a return to economic stability and prosperity lies in a revival of the forest industries. More than 1,000,000 acres of natural timberland in the central and northern counties of the State need reforestation. The tree-planting program of the State has lagged in recent years. We propose an intensive program of reforestation for the post-war period as the only feasible method of building the foundations for forest products and recreational industries in those sections in succeeding decades.

Conservation administration in Wisconsin has been weakened by political wrangling. Public confidence has suffered because of patronage disputes and political quarrels among members of the conservation commission.

We pledge the restoration of the Wisconsin conservation department to the highest level of efficiency in administrative conduct and leadership by adopting scientific techniques and employing research specialists for the solution of the many problems in the perpetuation and propagation of Wisconsin wildlife and the basic natural resources.

PUBLIC UTILITIES

We favor strict regulation of those public utilities which operate under private ownership and deplore the subserviency of the Republican-dominated Public Service Commission to the Power Trust.

We pledge an uncompromising fight against the Power Trust and its Republican political front in their efforts to smash the public-power movement and the rural electrification program in this State. We favor the expansion of the R. E. A. program as soon as materials are available and will oppose any further efforts to curtail its vital functions. We oppose the Power Trust drive to wreck the Tennessee Valley Authority and other great Federal hydroelectric projects.

We believe in the encouragement and fostering of public ownership at the municipal level as the best means of providing utility services at low rates and providing municipalities with the additional revenues they will need in the difficult post-war years.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

We favor immediate congressional action to make possible the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway. We are opposed to the diversion of water from the Great Lakes to the Chicago Drainage Canal.

LABOR

We reaffirm our determination to protect the right of collective bargaining by act of the majority; and the strict enforcement of laws affecting the health, safety, and welfare of the working men and women.

In order to effectuate these principles we propose: The repeal or drastic amendment of the un-American Catlin-Peterson law; and we condemn the refusal of the Republican members of the legislature to eliminate provisions similar to this act already declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States; the reestablishment for labor of civil rights in industry including the right to join unions of its own choosing without discrimination; the outlawing of company-dominated unions; the establishment of a strong agency to enforce these rights, thus minimizing industrial friction; the enactment of minimum State wage and maximum hour laws in accordance with and along the lines of the Federal act.

The social gains of security for the workers must be protected. As we look toward the post-war period, plans must be laid to minimize the hazards and insecurity of employment.

PUBLIC WELFARE

The unfortunate people in our charitable and penal institutions are entitled to humane and scientific treatment and consideration. We support an urgently needed post-war building program for State institutions. We deplore the opportunistic political maneuvering with which the Republican legislature pushed such a program through the last session but refused to provide revenues to carry it out.

TAXATION

We reaffirm our support of the Progressive principle of taxation based upon ability to pay. We restate our opposition to the sales tax and favor the repeal of the State cigarette tax. We favor a tax reform program to lighten the tax burden upon real estate, farms, homes, and places of business.

We condemn the failure of the Republican Party in power to redeem its platform pledge to reduce automobile license fees. Progressives will continue their effort to accomplish such reduction until it is achieved.

We deplore the crushing blows dealt to the principle of taxation based on ability to pay by the Republican majority in the 1943 session of the legislature. We call attention to the words of the titular head of the Republican Party that these blows were struck to change the long-time policy of taxing upon the basis of ability to pay.

We applaud the courageous fight made by Progressive legislators against overwhelming odds to block this assault. We recognize that it was their devotion to the basic Progressive principle of taxation which prevented the Republican legislature, in the words of its own leader, from making "a gift of the State's money to an estimated extent of $5,650,000" to the wealthy taxpayers of this State.

Progressives are proud of the part played by their legislators in thwarting the Republican attempt to deprive Wisconsin citizens of their traditional free access to income-tax returns.

We condemn the failure of the Republican legislative majority to reenact the 60-percent surtax on incomes, thereby making another gift to millions to the wealthy taxpayer.

HIGHWAYS

We must preserve the money collected through gasoline taxes and license fees to carry out a highway-construction program at the end of the war.

We favor a constitutional amendment prohibiting the diversion of highway funds. We condemn the Republican Party for failing to submit such an amendment to the people and thus violating another of their platform pledges.

We favor granting of aid by the State to the townships for the repair and replacement of roads and bridges destroyed in floods, and we favor the setting up of a program to take care of such catastrophes in the future.

SAFETY

We believe that as part of a post-war program of public works there should be a survey conducted and a program launched to eliminate death traps and other hazardous features of Wisconsin highways.

We favor using our existing State agencies to step up the general accident-prevention program so that Wisconsin will take a place in the forefront in the field of accident prevention.

HOUSING

We believe that no citizen should be compelled to live in dwellings that are unsanitary or unsafe; and we reaffirm our pledge to support effective elimination of poor housing conditions wherever they may exist.

VETERANS

Progressives have always maintained that adequate and generous treatment for veterans of our wars was a part of the cost of war. During and ever since World War No. 1, Progressives have been leaders in every fight for generous compensation, pensions, the bonus, and hospitalization for war veterans.

We are proud of the successful effort made by Progressive members of the legislature in saving the 60-percent surtax, amounting to over $6,000,000, which is now available for veterans' rehabilitation.

Senator LA FOLLETTE led a successful fight to raise the pay of persons in the armed services to $50 per month. Progressives have given their wholehearted support to the G. I. bill of rights bill which has passed the Senate and is now pending in the House of Representatives. They will vigorously oppose any attempt to reduce the benefits which the Senate bill provides.

We favor a paid-up life-insurance policy for every member of the armed services which will protect their beneficiaries now and give those who survive the war a real stake in our country.

Now and in the future Progressives will use every legitimate means at their command in Wisconsin and the Nation to provide generous benefits for the brave men and women who are in the armed services fighting our battles in this global war.

We are determined that returning service men and women shall have an opportunity to find useful and self-respecting employment at adequate wages.

EDUCATION

The American system of free education was established over a hundred years ago by a great victory of organized workers, farmers, and the common folks over the forces of reaction. Progressives are pledged to foster and support this great American tradition. To this end we favor:

1. Adequate financial support for education and the restoration of cuts made by the present administration.

2. Measures for the full preservation of academic freedom.

3. Provisions for teachers tenure that realistically suits the needs of urban and rural communities.

4. An adequate program of State and Federal aid.

5. Restoration of workers' education and of farmers' and workers' representation on the board of regents of the State university.

6. We are opposed to any tampering with the teachers' retirement fund.

CONCLUSION

Every proposal in this Progressive declaration of principles is rooted in the basic Progressive philosophy of equality of economic opportunity and individual political freedom. On this tenth anniversary of the founding of this Progressive Party we rededicate ourselves to the fundamental principle of a progressive democracy. "The will of the people shall be the law of the land."

Shortage of Farm Tools

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article under the heading "Scandal seen in shortage of farm tools," published in the Washington Times-Herald of this morning.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCANDAL SEEN IN SHORTAGE OF FARM TOOLS—W. P. B. "COVER-UP" HIT AS POLITICAL MOVE

A farm machinery shortage so serious that War Food Administrator Marvin Jones has refused to bring it out into the open for fear of the consequences to President Roosevelt's fourth term ambitions was threatening yesterday to become one of the major scandals of the war.

Blamed for this farm tool shortage that farm men say actually threatens "international disaster on the food front" are farm machinery officials of the War Production Board who allegedly "falsified" production figures and the "Big Eight" of the farm machinery manufacturers.

PROTEST DELAY OF PROBE

So serious is the situation that War Production Chief Donald Nelson is taking time off from his job of keeping the war factories going to take a special trip to Detroit the first week in June with leaders of the national farm organizations to make a personal investigation. To the farm leaders delay of the investigation until June is said to be "dangerously long," probably "too late."

GOAL MISSED BY WIDE MARGIN

As agricultural men viewed the situation, approximately 20 to 50 percent fewer farm tools have been produced than W. P. B. and W. F. A. assured the farmers would be produced during the winter for their use this year.

Instead of there being 30,000 two-row tractor-pulled corn planters—a machine absolutely essential in the midwestern Corn Belt this year where wet weather has so delayed the crops that planting "must be done in a hurry" if there is to be planted anywhere near the amount of corn the nation requires—only 16,000 had been delivered by the manufacturers up to April 1.

In addition, there are bad shortages of many other types of planting tools, according to W. F. A. Haying machinery production is lagging badly. The shortage of small combines for harvesting the small grain crops is considered by W. F. A. to be a real bottle neck.

TRACTORS, COMBINES HIT QUOTAS

Only the production of tractors, 2 percent ahead of the announced goals, and large combines have been produced in anything like the promised quantities, which are far below actual requirements, the farm men said.

Leaders of the national farm organizations, suspecting that the New Deal agencies were hiding something in their farm machinery production figures, Thursday sent Edward J. O'Neal, American Farm Bureau Federation president, to call on his friend Administrator Jones to "get the low down."

"DISHING OUT GLAMORIZED REPORTS"

According to the Washington Farm Reporter, a publication of the National Grange written by Agricultural Service Associates, a group of writers that work closely with leaders of all the major farm organizations, this is what took place:

"Could it be that the farm machinery division of W. P. B. wasn't going to fulfill its program?" O'Neal demanded of Jones. "Could it be that it was dishing out glamorized reports?"

It not only could be, but was, said Jones. He called in one of his specialists to prove it. Saying that he would do everything in his power to "needle" W. P. B. into action, Jones flatly refused O'Neal's demands that he do something about it immediately.

He let it be known that the White House had strictly forbidden any interagency squabbles between now and November 7, and that it wasn't going to be the one to disobey White House orders.

Price Control

REMARKS

OF

HON. LA VERN R. DILWEG

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. DILWEG. Mr. Speaker, we have discussed for some weeks now the pros and cons of price control. We have heard its virtues extolled, and we have heard the opposition's attempt, with all the eloquence at its command, to prove that price control has not worked. We have been treated to endless facts and figures, many of them conjured up more to prove a point than to reveal an existing situation.

I have contended since the beginning that price control has worked extraordinarily well, in the face of great difficulties; and that it has stabilized our cost of living with remarkable efficiency. It has lessened the impact of war on this country to such an extent that the opposition is inclined to claim that we faced no danger in the first place. This, of course, is a far-fetched idea, and we need only to look to those other countries without efficient price-control methods, and see that the cost of living has doubled, trebled, quadrupled or multiplied so many times that only the wealthiest people can afford even the most common living requirements.

I have an exhibit I want to show you today which, in my estimation, proves beyond doubt the efficacy of our price-control methods. It is not a document conceived and written by an economist; it is not a voluminous analysis by a governmental department; it is not a politically inspired screed. Mr. Speaker, what I have to show you today is nothing more or less than a newspaper advertisement, which I tore out of the Evening Star last Monday—an advertisement for a grocery store.

This advertisement lists 330 articles—meats, soaps, coffee, household needs, canned soups, canned vegetables—all the things a housewife needs to run her home.

The prices of all these 330 articles added together total $69.64, as of May 8, 1943—a year ago; and do you know what the price of the same articles is as of May 8, 1944—last Monday? The total price as of last Monday was $69.10—54 cents less than a year ago.

Now, this store surely is not running at a loss, yet they are selling the same goods they sold last year, not for more money but for less money.

What does that mean? It means that the United States Government has done so excellent a job of holding down the prices of goods at the wholesale levels that this store can hold down its retail prices, and even in a few cases reduce its prices, and still make money.

What better proof can we have than this? This is fact. It is experience. It cannot be denied that price control has worked.

Letter From A. F. Whitney, President, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, on Abolishing the New Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and challenging letter written by A. F. Whitney, president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, to Gleason L. Archer, chairman of the American Democratic National Committee, 105 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill., under date of May 5.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAND LODGE, BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN,
Cleveland, Ohio, May 5, 1944.

Mr. GLEASON L. ARCHER,
Chairman, American Democratic National Committee,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. ARCHER: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 22, in which you ask for my cooperation "as a true American in the job of abolishing the New Deal, root and branch, this year."

It so happens that I was not born yesterday, and the few years I have spent on this earth have taught me the folly of buying a pig in a poke. Therefore, I am not very much impressed by your assurance that if I will follow you I will be following the "American way." I shall, however, do you the courtesy of assuming you mean what you say, and therefore when you call for the abolition of the New Deal "root and branch," you must mean that we will restore the old order of the Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover era of bank failures, without guaranteed bank deposits; of swindling the public by the uncontrolled sale of securities and phony foreign loans; no social-security act, with its protection to the aged, the crippled, the blind, and dependent mothers; no program of soil conservation; no program for protecting the farmers against insurance companies who were liquidating them at a terribly high rate at the time the New Deal came into being; no Federal emergency relief administration to save starving people from a system of reckless laissez faire; no effective protection against the industrial exploitation of children; no floor under wages and no ceiling on hours, but a ruthless exploitation of the working people; no T. V. A. with its great benefits to thousands of farm families; a return to the outrageous conduct of public utility holding companies and exploitation of the people by monopolies and trusts; no legal assurance to workingmen that they are as free to join the organizations of their own choices as their employers are; no drought control and drought relief program designed to protect the very soil on which mankind must depend for human existence; no crop insurance and parity payments to protect the farmer and his business; no such programs as those embodied in the Civilian Conservation Corps and the National Youth Administration, designed to protect the youth of our land against a cruel economic system; no slum-clearance projects and no interest in decent housing for American workers, both industrial and rural; no good-neighbor policy and reciprocal trade agreements whereby the welfare of the peoples of this Nation and our neighboring nations of the world can be mutually advanced. But why go on and call the long list of things the New Deal stands for? After all, they live not only in the memories but in the hearts and experiences of the masses of the American people. When you call for the abolition of the New Deal, "root and branch," it is well that you direct your appeal, as you do, to "American industrialists," for certainly you would make little appeal among the masses of the people of America.

There is one feature of your program, however, that I must protest vigorously. I have a very high regard for that great American, Thomas Jefferson, and as an American I resent your sailing under the banner of one so noble and so great. Can you, for instance, imagine Thomas Jefferson, who had such complete faith in the honesty and integrity of the common people, sending out a political document appealing only to businessmen and industrialists? You would be more honorable and fair were you frankly to say that it is your purpose to adopt the Hitler technique of divide and conquer, by establishing a new party, which you hope might draw enough votes away from the legitimate Democratic Party to elect a Tory Republican. Just as your late lamented predecessors, the American Liberty League and the Jeffersonian Democrats, you hope to profit by this un-American technique. But the American people next November 8 will give you the same treatment they gave the Liberty Leaguers and the Jeffersonian Democrats.

I note you refer to alien-minded philosophy. Jefferson was accused of being alien minded—a Jacobin. In short, your brothers-in-purpose of his day thought of him just as you think of Franklin D. Roosevelt. The only manner in which you are followers of Thomas Jefferson, as you profess to be, is that Thomas Jefferson is way out ahead of you, even though he lived a century and a half ago. You had better acquaint yourself with some of Jefferson's philosophy, for I am sure if you understood his philosophy you might come to hate him even worse than you hate Franklin D. Roosevelt. You refer to yourselves as the true Democrats and describe in most contemptuous terms the followers of Roosevelt as trespassers, wrongfully in possession of the Democratic Party. Listen to what Jefferson said of those of his day who fought him like you fight Roosevelt. Just as you today connive to use the legitimate Democratic Party, so did Jefferson's enemies, who were monarchists, try to appear as Republicans. In 1822 Jefferson wrote to Albert Gallatin as follows:

"You are told, indeed, that there are no longer parties among us, that they are all now amalgamated, the lion and the lamb lie down together in peace. Do not believe a word of it. The same parties exist now as ever did. No longer, indeed, under the name of Republicans and Federalists. The latter name was extinguished in the battle of Orleans. Those who wore it, finding monarchism a desperate wish in this country, are rallying to what they deem the next best point, a consolidated government. Although this is not yet avowed (as that of monarchy, you know, never was), it exists decidedly, and is the true key to the debates in Congress, wherein you see many calling themselves Republicans, and preaching the rankest doctrines of the old Federalists."

On the same issue Jefferson wrote Martin Van Buren as follows: "Tories are tories still, by whatever name they may be called."

You address your appeal to American industrialists. Of the economic royalists of his day Jefferson wrote to William Johnson as follows:

"Still further to constrain the brute force of the people, they deem it necessary to keep them down by hard labor, poverty, and ignorance, and to take from them, as from bees, so much of their earnings as that unremitting labor shall be necessary to obtain a sufficient surplus barely to sustain a scanty and miserable life. And these earnings they apply to maintain their privileged orders in splendor and idleness, to fascinate the eyes of the people, and excite in them an humble adoration and submission, as to an order of superior beings."

After noting such a statement from a man who uttered it 121 years ago, are you sure that you want to be "followers" of Jefferson? If so, why do you make your appeal to American industrialists? Before you answer that question maybe you should take into consideration what Jefferson wrote to H. Lee in 1824:

"Men by their constitutions are naturally divided into two parties: 1. Those who fear and distrust the people and wish to draw all powers from them into the hands of the higher classes. 2. Those who identify themselves with the people, have confidence in them, cherish and consider them as the most honest and safe, although not the most wise depositary of the public interests. In every country these two parties exist, and in every one where they are free to think, speak, and write, they will declare themselves. Call them, therefore, liberals and serviles, Jacobins and ultras, whigs and tories, republicans and federalists, aristocrats and democrats, or by whatever name you please, they are the same parties still, and pursue the same object. The last appellation of aristocrats and democrats is the true one expressing the essence of all."

In your campaign appeal to American industrialists I am quite sure that Jefferson would class you among the "aristocrats" rather than among the "democrats." I note that in your Declaration of Chicago you took the following action:

"We recommend that the traditional two-thirds rule for the nomination of candidates be readopted as a safeguard against future attempts to subvert and destroy the Democratic Party."

In pressing for this undemocratic rule, I think you should again reappraise Jefferson as your ideal and inspiration. In 1790 Jefferson wrote: "The law of the majority is the natural law of every society of men." In 1792 he wrote President Washington: "The measure of the fair majority * * * ought always to be respected."

Again in 1809 Jefferson wrote:

"Where the law of the majority ceases to be acknowledged, there Government ends; the law of the strongest takes its place, and life and property are his who can take them."

I am confident that if Jefferson were among us today he would regard your use of his name quite like he regarded the action of the hypocrites and tories of his day who tried to put across their evil designs in the name of George Washington. In 1813 he wrote John Melish as follows:

"You expected to discover the difference of our party principles in General Washington's valedictory, and my inaugural address. Not at all. General Washington did not harbor one principle of federalism. He was neither an Angloman, a monarchist, nor a separatist. He sincerely wished the people to have as much self-government as they were competent to exercise themselves. The only point on which he and I ever differed in opinion was, that I had more confidence than he had in the natural integrity and discretion of the people, and in the safety and extent to which they might trust themselves with a control of their government. He has asseverated to me a thousand times his determination that the existing government should have a fair trial, and that in support of it he would spend the last drop of his blood. He did this the more repeatedly, because he knew General Hamilton's political bias, and my apprehensions from it. It is a mere calumny, therefore in the monarchists, to associate General Washington with their principles. But that may have happened in this case which has been often seen in ordinary cases, that, by oft repeating an untruth, men come to believe it themselves. It is a mere artifice in this party to bolster themselves up on the revered name of that first of our worthies."

You may accept this letter as my contribution to your cause, and I hope you will not entertain the opinion that I agree with you.

Sincerely yours,

A. F. WHITNEY,
President.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "As Coolidge Said," which was published in the St. Albans (Vt.) Messenger of May 11, 1944, in support of the St. Lawrence seaway.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AS COOLIDGE SAID

Twice in the last 10 days Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN has spoken out vigorously for his bill which would provide for the construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway power development. Last Friday, addressing a large radio audience from Watertown, N. Y., he cited the costs of the proposition, forecast the development of a great northeastern empire after the seaway's completion, and warned that private interests were fighting a proposal that would bring untold new wealth and industry to the New England States.

On Monday evening, in an address before the Rutland Rotary and Lions Clubs, Senator AIKEN enlarged upon the statements made in his Watertown address. He pointed to the enthusiastic support given the idea by that earlier Vermonter, the late Calvin Coolidge; and he cited the specific gains for our State that would result from erection of the power dam at Massena, N. Y.

Let us first look at the cost, as laid down by Senator AIKEN: Total, approximately $421,000,000, with the United States paying $277,000,000 and Canada $144,000,000. But, he recalled, Canada has already spent $140,000,000 on the Welland Canal in the system and New York will stand the cost of $93,000,000 for its own power development. Thus the actual cost to our Nation is reduced to $190,000,000.

Another point of great significance to Vermonters: The Senator remarked that there are large magnesium deposits supposedly right here in Vermont, and magnesium is the basis for light metal production. Hence he bolstered statements made publicly by Joseph Winterbotham, president of the Champlain Valley Council, and Publisher William Loeb of this newspaper, along these same lines. If these magnesium deposits can be developed by the cheap power to be available after construction of the seaway, Vermont is on the road to a mervelous post-war development.

Senator AIKEN further laid great stress upon the huge inland waterways shipping that would eventually result from the completion of the seaway and, finally, the Champlain Cut-Off. Thus the Middle West, the great grain States, and the Northeast would be linked commercially. Our State railroads, he proved conclusively, would stand to benefit. The mining of coal would receive an impetus; and the Gulf Coast and Middle Western States would likewise benefit from this general enlargement of our national productive capacity.

Northwestern Vermont, he continued, is within a 10-mile radius of the Massena Dam site; and all of Vermont, part of New Hampshire, much of Massachusetts, and a portion of western Maine are within a 200-mile radius. The power generated here would be the cheapest in the world, and closer to us than it is to either Buffalo or New York City.

The subject, analyzed so extensively by Senator AIKEN, could not possibly be summarized in this column. Suffice it to say that completion of the seaway should be our No. 1 post-war project as the Senator's bill provides. It would aid enormously in making Vermont progressive as it has never known progress before. And the words of the late President Coolidge are particularly appropriate and timely:

"This project is not incompatible with economy, for its nature does not require so much a public expenditure as a capital investment which shall be reproductive. Upon this project depends much future industrial and agricultural progress * * * protection from floods, and the addition of a great amount of cheap power and cheap freight by use of navigation, chief of which is the bringing of ocean-going ships to the Great Lakes."

Farm Machinery

REMARKS

OF

HON. H. CARL ANDERSEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, if we take cognizance of what is in the daily press today, I think it is high time that the Committee on Agriculture in this House investigate the farm machinery situation.

We see this headline, "Scandal Seen in Shortage of Farm Tools." Let us see what this article in today's Times-Herald has to say:

SCANDAL SEEN IN SHORTAGE OF FARM TOOLS—W. P. B. BLAMED

(By Philip Warden)

A farm machinery shortage so serious that War Food Administrator Marvin Jones has refused to bring it out into the open for fear of the consequences to President Roosevelt's fourth-term ambitions was threatening yesterday to become one of the major scandals of the war.

Blamed for this farm tool shortage that farm men say actually threatens "international disaster on the food front" are farm machinery officials of the War Production Board who allegedly "falsified" production figures and the Big Eight of the farm machinery manufacturers.

PROTEST DELAY OF PROBE

So serious is the situation that War Production Chief Donald Nelson is taking time off from his job of keeping the war factories going to take a special trip to Detroit the first week in June with leaders of the national farm organizations to make a personal investigation. To the farm leaders' delay of the investigation until June is said to be "dangerously long," probably "too late."

MISS GOAL ON PLANTERS

As agricultural men viewed the situation, approximately 20 to 50 percent fewer farm tools have been produced than W. P. B. and W. F. A. assured the farmers would be produced during the winter for their use this year.

TRACTORS AND COMBINES HIT QUOTAS

Only the production of tractors, 2 percent ahead of the announced goals, and large combines have been produced in anything like the promised quantities, which are far below actual requirements, the farm men said.

Leaders of the national farm organizations, suspecting that the New Deal agencies were hiding something in their farm-machinery production figures, Thursday sent Edward J. O'Neal, American Farm Bureau Federation president, to call on his friend Administrator Jones to "get the low-down."

"DISHING OUT GLAMORIZED REPORTS"

According to the Washington Farm Reporter, a publication of the National Grange written by Agricultural Service Associates, a group of writers that work closely with leaders of all the major farm organizations, this is what took place:

"Could it be that the Farm Machinery Division of W. P. B. wasn't going to fulfill its program?" O'Neal demanded of Jones. "Could it be that it was dishing out glamorized reports?"

It not only could be, but was, said Jones. He called in one of his specialists to prove it. Saying that he would do everything in his power to "needle" W. P. B. into action, Jones flatly refused O'Neal's demands that he do something about it immediately.

He let it be known that the White House had strictly forbidden any interagency squabbles between now and November 7, and that it wasn't going to be the one to disobey White House orders.

O'Neal, according to the Farm Reporter, came away from W. F. A. boiling. He called an immediate conference of the other farm-organization leaders.

"A joint statement blasting the whole rotten mess wide open to the public view should be issued sooner than immediately," O'Neal reportedly told the farm men.

"Not so fast," retorted the other leaders. "Donald Nelson has been about the only big shot in the administration high command to give the farmers a break. Now, let's have a cozy chat with Mr. Nelson before we blow the wind."

And that's what happened. They visited Nelson's office Friday. According to their reports, he didn't "beat about the bush." He heard the farm men describe the situation as they knew it. He listened to O'Neal accuse the W. P. B. Farm Machinery Division of falsifying production figures by reporting output in dollar value rather than in numbers of machine units. "You can't raise corn with dollar signs," O'Neal reportedly shouted.

"MACHINERY TRUST" BLAMED

The farm leaders claimed the "big eight" among the manufacturers of farm machinery referred to by W. F. A. specialists in their conversations as the Machinery Trust, are actually responsible for the failure of the farm machinery industry to meet the announced production goals.

The farm men claim that last fall, when farm machinery quotas were being established, the big manufacturers, in an attempt to hold their competitive market positions, asked W. P. B. for larger quotas than they could fill, taking the business from the smaller manufacturers that could have produced the tools.

LITTLE MEN "AFRAID TO SPEAK"

They knew at the time they couldn't fill their quotas, the farm leaders said, and it was apparent to the entire industry before February that they wouldn't meet them by a wide margin.

But the small manufacturers were afraid to complain, the farm men said, because they knew if they lifted their voice in criticism of the big companies, they would be driven out of business after the war. Marvin Jones knew about it, but he wouldn't "squawk" audibly for political reasons. Thus, they said, nothing was done.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, it is time for the Committee on Agriculture in this House, or some appropriate committee, to look into this situation and see whether or not we are going to have sufficient farm machinery to produce the food that we need in this great country of ours, not to speak of the impoverished peoples of the occupied countries.

Fear of Inflation in New Ceilings and Wages

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "People Fear Inflation in New Ceilings, Wages," published in the Washington Post of May 14, 1944, being one of the Gallup polls.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEOPLE FEAR INFLATION IN NEW CEILINGS, WAGES

(By George Gallup)

The effort being made by farm-bloc leaders to raise agricultural price ceilings and by organized labor to raise wages lacks widespread support at present from the American people. Undoubtedly fearful of the specter of inflation, the overwhelming majority of voters polled by the institute are content to keep price and wage ceilings where they are now.

While there is more sentiment for raising wages than for raising prices, it is interesting to note that even among wage earners polled in the survey the weight of opinion favors keeping wages at present levels. The typical American, although he is no expert on economics, is apparently conscious of the fact that higher wages for his work may simply lead to higher prices for the things he has to buy.

MAJORITY SATISFIED

The survey results do not mean that no injustices exist in present wage scales; nor do they mean that workers would be averse to getting more pay if it were offered to them. What the vote does signify is that the majority of workers are satisfied with their wages, and the majority of farmers with their prices. There is no popular ferment for change, no widespread feeling that the price-wage situation is unjust.

The issue of prices and wages was put to voters from coast to coast in the survey in the form of two questions, as follows:

"Do you think prices on most products should be allowed to go up or should prices be held where they are now?"

	Percent
Let prices go up	4
Hold prices at present level	91
Undecided	5

"Do you think wages for most workers should be allowed to go up, or should wages be held where they are now?"

	Percent
Let wages go up	18
Hold wages at present level	72
Undecided	10

The vote of skilled, semiskilled, and unskilled wage earners on the question concerning wage levels is shown below.

While about one in every four thinks wages are inadequate, and may feel vociferous about it, the great majority are apparently satisfied with what they are getting so long as prices remain unchanged.

Vote of skilled and unskilled labor

	Percent
Let wages go up	23
Hold wages at present level	67
Undecided	10

In the case of price ceilings, the greatest amount of sentiment for change comes from farm voters, who are obviously thinking about higher prices for their farm products. But even in their ranks only one in seven favors upward revision of prices.

The public's current support of price-wage control is easily understandable when one considers that the great majority of American voters favored adopting such a program fully 12 months before Congress put it into effect.

In September 1941 a Nation-wide survey found that 62 percent of all voters polled wanted a price-wage control measure as a means of combating inflation. This total included a majority of farmers and of labor.

Congress caught up with public opinion just 1 year later when it passed the price-wage control bill in October 1942.

Limiting Income Taxes to 25 Percent

REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not contend that anyone who does not agree with me is a Fascist. I know a lot of old dealers would like to have us say that, but I do not say it.

As far as Mr. Frank Gannett is concerned, he is advocating a very damaging amendment to the Constitution of the United States. That amendment, if passed, will restrict even inheritance taxes to 25 percent; all gift taxes, estate taxes, incomes, corporate as well as individual, will be limited to 25 percent. That means we will never pay off the war debt; we will never be able to pay more than the carrying charges. That means that small business will be destroyed, because big business could keep so much of their profits that they could run all small businesses out of existence. It would mean there would be no aid to veterans. The veterans' aid laws now on the books would have to be repealed. There would be no aid to our servicemen. There would be no social-security benefits. We would only have enough money to pay the interest on the national debt and the running expenses of our Government.

So, I say it is a very dangerous and Fascist-inspired amendment to our Constitution.

DISGRACEFUL AND INSIDIOUS PLOT

A few days ago, May 11, I made mention of a foul and un-American conspiracy which is all too close to being foisted upon this Nation. I refer to the disgraceful and insidious plot to secure passage through the legislatures of our several States of the so-called twenty-second amendment to the United States Constitution.

CONGRESS WILL HAVE NO RECOURSE

This proposed amendment has now been endorsed by the legislatures of 16 of our sovereign States. Under article 5 of the Constitution, if 36 of our States express their approval of this program through their legislatures, the Congress has no recourse but to act as a clearing-house for the amendment's formal ratification.

VICIOUS PROGRAM SPONSORED BY GREEDY GROUP

If this amendment was only sponsored by persons whose reputation for patriotism and clear thinking was above reproach and these sponsors were people with whom others could sit down in rational discussion and sift through the arguments, pro and con, I would possibly not be as genuinely alarmed about this matter as I actually am. The true facts in the case, however, are that a little group of greedy men who place love of personal gain above love of their country's best interests are sponsoring this vicious program.

Let no man who reads the printed literature of the organization which sponsors this plan believe that such is not the case.

FOUNDERS OF COMMITTEE

Let us look specifically into the background and early history of this organization, the Committee for the Constitutional Government, Inc. Let us see who founded this committee originally and who runs its affairs today for all practical purposes.

I have in my hand a booklet put out by this committee. It bears a copyright mark of the year 1944 and is therefore recent enough for these purposes.

This booklet says that in the organization's early days it was known as the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government, and was originally headed by Mr. Frank Gannett, as chairman, and that "to finance the committee's first operations, Mr. Gannett advanced a considerable sum before any cash came from the public."

The booklet, a little further on, then says:

As of January 21, 1940, former Congressman Samuel B. Pettengill succeeded Mr. Gannett as committee chairman.

A little further on, the text says:

The old committee (meaning the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government) decided early in 1941 to disband. But many of its supporters, saying "we have just begun to fight," were determined to put the work on a more solid and permanent footing. The Committee for Constitutional Government, incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia, with Samuel B. Pettengill as chairman and president, began functioning in April 1941.

Therefore the new group is a continuation of the old one.

CHAIRMAN OF REPUBLICAN FINANCE COMMITTEE A LEADER

Mr. Pettengill continued as chairman of the committee until early 1943 and held that office during 1942 at the same time that he also held the office of Chairman of the Republican national finance committee, according to information supplied me through the office of Mr. Spangler, chairman of the present Republican National Committee.

AMEND AND THEN UPHOLD CONSTITUTION

Although the old committee (the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government) was technically disbanded in 1941, practically without exception its same officers and members of its board of advisers were named in similar capacities with the successor group the present Committee for Constitutional Government, Inc. Mr. Gannett and Mr. Pettengill made the switch and are still listed as members of the board of advisers of the Committee for Constitutional Government. They probably decided it did not look so well to advocate amending the Constitution before upholding it.

FASCIST GROUP

The gentleman from Illinois asked me why I chose to call this organization a Fascist group. Due to limited time, I only answered him briefly. Today I would like to direct your attention to one man whose connection with this committee is an established and admitted fact. This man, who has been described by the present acting head of the committee, Dr. Peale, as "an expert on machinery of organization" is, in my opinion, the real directing head of the organization in its manifold slimy and vicious activities and is the man principally responsible for the phenomenal progress which the organization has made in distributing its thousands of propaganda pieces and making such a successful presentation to the various State legislatures before mentioned.

AN EXPERT ON FASCISM ONE OF LEADERS

This man, aided and assisted by a once respectable newspaperman, one S. S. McClure, whose record shows that he spent 2 years in Italy studying the workings of fascism in that country, has for more than 25 years worked often in the name of McClure to accomplish those things he did not feel free to advocate in his own name. Even with this willing and corrupted stooge, this man could not possibly have accomplished what he has thus far succeeded in doing without the aid of the free-flowing purses of Mr. Gannett and his other rich and greedy friends.

I call your attention to one Dr. Edward A. Rumely, originally the cofounder with Mr. Gannett of the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government and the executive secretary of that committee until the eagle eye of a senatorial committee brought his present activities and sordid World War No. 1 record once more before public notice.

Incidentally, I have been informed since speaking May 11, that if I expected to link the Committee for Constitutional Government with Dr. Rumely, I would be making a grievous error because, they said, "Dr. Rumely severed his connection with that organization several years ago." Such is far from the case.

RUMELY IN DIRECT CHARGE OF NEW YORK OFFICE

I hold in my hand a photostatic copy of a letter signed by Mr. Homer Dodge in response to a letter addressed to the Committee for Constitutional Government. Mr. Dodge's reply, which is dated September 4, 1943, is written on the stationery of the Committee for Constitutional Government. He says as follows in reference to the activities of the committee:

> The principal office is in New York and is in direct charge of Dr. Edward A. Rumely, assistant secretary. The Washington office is used chiefly for the collection of information in which the Committee finds interest.

You will therefore see that Dr. Rumely, the evil spirit; Frank Gannett, the money and power-loving rich man; Pettengill, the Republican money raiser and the Fascist expert have been and still are the sinister influences which control the destinies of this flag-waving, but Nation-destroying insidious organization.

RUMELY CONVICTED FOR OFFENSE COMMITTED DURING WORLD WAR NO. 1

Time will not permit me to dwell overlong on Dr. Rumely at this time. For those who wish to know his record in World War No. 1, they have only to check the official court records of the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals—two hundred ninety-three Federal 532, approximately page 500 and thereafter—for a description of the crime for which he was tried and sentenced to serve a year and a day in the Atlanta Federal Penitentiary. For those who do not know the details, let it suffice for me to say that Dr. Rumely was tried and convicted for accepting the sum of more than a million and a quarter dollars from the German Imperial Government for use by him in this country during World War No. 1 and for failure to report his connections with Count von Bernstorff and Dr. Heinrich Albert, the paymasters of the Kaiser on all espionage matters at that time.

GANNETT ORGANIZED WITHOUT ANY ORGANIZATION MEETING

Let me read to you a little from the actual testimony of Dr. Rumely when he appeared before the Select Committee of the United States Senate Investigating Lobbying Activities in 1938. The date was March 18, 1938. The interrogator was Senator Sherman Minton, the chairman of the select committee. The exchange was as follows:

> The CHAIRMAN. What is your business now?
> Mr. RUMELY. I am working with Mr. Frank E. Gannett of Rochester, N. Y.
> The CHAIRMAN. Doing what?
> Mr. RUMELY. Acting under his direction as executive secretary of a committee that he organized.
> The CHAIRMAN. What is the committee, Doctor?
> Mr. RUMELY. The National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government.
> The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been with this committee?
> Mr. RUMELY Ever since it was organized.
> The CHAIRMAN. Did you attend the organization meeting?
> Mr. RUMELY. Why, there was no organization meeting. Mr. Gannett formed it. He put out a statement. And then he asked me to cooperate in handling the mailings, and doing executive work under his direction.

FINANCES GO TO ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Then again, let me read from the testimony of Mr. Glen Hancock before the same senatorial committee on March 23, 1938. Mr. Hancock identified himself as the assistant secretary of the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government and stated that his superior was Dr. E. A. Rumely. The testimony went as follows:

> The CHAIRMAN. Do you keep the financial records in New York?
> Mr. HANCOCK. No. As far as I know, they are kept in Rochester.
> The CHAIRMAN. Who keeps them?
> Mr. HANCOCK. So far as I know, the assistant secretary.
> The CHAIRMAN. Who is the assistant secretary?
> Mr. HANCOCK. A Mr. Franklin.
> The CHAIRMAN. His first name, please.
> Mr. HANCOCK. I am unable to say. I do not recall.
> The CHAIRMAN. But he does not stay in the New York office?
> Mr. HANCOCK. No.
> The CHAIRMAN. And it is your information that he keeps the records in Rochester?
> Mr. HANCOCK. Yes, sir.
> The CHAIRMAN. And no records are kept in the New York office?
> Mr. HANCOCK. No records of that nature.

Then again, on April 20, 1938, one Sumner Gerard, who identified himself as treasurer of the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government and who is at present the very active letter-writing treasurer of the Committee for Constitutional Government, Inc., testified before this same senatorial committee.

Mr. Gerard, after acknowledging that he had been requested to bring certain financial information which is customarily in the possession of any organization, testified that he never handled the funds of the organization. He testified that such checks as happened to reach him personally by mistake were immediately turned over by him to Dr. Rumely, whom, he stated, he believed sent the money on to a Mr. Franklin in Rochester. Mr. Franklin, he said, he believed to be a certified public accountant employed by Mr. Frank Gannett.

Thus we see that the man of money handles the moneys which are contributed to this organization by, in many instances, well-intentioned persons whom I fear have been misled as to the real and underlying purposes of this efficient and definitely sinister propaganda machine.

I am now in the process of securing certain additional information on this organization, its purposes, and its executive personnel. I propose to submit this additional information to the Congress at an early date and to show, beyond the shadow of any reasonable doubt to any Congressman and citizen that this diabolical group, this sinister syndicate composed of a czar of journalism, a convicted enemy agent, a Republican money raiser, and a Fascist expert, all of whom have clasped and been clasped to the bosom of a great political party, are pressing upon this country a program which can only lead to a return to feudal practices, pauperism for the many, and power and riches for the few. What is this, I ask, but one step removed from the day when the rabble-rousing orator and the ignorant few who have followed for promise of reward move into the driver's seat, even then throwing aside those who have devised this nefarious millionaire's scheme, and throw this country into the chaos and confusion which preceded the accession to power of men like Hitler and Mussolini? What is this but fascism of the rankest sort swathed in its infant's clothes?

Remember, Vivian Kellems, who refuses to pay her income taxes and asks other people to do the same is one of their platform orators.

I realize that these words of mine are but general charges. It is not my intention to let my case rest here. In a few days I propose to submit to the House more cold facts and figures to further support the assertions which I have just made.

I am inserting herewith a statement appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in 1938:

THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE TO UPHOLD CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

(Extension of remarks of Hon. Lewis B. Schwellenbach, of Washington, in the Senate of the United States, Thursday, April 14 (legislative day of Wednesday, January 5), 1938)

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, the Portland Oregonian is one of the oldest newspapers on the Pacific coast. It is and has been conservative and Republican in its policy. Because of this background, the editorial printed in that newspaper on April 7 on the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government is of particular interest. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"MISGUIDED EFFORT

"The so-called National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government has done and is doing vast harm to the movement to prevent passage of the reorganization bill in its present mischievous form. Through high-pressure propaganda methods, directed first at Senators and now against Representatives, it is hurting the cause it seeks to help.

"The voluntary sending of telegrams and letters of protest to Senators and Representatives by individuals or groups who sincerely fear the effects of the proposed legislation upon constitutional government is one thing. That kind of effort is legitimate and right. But the organizing of a mass campaign directed by a highly paid secretary to flood Congress with thousands of telegrams prepaid by the organizers bears an aspect that is repugnant to fair-minded people. There is altogether too much of a show about it of attempted coercion and of vast expenditures of money by sources not in the open. Even if disclosures regarding this campaign do not actually cause passage of the bill, there are bound to be later repercussions in lobbying investigations.

"This Dr. Rumely, who fronts for the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government, is not much of an asset to any worthy public movement. He served a jail sentence back in the war years for having made false statements to the Alien Property Custodian in connection with his purchase of control of the New York Mail in 1915 with money furnished by an agent of the German Government. Surely sincere opposition to the pending reorganization bill could have found a better manager than he."

I am also inserting another statement appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in 1938:

MR. GANNETT'S COMMITTEE

(Extension of remarks of Hon. Sherman Minton, of Indiana, in the Senate of the United States, Monday, March 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, January 5), 1938)

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial published in the Capital Times, of Madison, Wis., in the issue of March 23, 1938.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"THE PROBE OF MR. GANNETT'S COMMITTEE SHOULD GO ON

"The loudest squawk of the week is coming from the headquarters of the so-called National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government, Publisher Frank Gannett's anti-New Deal propaganda outfit that spent large sums of money fighting the Supreme Court reform bill last year and is now engaged, tooth and nail, in a costly assault on the President's plan to reorganize Federal departments.

"The reason for the loud lament is this: The Senate lobby investigating committee has recently come to life and is inquiring into the identity of the interests behind certain lobbying groups in the Nation's Capital. The National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government has come under the lobby committee's searchlight.

"Whereupon Mr. Gannett, in a furious statement widely circulated this week by his propaganda agency, declares that 'the infamous Black committee of the United States Senate is again at work in an effort to destroy one of the most vital liberties of the American people—the sanctity of their homes, the freedom of their thought, and the privacy of their papers.'

"Actually, Mr. Gannett's committee was asked by the Senate investigators to produce records showing the committee's source of funds and other pertinent information to which Congress and the public is certainly entitled. An organization that proposes to advise lawmakers what to do and what not to do should surely operate out in the open and not behind the anonymity of a high-sounding title.

"A subpena issued by the Senate investigators was served on the executive secretary of the Gannett organization, one Dr. Rumely. That gentleman, on the advice of a former Hearst attorney, defied the Senate committee and refused to produce the records.

"While the Senate probers consider bringing contempt proceedings against Rumely, the facts about the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government remain a secret.

"The Capital Times is not surprised at the Gannett committee's refusal to reveal its significant background. Some months ago this newspaper in an open letter challenged Mr. Gannett to make public the names of the individuals and organizations who financed its obviously expensive propaganda campaign.

"Mr. Gannett's reply was angrily evasive—the contributors to his propaganda jackpot were too numerous to mention, and the amounts each kicked in were almost all small, said he.

"We are not astonished, therefore, that Mr. Gannett should fly into a rage at the Senate Lobby Committee and shout about such irrelevant matters as 'the sanctity of the home,' even though nobody is threatening the sanctity of anybody's home or Mr. Gannett's 'freedom of thought.'

"The Capital Times hopes that the Senate Lobby Committee, now chairmaned by Senator Sherman Minton, of Indiana, will continue its investigation of Mr. Gannett's propaganda organization and exercise its full authority to bring out the facts.

"They should make interesting reading, judging from the extreme reticence of the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government to make them public."

There is inserted herewith an excerpt from a tax letter, as follows:

TRYING TO SNEAK THROUGH AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION

ENDICOTT, N. Y., March 27, 1944.

DEAR TAXPAYER: * * *

Most serious of all, a lobby, or pressure group, working for the interests of large taxpayers, is trying to sneak through an amendment to the Constitution limiting income taxes after the war to 25 percent of a person's income. This will not save you money; it will cost you money, because what the wealthy save will be levied on the broke. The wealthy, whose fair share of taxes, even before Pearl Harbor, had been set from 25 to 90 percent of their incomes, will save huge sums of money which the Government will need to win the peace and provide employment for the veterans. You will have to pay for this lost revenue by a sales tax, which will be the inevitable result. As a taxpayer having a net income of under $5,000 and spending by far the larger part of your earnings for food and goods, you will be hit hardest by a sales tax. Again you will be carrying the tax burden for the wealthy who will be literally having a "piggy-back ride" on your shoulders. This lobby just failed by the slimmest of margins, but do not doubt for a minute that they won't try again.

During wartime it is necessary to pay more taxes. However, it is becoming increasingly evident that the tax increases are being thrust upon the smaller taxpayers while special interests and upper-bracket taxpayers are not only escaping their just share of the tax burden through the existence of loopholes in our present law which Congress has refused to close but are also seeking further relief at your expense.

Very truly yours,

JOHN J. DAPOLITO.
MARVIN S. TANENHAUS.

REMARKS
OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, at great sacrifice of life our fliers raided and bombed Schweinfurt, the Nazi ball-bearing center and location of S. K. F.'s German ball-bearing plant.

There is an American S. K. F. ball-bearings plant at Philadelphia. The main owner, as I understand it, of the American company is Count Hugo von Rosen, but in order to avoid the provisions of Alien Custodian property law a trust agreement was developed whereby normal control passed to William L. Batt, who was vice chairman of the War Production Board.

Batt votes 95 percent of the stock of S. K. F. Industries, Inc., of Philadelphia under said trust. The Swedish company owns a large block of S. K. F.'s stock, but Batt also votes that stock under the trust.

The Swedish company's head control rests in one Count Eric von Rosen, cousin of Count Hugo von Rosen, who is behind-the-scenes boss of the American S. K. F. Count Eric is the leader of the National Socialists in Sweden and former brother-in-law of Hermann Goering, second in power to Hitler.

Thus there is a definite affiliation between American S K. F. and Swedish S. K. F. The ball bearings sent by the Swedish company materially aids the Nazi war effort and tends to render abortive and useless the activities of our brave fliers in bombing vital ball-bearings plants in Germany, particularly at Schweinfurt. We should not stand idly by and permit Swedish S. K. F. to bolster up our enemies despite the fact that Sweden is a neutral; every possible economic sanction should be invoked against S. K. F. either in Sweden or in Philadelphia or both.

The American S. K. F. at Philadelphia is protecting the Swedish S. K. F. by taking care of the Latin American customers of Swedish S. K. F. All ball-bearings shipments of the American company to Latin America should be stopped. All export permits should be denied by the Foreign Economic Administration. Let Mr. Batt and Count Hugo von Rosen in turn force Count Eric von Rosen to stop shipments of S. K. F. ball bearings to Germany with which to bolster up the Nazi Wehrmacht.

We are approaching a most critical period in the war. We must use every weapon at our command. Diplomatic niceties must go in the ash can in this regard. Either American S. K. F. forces its Swedish counterpart to quit aiding Hitler or we should crack down hard on American S. K. F., and if need be seize the Philadelphia plant and shut off all S. K. F. exports, and furthermore prevent any more moneys, dividends, and royalties from being sent from American S. K. F. to Sweden's S. K. F. These moneys are used to strengthen Sweden's S. K. F. in its increased supply of ball bearings to Hitler.

Unless we get tough with S. K. F. it all does not make much sense to me.

America's Appreciation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am setting forth a speech delivered by me in Louisiana over the radio and several other times during the months of March and early April 1944. It is as follows:

My friends, the problem of giving aid and preference to the returning soldier is not new to the Congress of the United States. The first Congress which ever met in this country received the problem and met it by giving to the soldiers of the Revolutionary War a pension of one-half pay. Since this time, veterans of all wars in which the Nation has engaged have received special preferences and benefits as recognition of their services to the Nation during its hours of crisis.

Your present Congress has this same problem and is now struggling with it. I can see definitely certain things which will come out of our work and will constitute some of the post-war benefits which our returning soldiers and sailors may expect to receive. The proposed program is divided now into five parts, namely:

1. Special civil service benefits to veterans.
2. Unemployment benefits.
3. Home and farm purchase program.
4. School program.
5. Continuation of hospital and compensation programs.

I will discuss these in the order named. As for the first, there is now pending in Congress legislation which will give every veteran from 5 to 10 points preference on every Civil Service application for a Government job. Proposals to give every position in certain Government Departments to veterans are now the subject of the attention of Congress; but Civil Service Associations and Leagues from over America are opposing such a proposition as not in the interest of true Civil Service.

The returning soldier and sailor of this war will present to this Nation its greatest employment problem. Between eleven and twelve million young men, and some young women, will be released from the armed services and returned to civilian life. Most of them will want jobs immediately and every agency of Government and every private plant will be called upon to aid in this great undertaking. Many will be immediately placed in suitable positions, but in the event the veteran cannot immediately obtain gainful employment, it is proposed that Congress authorize the Veterans' Administration pay him a sum ranging from $15 to $25 weekly until he obtains work. These amounts shall be payable as weekly wages and shall not exceed 52 weeks, which will give the veteran a year's protection against unemployment.

Another proposal which should interest every serviceman, and the families of these men, is that of aiding them in the purchase of farms and the owning of homes. To accomplish this it is proposed that the Government will provide loans up to 95 percent of the value of the property, these loans extending over a 40-year period, with a very low rate of interest. Under such a program men will be given employment in the building of new homes and at the same time the veteran will be given the opportunity of actually owning a farm or a home.

One of the proposals which gives me personally much enthusiasm is that of providing education for these taken from the schools of the Nation and placed in service. It is proposed that the Government return to school those taken away by war and give them a chance to finish their education. Of course, this might be done in a school selected by the veteran, public or private, provided the tuition is within certain limits; it might be either college education or vocational education; it might be only for 1 year or it may be for as much as 4 years, provided the work done by the veteran measures up to the minimum requirements of the school. And during the time he is in school he shall receive his tuition provided it is not in excess of $500 per year and he shall receive $50 per month living expenses.

One of the parts of the veterans' program which interests me very much is the matter of taking care of the disabled. Of course, under the present law, a disabled veteran is entitled to a sum ranging from $10 to $250 per month, depending upon his disability and his need of an attendant. The Congress will, no doubt, retain this compensation, or pension as it is presently called for the war's disabled. The present problem, however, is greater than this. It is the problem of taking care of the wounded and the diseased men promptly; and having them examined and rated for disability within a very short time after leaving service. With 12,000,000 servicemen and with a list of casualties which today has already passed the number of 165,000, we can easily see that a tremendous job is just about to be placed upon the Veterans' Administration. Already 223,000 claims for compensation have been filed by veterans of World War No. 2, and already 119,382 claims have been adjudicated, leaving 104,411 claims pending at the present time. In the month of November over 4,864 World War No. 2 veterans were in Veterans' Administration hospitals throughout the country and over 40,515 had been in these hospitals throughout the Nation. The number grows monthly and the problem is just in its beginning. One great service organization in its hearings before the World War Veterans' Committee recently estimated that the load of disability cases would constantly increase from year to year from now on until, this witness thought, the maximum loans would be reached about 25 years hence, but at this time there would have been placed on the compensation or pension rolls of the country 1,250,000 veterans. Should these cases average $100 per month, the monthly costs bill would reach $225,000,000 or $1,500,000,000 per annum.

To hospitalize the load which is coming to the Veterans' Administration, it is estimated that 300,000 hospital beds will be required. Of this number, the Army and Navy have some 250,000 beds of which they can turn over to the Veterans' Administration about 100,000 beds. The Veterans' Administration itself has about 100,000 beds and this leaves about 100,000 hospital beds to be obtained in the long-range future. At the present time, there is no hospital construction program under way, but no doubt, in time the needs of the veterans will demand expansion to take care of these men, sick in body and spirit. In the immediate area, I am proud of the 400-bed hospital at Barksdale Field which is taking care of many of our boys each day.

Out of all of these figures, my friends, comes the problem of keeping abreast of the demands which will shortly be made upon the Veterans' Administration. We have already given this agency of Government a priority on manpower second only to the Army and the Navy. We have authorized expansion to take care of thousands upon thousands of additional employees. At the present time, however, the Army alone is discharging men from some 500 discharge centers; and it is impossible for the Veterans' Administration to have rating boards and advisory councils at each discharge center. Far better, from the viewpoint of the veterans would it be if the Army had only about 25 discharge centers and the Veterans' Administration had men to advise the disabled man as he leaves service, together with rating boards ready to immediately pass upon his disability and to tell him what percentage of compensation he is entitled to receive. Such is my proposal.

My friends, about 1 month ago I took dinner with a sergeant who had been wounded in Africa. This young man stooped down to pick up a land mine, and it exploded, blowing off his right leg, injuring his hearing, cutting his face, and paralyzing his right arm. For 7 months he remained in the Walter Reed Army Hospital at Washington while his amputated leg and his crippled arm healed. One morning he was discharged, with no job, no place to go, and no pension check to take care of him. The Veterans' Administration had done nothing during this time, and he was thrown back into the industrial world to compete with vigorous, healthy men who had stayed at home. I am glad to say, my friends, that we brought this man's case to the attention of the Veterans' Administration and that his case was adjudicated and his compensation started without the necessity of looking at any medical record—merely by looking at the wounds.

The Sunday just before leaving Washington the weather was nice and balmy. Gone was the ice and snow of a few days before, and in its place was the warm Gulf breeze, presaging the first touch of spring. Walter Reed Army Medical Center is the great Army hospital located on the outskirts of Washington. On last Sunday afternoon, many Washington people visited this great institution and found every sick and crippled man who could walk out in the hospital grounds enjoying the warm sunshine of spring. The young ladies from Washington strolled by the great stone buildings, looking up on the second story porches where lay the men not able to leave their beds. They lay there in the awkward and ungainly positions which modern surgery requires those who have broken and amputated limbs. But sick as they were, everyone had a smile on his face. The only long faces were those of the spectators from the city of Washington. Repeatedly, they raised their heads from their beds which were all placed to the outside of the porch and waved to the young ladies passing by.

For those men, America cannot do enough. For them, regardless of whether our post-war program costs three and one-half or three hundred and fifty billion dollars, America will still be indebted to them. We cannot do too much. What we need is the same soldier courage which these men have and we, too, will get along.

During the next few months the Nation must produce as it has never produced before. Donald Nelson, head of the War Production Board, has recently announced in Washington that the war production has fallen down for the month of February, and that we as a Nation failed to meet Army requirements during this month. We can cry about vacations, shorter hours, better working conditions, and more pay. We can groan about the shortage of food, clothing, gasoline, or other things, and we can complain bitterly about the rationing of commodities. In the long run these are not important. It is important, tragically important, that these men be given every care and attention, and that their paths may be made easy as they move through the months and years ahead.

Hon. Emanuel Celler, of New York, Asks Vatican to Help Rescue of Hungarian Jews—Turkey Also Asked

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker—

First. Reports from newspaper correspondents and foreign observers indicate the intention of the Hungarian regime and its Nazi cohorts to liquidate Hungarian citizens of the Jewish faith by inhuman annihilation. The New York Times of May 10 contained a dispatch from its correspondent in Istanbul, which confirms the worst fears. So-called baths or gas chambers are being prepared to slaughter not only the Jews of Hungary, but large numbers of their coreligionists, refugees from Poland and other Nazi-dominated lands, who have found asylum within Hungary's borders.

Second. According to the figures appearing in the Jewish Year Book, in July 1940 there were 444,567 Jews in Hungary out of a total population of 10,817,286. Of this number, 204,371 Jews resided in Budapest. It is estimated that following territorial changes, resulting from Hungarian expansion, and arising from refugee immigration, the Jewish population of Hungary now numbers close to one million. This figure includes also persons not previously included within these statistics, but who would be classified as Jews under the Nurmberg laws.

Third. Exigencies of war and political obstacles will prevent large numbers of Jews escaping through underground channels. Turkey is the closest neutral country. Undoubtedly the War Refugee Board is doing a splendid job under the admirable leadership of John W. Pehle, impressing on Turkey the urgency of the situation. The time has arrived for the strongest pressure because the lives of thousands depend on prompt action. It is therefore suggested:

a. Turkey be approached with a view of her permitting the entry of all genuine refugees. If necessary, she could assign specified locations, where temporary shelters can be erected. Such names could be designated free zones. The cost of upkeep and other expenses should be underwritten by the United Nations, through U. N. R. R. A. and other agencies created for such purposes. Private relief groups, i. e., the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, would be able to supplement the funds and provide personnel.

b. On the completion of hostilities these refugees should either be allowed to return to the countries of origin, or be permitted to emigrate to Palestine, and to other areas of settlement.

c. To overcome German and Hungarian objection, it is suggested that the apostolic delegate at Washington be approached with a view to enlisting the aid and cooperation of the Vatican. The Roman Catholic Church, which has already rendered such valuable aid to all refugees, might be able to influence the authorities in Budapest to permit the gradual exodus of Jews. The Vatican flag could be hoisted on the boats, to transport these refugees down the Danube through the nearest Turkish port. The Danube traverses Hungary, enters Rumania, forming the boundary line between Bulgaria and Rumania, reemptying itself in Rumania at Varna, on the Black Sea. From this point it is approximately 150 miles by sea to Istanbul, Turkey.

d. Passenger steamers ply on the Danube; the average boat could accommodate about 500 to 700 passengers. The Vatican might instruct its delegate in Budapest to hire 6 or more boats, which would travel under the aegis of the church and with the consent of all belligerents. The journey from Budapest to Istanbul should take anywhere from 3 to 6 days, under the present conditions.

Fourth. Simultaneous intervention might be undertaken through diplomatic channels in Washington, London, and Ankara. The War Refugee Board will be of inestimable value in this connection.

The Hungarian Jews represent the last remnant of European Jewry. They have resided in the Danubian country for centuries, contributing to its wealth and progress. Large numbers are orthodox, observing the tenets of their religion with genuine fervor. The theological schools—Yeshivot—of Hungary are world renowned. Its scholars and writers have brought their message to every country. To cite a few living examples: Dr. Joseph H. Hertz, Companion of Honor and Chief Rabbi of the British Empire; Dr. Stephen S. Wise and Professor Hans Kohn of Smith College. Both Theodore Herzl and Max Nordau were products of Hungarian Jewry. Constant daily reports of mass killings have deadened our sensibilities. The calamity is too grandiose for human comprehension. Let us imagine that the entire population of Boston were in jeopardy. Would we stand by idly? No; we would find a way.

The Promotion of Friendships Among Physicians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. C. GATHINGS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Dr. L. H. McDaniel from the Journal of the Arkansas Medical Society, January 1944:

THE PROMOTION OF FRIENDSHIPS AMONG PHYSICIANS [1]

(By L. H. McDaniel, M. D., Tyronza)

A few days ago I received a letter from our beloved secretary in which he requested that I write a short paper to be presented tonight. Recently I learned over the radio that whenever the President of the United States invited anyone to take breakfast or even to confer with him that there is no such thing as a refusal for the invitation amounts to a "command performance." The subject assigned me was The Promotion of Friendship Among Physicians. I wish to respectfully accept Dr. McCurry's invitation as a "command performance."

I wish to express my appreciation for the valuable radio that the society presented me in recognition of my humble services to the Society the past year. I heartily concur in the selection of Dr. Stroud as the other recipient of your generosity for I look upon Dr. Stroud as one of the outstanding men of the South—as a physician, as a citizen, as a father, as a brother in the profession, as a Christian gentleman. Surely his selection was timely. I accept the radio that you gave me as a token of recognition for the promoting of the Northeast Arkansas Medical Society program at Tyronza on May 7, 1942, a program that I have never seen surpassed in over 20 years cooperation with various medical societies. Again, gentlemen, I thank you.

There is something better, grander, and more valuable to be received at our medical meetings than the new knowledge or new skill that we may acquire, although I would not have you think for one moment that I am minimizing the importance of the brushing up and the freshening up on new drugs, new treatments, and new techniques that we obtain when we hear our brother physician report some new findings, new experiences, or new successes that he has achieved. In the Army this inexplainable and indescribable something is known as morale. The strengthening and reviving of our morale as a natural consequence of our medical society meetings is a prize that no physician should let slip by. Surely the failure to attend our medical society meetings exacts too heavy a penalty in the long run for the honest and sincere physician to have to pay. I hope you will not consider me overly sentimental when I tell you that I feel repaid for making the trip to the medical society when I receive the handclasp of my brother physicians and realize that there is a fellow worker who struggles against the same problems which I experience, who knows the same joy and exhilaration that I know on the completion of a job well done, and one who has the same heartaches that I suffer when an all-wise Providence sees fit to write failure to a case in spite of our most heroic endeavors. We are told in that great Book how the sinner received strength from touching the hem of the Master's garment. I mean no sacrilege when I tell you that your friendly handclasp does almost that much for me.

Last night I ran across a program of the Northeast Arkansas Medical Society for the meeting at Harrisburg, October 17, 1929. Prominent on the program were Dr. W. M. Majors, Dr. J. T. Altman, Dr. J. H. Lamb, Dr. Thad Cothern, Dr. C. W. Garrison, Dr. G. A. Warren, and others whose voices for honest and honorable medicine have been forever stilled and silenced, and then I wondered if we as physicians are showing the proper appreciation to men such as Dr. McCurry, Dr. Verser, Dr. Stroud, and others whose medical careers should serve as an inspiration to the younger physicians.

"If with pleasure you are viewing
Any mark someone is doing,
Tell him now!
Don't withhold your approbation
Until the preacher makes oration
And he lies with snowy lilies on his brow.

"For no matter how you shout it,
He will never know about it;
He'll not know how many teardrops you have shed.
So, if you think some praise is due him,
Now's the time to slip it to him,
For he cannot read his tombstone when he's dead."

Can't we express to our brother physicians both by word and deed our appreciation of him, beginning tonight?

While on the topic of friendships, the subject assigned to me tonight, will you permit me to give a description of a friend whom the commencement orator used the day I graduated from college, a description I often test in my mental classification of friends. May I dedicate this description to my friends, Drs. P. W. Lutterloh and Ira Ellis. I quote: "Oh, the joy, the unexplainable joy, of feeling safe with a person; having neither to weigh words nor measure thoughts—but pour them all right out—knowing that a faithful heart will take all, grain and chaff alike, keep those that are worth keeping and with the breath of love and friendship, blow the rest away."

When I think of the wonderful examples that my dear friends, Paul and Ernest Stroud, have before them constantly in the life and work of their father, I am reminded of another poem that I will read if Dr. Stroud will not think I am insinuating that he is getting old.

"THE BRIDGE BUILDER

"An old man going a lone highway
Came at evening, cold and gray,
To a chasm vast and deep and wide.
The old man crossed in the twilight dim—
The sullen stream had no fear for him;
But he turned when safe on the other side,
And built a bridge to span the tide.

"'Old man,' said a pilgrim near,
'You are wasting your strength with building here;
Your journey will end with the ending day;
You'll never again pass this way;
You've crossed the chasm deep and wide,
Why build you this bridge at eventide?'
"The builder lifted his old gray head:
'Good friend, in the path I've come,' he said,
'There followeth after me today
A youth whose feet must pass this way.
This chasm that has been naught to me
To that fair youth may a pitfall be;
He, too, must cross in the twilight dim—
Good friend, I'm building this bridge for him.'"

Gentlemen, this society boasts of two physicians whose love for each other is a source of admiration and respect throughout the State. To watch these men struggle over a single penny in a game of chance or golf, knowing that they would give each other many thousands of dollars gladly, if the occasion demanded, it is true entertainment. May I get personal and quote a poem that fits them, Doctors McAdams and Willett of Jonesboro, Ark.:

"THE TWO PALS

"I called him John, he called me Jim,
Nigh 50 years that I knowed him
And he knowed me, and he was square
An' honest all that time, an' fair.
I'd pass him mornings goin' down
Th' road or drivin' into town,
An' we'd look up the same ol' way
An' wave a hand an' smile an' say:
'Hello, John.'
'Hirye, Jim?'
"I guess you don't real often see
Such kind of friends as him an' me;
Not much at talkin' big; but, say,
Th' kind of friends that stick an' stay.
Come rich, come poor, come rain, come shine,
Whatever he might have was mine and Mine was his'n, an' we both knowed it
When we'd hollow on the road:
'Howdy, John.'
'Howdy, Jim.'
"An' when I got froze out one year,
He dropped in on me with that queer
Big smile an' layed two hundred dollars down,
An' says: 'No int'rest, understand,
Er note.' An' he took my hand
And squeezed it an' druv away,
'Cause there wusn't nothin' more to say.
'S'long, John.'
'S'long, Jim.'
"An' when John's boy come courtin' Sue,
John smiled an'—well, I smiled some, too,
As though things was a comin' out
As if we'd fixed 'em, just about.
And when Sue blushed an' tole me—why,
I sat and chuckled on the sly;
An' so did John—put out his hand—
No words but these, y' understand?
'Shake, John.'
'Shake, Jim.'
"An' when Sue's mother died, John come
An' set with me, an' he was dumb
As fur as speech might be concerned;
But in them eyes of his there burned
A light of love and sympathy
An' friendship you don't often see.
He took my hand in his that day
An' said—what else was there to say?—
'H'lo, John.'
'H'lo, Jim.'
"Somehow the world ain't the same
Today. Th' trees are all aflame
With autumn, but there's something gone—
Went out of life, I guess, with John.
He nodded that old grizzled head
On the pillow of his bed,
An' lifted up the helpin' hand
An' whispered: 'Sometime—understand?'
'Bye, John.'
'Bye, Jim.'"

I fear that I have taken too much time with our poems and will save the complimentary verses on the other members until a later date.

I wish to tell you, ladies and gentlemen, a story originally told by Dr. Russell H. Conwell, of Temple University, a story which he used as a central thought of a lecture, the proceeds derived from which he sent 1,265 boys through college; a story of a Persian farmer named Ali Hafed, who sold his farm, collected his money, left his family in charge of a neighbor, and went away in search of diamonds. He searched all throughout Persia, then he came around into Palestine, then wandered on into Europe, and at last when his money was all spent and he was in rags, wretchedness, and poverty, he stood on the shore of that bay at Barcelona in Spain, gazing out into space. When a great tidal wave came rolling in between the Pillars of Hercules, that poor, afflicted, suffering, dying man could not resist the awful temptation and he cast himself into that incoming tide and sank beneath its foaming crest, never to rise in this life again.

A few days later an old priest came in to visit Ali Hafed's successor and the moment that he opened the door he saw that flash of light upon the mantel and he rushed up to it and shouted: "Here is a diamond. I know positively that this is a diamond." Then together they rushed out into that old garden and stirred up the white sands with their fingers and lo, there came up more beautiful and valuable gems than the first. Thus, friends, was discovered the diamond mine of Golconda, the most magnificent diamond mine in all the history of mankind, excelling the Kimberly itself. My friends, there is a diamond mine in and around every physician's office in Craighead and Poinsett Counties, around every patient's home, in both counties, be it a mansion or be it a hovel, if you only choose to find them. With America trusting us physicians to keep the faith with our boys "over there" and "down under," can we afford to give anything but our best?

Now you ask me, "Why, Doctor, are you telling us this high-school-commencement story?" In just a moment I hope to make my point. Recently in going through the pages of a current magazine, I saw the pictures of five American marines in a Jap concentration camp in Shanghai. I am passing this picture around and ask each of you to study it for a few moments. The Japs originally published this picture in one of their propaganda sheets and an American diplomat who was repatriated managed to smuggle it home. These men are Americans and most of them are not 30 years old in spite of their prison-camp beards and mustaches. "Smile! Look happy"—one can almost hear the Jap photographer hissing the commands. And this was their reply—those faces you see staring back proudly, defiantly and a little contemptuously. Those faces could be duplicated by Drs. Reagan, Rush Barrett, Berry, Farris, Blanton, Paul Stroud, Jo Pierce, Joe Verser, and other physicians who belong to this medical society and who are now in our armed forces scattered all over the globe. Gentlemen, we must keep faith with those faces that I showed you. The best way we can keep faith is to look after these soldier boys' loved ones back home whether it be a humble home or a mansion in Cash, Jonesboro, Tyronza, or anywhere else.

A few nights ago, after a hard downpour, someone tapped at my front door shortly after I had retired after a busy day's work. Some ragged, wet, and ignorant old man wanted me to go and see his wife whom he described as "mighty poorly." I almost refused the poor and penniless old man. My weary bones and the warm bed cried loudly against the trip. The long trip, the bad roads, the wet, cold weather, each loomed up in my mind as obstacles too serious to tackle that night. But the pitiful tone of his voice,

"Doctor, she is mighty poorly," overcame the temporary surrender to ease and rest and I grudgingly went. After sometime I got to a hut that would have shamed almost an animal and rendered medical services to the best of my ability and before starting on the arduous return trip I struck up a conversation with the patient. I learned that this old lady who almost failed to get a physician to treat her for a case of pneumonia brought on by exposure had lost one son in action on the Solomons and another son was reported as missing following the fall of Corregidor and is probably in a Jap prison camp. Gentlemen, this old woman has never been presented with a bill for that night's services, nor will she be.

"He has not served who gathers gold,
Nor has he served whose life is told
In selfish battles he has won
Or deeds of skill that he has done.
But he has served who now and then
Has helped along his fellowmen."

Dodging the Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Minneapolis Morning Tribune of May 11, 1944:

DODGING THE ISSUE

While the action of the Government in restoring the Montgomery Ward plant to the management may, in a technical sense, have reduced the issue to a moot case, thus absolving Judge Holly from the necessity of rendering a decision, the public will hardly be in doubt as to the Government's unwillingness to submit the legality of its action to a court determination. In simple terms the Government has, for a second time in the Ward case, dodged the issue.

The fundamental issue raised in the Ward case had to do with the legal status of the War Labor Board, and a decision on that point the Government is apparently determined to avoid. Ward's previously challenged the legal right of the board to enforce certain orders, contending that the orders did not have the force of law. Ward's took the matter into court, but the War Labor Board, anticipating the current actics of Mr. Biddle, avoided a ruling on the legality of its orders and asked for a dismissal on the grounds that it was only functioning in an advisory capacity On this plea the case was dismissed without a decision. Another moot case. It was in the face of this admission that the President ordered the Army to take over the Ward plant.

In view of these two "duckings" on the part of the Government, no other conclusion can be reached than that the Government has not sufficient confidence in the legality of its acts to submit a determination of them to the courts. This is as unfortunate as it is undignified. Attorney General Biddle in his arguments before Judge Holly seeking a temporary injunction made several assertions, which to say the least are disturbing and which betray that the Government holds certain concepts of the law and the Constitution that are at least novel. His ideas of the vastness and vagueness of the Presidential powers under the Constitution must have astounded many persons versed in the law, and his broad intimation that the courts should not presume to pass on them, must have been somewhat shocking to those who have some knowledge of the theory of our Government.

His further contention that there is nothing in the labor disputes act which expressly forbade the President taking over the Ward plant is one that needs court approval. If the President may do anything that he is not expressly forbidden to do we are operating under a hitherto unsuspected principle of law and one of enough importance to have its constitutional validity quickly established.

Therefore, Mr. Avery's announcement that he will not sign the contract ordered by the War Labor Board is to be commended, as it may bring the issue into the courts in a manner that may make further "ducking" impractical. If the War Labor Board's orders have the force of law, let us know it. If the President has the legal right to take over from the management any business he may see fit, let us have it set down plainly in a court decision. If "no business or property is immune from Presidential order" and "particularly in time of war the court should not substitute its opinion for that of the Executive" as the Attorney General maintained, let us have it down in black and white so that there may be no future confusion about the matter, no further need for calling out troops, and the physica' eviction of citizens from their property.

Obviously the vote of the employees of Ward's has nothing to do with the major questions involved. No more has Avery's resistance to the closed shop. Whether the Government can exercise all the powers not expressly forbidden or whether it may only exercise those powers expressly given to it by the people, is a matter that transcends in importance any clause in a labor contract.

Termination of War Contracts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include the following speech made by me to the Kiwanis Club of Birmingham, Ala., on April 18, 1944:

Our first job is to win the war. But following that the most important of all problems to be faced by a victorious America is the termination of war contracts and the disposal of surplus property. In many ways this task of reconverting private industry to a peacetime basis is going to be more difficult and more vexing that was the job of converting that industry to war. Disposal of surplus property is a subject calling for much thought, but today I propose to discuss the other phase—the termination of war contracts and the settlement of them.

This subject does not sound very glamorous. It certainly would never be selected as the subject of an oration nor used for the purpose of spellbinding an audience. It perhaps is not of particular interest to many of you. But the problem which it poses is one of great concern to all of us, for upon its solution may depend whether we are to have prosperity or deep depression after this war is over.

Today 60 percent of the Nation's productive capacity is engaged in making war goods. A great part of this has been converted from one type of production to another necessitating the change in varying degree of machines, tools, and equipment. Many plants do not have in them today a single machine that can be used by them in peacetime production. The machines they had in their plants have been scattered to all parts of the world. To get back into civilian production those plants will have to reequip themselves with machines and with tools. Not so long ago I had the privilege of going through the Packard Motor Car Co. plant in Detroit. Mr. Marks, vice president of that company, stated that there were 8,500 pieces of machinery in that one plant which are not useful in automobile production and that the displaced automobile manufacturing machines had been widely scattered. He stated that if the war contracts should be terminated evenly when the job is done without their being dragged out and terminated gradually and if permission should be given to remove at once those 8,500 machines and the unfinished work and materials, then his company could be back at the job of building cars in 6 months' time. The case of this company is probably an average typical case. At our best we are going to have a break in the continuity of production with its inevitable accompanying unemployment.

Not only are most private war plants cluttered up with machines and tools that do not belong to them and cannot be profitably used by them in peacetime production but all of them on that day when their contracts are terminated are going to be literally filled with work in process—in all stages of completion—and with materials. In nearly every instance the work in process will be absolutely without value to either the producer or the Government, and in most cases the materials will be without value to the producer because he is making for war a product entirely different from what he will make for peace. It is highly important that this unfinished work and these materials as well as the machines and tools be moved out of the plant as quickly as possible, for that plant can do no converting until it has its floor space and bins clear.

Another problem common to all war contractors and important in varying degrees to all alike is that of financing from the time the stop order is given until there has been a complete and final settlement. Our job is to see that every plant start readying itself for resumption of normal peacetime production at the earliest possible moment. Most companies cannot do this alone while money due from the Government is withheld pending final settlement. Particularly is this true with the smaller plants and the thousands of subcontractors who may have commitments of many times their capital worth.

The job of terminating contracts at the end of this year will be a tremendous one. We remember something about that following the last war. This one will be 10 or 12 times bigger than that. When the guns stopped firing November 11, 1918, the Government suspended approximately 27,000 prime contracts valued at nearly $5,000,000,000. Today the War Department alone—just one of several procurement agencies—has approximately 110,000 prime contracts for war production and well over 2,000,000 subcontracts. Most likely the value of the unfinished contracts of all war procurement agencies at the end of this war will be nearly $100,000,000,000.

The sudden stopping of the wheels of production in such magnitude is bound to be a terrible shock to our economic structure. We must do everything we can to lighten and to cushion that shock. The essentials for doing this were recently stated by Col. D. N. Hauseman, formerly stationed here, an officer whom many of you know and who is now serving as director of the division in the War Department to terminate and settle war contracts. He named three general principles to be kept in mind. I quote:

"1. We believe that contractors' claims must be settled quickly with equal justice to the contractor, the Government and the public. Speed is of the essence here. Otherwise, we invite unemployment, frozen business, and inflation.

"2. In order to give industry a hard and fast title to the reimbursement paid it by the Government, the settlements must be final, and not subject to reopening except, of course, for fraud.

"3. Adequate means are necessary for financing the contractor by partial or advance payments or loans, over the rough period between termination and final settlement."

Fortunately this tremendous task is not to be thrust upon us all at once without a previous opportunity to try our hand. Because of the fluidity of the war and the necessity for changing weapons and fighting equipment many contracts are being terminated as we go along and new ones being substituted. Up to March 1 of this year the War Department alone had terminated or cut back 19,500 prime contracts. Of these 14,000 having an unfinished value of $3,900,000,000 have been settled. The amount spent in settlement was $85,000,000.

Contractors are presenting claims for settlement amounting to approximately $20,000,000 a month. In February of this year the War Department paid off claims amounting to $22,000,000, which indicates that it is catching up on the backlog of its claims. So far it has been settling cases and paying off claims at about 75 percent of the amount asked. It is felt that the 25-percent difference is due in some degree to the fact that contractors are not yet sufficiently familiar with the proper methods of preparing and presenting their claims.

The rate of settlement is also interesting inasmuch as the War Department has reduced the average time for settling claims of $10,000 or over from 8 months last fall to 6½ months this spring.

As to the War Department, it wishes to impress on the contractors that a great deal of delay is due to the fact that War contractors do not sumbit their claims speedily, in proper form and often not at all. For example, it already has on its books over 200 terminated contracts 6 months old or older which, of course, the Government can do nothing about settling because the contractors in these 200 cases have submitted no claims at all.

It was my privilege a few months ago to go as chairman of a group from the House Committee on Military Affairs to Chicago and spend 2 days in watching the War Department at work in the actual termination of contracts. We were all impressed with the thoroughness and fairness with which the job was being done. To us the need for negotiation, if there is to be speed, became apparent. It is a process of give and take and open discussion across the conference table.

One thing, I believe, that most people do not understand is that the negotiations are not conducted by a single individual. On the contrary, they are handled by an organization under a commanding officer usually of high rank and long experience. There is a staff of specialists, the number dependent upon the size and complexity of the contract that is being terminated. There are negotiators, accountants, engineers, legal, fiscal, and technical personnel, all of whom participate in the negotiations and are consulted when their assistance may be helpful.

The negotiations are conducted in accordance with comprehensive procedures established by whatever procurement agency has jurisdiction over that particular contract. My observation has been principally of War Department contracts and, therefore, I shall confine my remarks to such contracts. The War Department establishes the necessary procedures to insure that the Government's interests are fully protected and that the contractors' settlement proposals are adequately investigated and analyzed. In his testimony before our committee Under Secretary of War Patterson outlined the procedure as follows:

"The contractor is first required to submit a detailed inventory of work in process and materials and a sworn proposal for settlement of the amount due therefor, supported by adequate cost schedules. The inventories of property are studied by competent Government engineering, salvage, and other technical personnel. Then the property is either disposed of or retained by the contractor on terms approved by the Government, or it is transferred to the Government. The proceeds of any sale are credited or paid to the Government. The cost records of the contractor and his proposal for settlement are checked in substantially all cases by Government accounting personnel. This check ranges from an office review to a detailed audit, depending on the circumstances of each case. In practice the scope of the accounting and audit to be done in each case is determined by trained accounting personnel. To economize in the use of personnel and because of the necessity for speed, the principles of selective accounting analysis (or spot check) are employed wherever possible; the primary object is to test the reliability, general fairness, and reasonableness of the contractor's figures. In cases of apparent fraud or attempts to overreach the Government, intensive audit procedures are employed. In the check by the Government full use is required to be made of any information about the contractor's accounting methods and business, obtained in statutory renegotiation proceedings and in the Government's files.

"By these methods, the negotiators for the Government have available reliable accounting data and other information on which to reach a fair settlement with the contractor. The settlements eventually reached thus reflect the deliberations and advice of many different Government representatives, each a specialist in some particular field. In addition, the conduct of the negotiations and the final agreement are under the supervision of special agencies created for this purpose. These include a fiscal representative, under a duty to report to the commanding officer whenever, in his opinion, settlements are being improperly handled or considered. For each termination settlement appropriate records are kept of all important steps in the negotiations and all important actions by the contracting officer in order to indicate the essential date on which the negotiations were based.

"These various measures are carefully designed to provide all necessary protection for the interests of the Government."

In the summer of 1943 the War Department proposed that our committee take action on legislation regarding the termination of contracts. We had rather lengthy hearings and finally reported out a bill, H. R. 3022. A few days before we took final action on this bill the Baruch-Hancock report was issued covering not only termination of contracts but all phases of demobilization. We felt, however, that the termination of contracts was the most urgent and that it would be best to limit legislative action at this time to that one place.

H. R. 3022 follows in general the Baruch-Hancock report, so far as the termination of contracts is concerned, with one important exception. Whereas the Baruch-Hancock report recommended that these contracts be settled by the various procurement agencies without the intervention of the General Accounting Office for a preaudit, the majority of the members present at the committee meeting when the bill was reported felt that the Comptroller General should be given power over such settlements. Several of us felt otherwise. We filed a report setting forth our supplementary views agreeing as to the need for legislation but disagreeing as to the Comptroller General's part in the settlements. Thirteen members, exactly one-half of our committee, signed this disagreement—six Democrats and seven Republicans. The chairman of the Military Affairs Committee has advised me that he plans to ask for a rule within the next few days. At his request before I left Washington, I wrote a letter to the chairman of the Rules Committee joining in the request for the rule in order that the matter might be freely debated on the floor of the House. It is our purpose, as we stated in our disagreeing views, to offer amendments on the floor of the House to exclude the Comptroller General from the controlling position in which the bill as reported places him.

Of course, the first inclination of everyone is to have a close audit of various Government transactions by some independent agency. The General Accounting Office was established by Congress for that purpose. However, it has long been understood that the Comptroller General has no control over the termination of contracts in the absence of fraud, except to see that the payments finally made are in accordance with the settlement agreed upon. The action of the committee in giving him veto power is vesting in him additional powers. Our amendment would take nothing away from him but simply prevent these additional powers from being given to him.

We feel that there are several objections to the movement to give the Comptroller General veto power. First, it is inconsistent with the type of settlements that we contend must be made, that is, negotiated settlements. Again, I quote Under Secretary of War Patterson in his statement before us regarding this:

"The principles which we believe must be adopted if the first great objective is to be attained are as follows:

"1. Termination adjustments must be effected by negotiated agreements.

"2. The negotiations must be final and not subject to reopening by any independent agency, except for fraud.

"3. The negotiations must be conducted by the procurement agencies. * * *

"Inevitably the amount fairly payable cannot be determined by mere addition or mathematics. There is no way to arrive automatically at a dollar figure solely by mechanical auditing or accounting procedures. Each of the many decisions regarding the determination and allocation of the various elements of cost under a particular contract involves the exercise of sound business judgment. Consequently these questions are subject to honest differences of opinion even between qualified experts. That is why these termination settlements can be handled in a satisfactory and prompt manner only by negotiation. It is the method which businessmen use to settle such questions of judgment under similar circumstances.

"Negotiation does not mean that settlements are made without proper information. On the contrary, this procedure still requires adequate data regarding the costs of the contractor in order to provide a sound basis for negotiation. But the amount of information needed and its detail and precision are of the sort which a businessman would require to satisfy himself that he had reached a fair settlement. In other words, the advantage of negotiation is that it permits these matters of judgment to be decided on the same practical basis on which commercial business is ordinarily conducted."

The second contention is that whereas time is of the essence in the settlement of these contracts, the Comptroller General's method would delay them for such a time as might prove disastrous to the national economy in stagnating production of peacetime goods and the employment of millions of returning servicemen and present war workers.

Even though our World War No. 1 experience was on a much smaller scale, yet many people can remember those settlements with much anguish when contemplating the present magnitude of war contracts.

Personally, I have always felt that people are inherently honest. Many tell us that we must include the General Accounting Office in order to prevent the Government's being defrauded of millions of dollars. I believe that most of the war contractors want to act honestly toward the Government and certainly that those in charge of negotiating these settlements, with their whole reputation a stake as well as their interest in the Government, will do their best to see that both the contractor and the Government are treated fairly. The General Accounting Office can certainly have no monopoly on honesty and integrity.

Furthermore, it was freely admitted before our committee that the General Accounting Office did not have a sufficient staff with which to do the job and that they would have to scour the land in search of accountants. They readily admitted that they would count on taking all of the workers that the War Department and other procurement agencies now have engaged in different activities and use them. I fail to see the force of the argument that the same people working for the War Department or some other procurement agency would be dishonest but would become honest and people of integrity immediately upon being switched to the General Accounting Office.

The property has to be sold in contract terminations. Buyers will not buy unless they can know the price with finality. If the price is subject to change 6 months later by a review board, prospective buyers will go elsewhere. Many contractors who finish their war production will have to reconvert their plants to reenter the peacetime market. They cannot and will not do this until they know finally where they stand, and how much of the money paid to them is theirs and how much the Government's. The bill in its present form does not make it clear how far prime contractors are to go in settling with their subcontractors. If this is to be done at all, a prime contractor may be able to get quick, final approval of a proposed subcontract settlement; otherwise he will let his subcontractors wait for their money until the board finishes with his case. Finality is just as important to contract termination as speed; and the system proposed by H. R. 3022 at present utterly fails to provide for it.

What I have said so far as to contract terminations relate particularly to those contracts that are to be terminated when the war ends. We must not forget that terminations are occurring now every day. It is at the present time a necessary part of war production.

It may not be generally realized how intimately contract termination is related to the continuing procurement of other needed war supplies. At the present time, when we are still facing the major battles of this war, the War Department has already terminated a larger face value of contracts than it canceled at the end of the last war. This has happened during a period when our production schedules are still rising, and is due to the fact that the shifting needs of war changed the character and quantities of supplies that have been needed. Canceled contracts were promptly replaced by others for different materials; and this process will doubtless continue until the war is over. The time and method of terminating such contracts, the speed of payment, and the interim financing to be given to the contractor, are all therefore closely bound up with his ability to continue in war production. To divide authority in this field between the General Accounting Office and the armed services who are responsible for war procurement is unwise and dangerous.

When peacetime comes, the need for a system which will operate quickly and smoothly is no less great if we are to avoid a major depression. At that time, the personnel of the procuring agencies will alone have the necessary experience and organization to do the job promptly and efficiently; and divided authority would be just as harmful then as during the war.

We have entrusted to the procuring agencies complete responsibility for the placement of contracts for war supplies. United States munition production has recently been running at a rate between five and six billion dollars per month. Expenditures for completed munitions of war will exceed by many times the amounts which will be involved in termination settlements. The termination of a procurement contract involves essentially the making of a new contract calling for a smaller quantity of the product and a lesser expenditure of money than the original agreement. Those whom we have trusted to do the larger job can certainly be trusted also with the smaller one.

The Mothers of Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the Mother's Day observance of Hose Co. No. 4, Harrisonburg Fire Department, Harrisonburg, Va., May 14, 1944:

In the midst of the most destructive war of history, we are gathered today in Harrisonburg to pay tribute and do honor to the mothers of men who, loving most, suffer most in time of war. While World War No. 2 was forced upon us by the ruthless dictators of Germany and Japan, we are fighting more than a defensive war. We are a part of a world revolution in which the democracies of the world are fighting not only for the temporary but for the permanent survival of the principles of personal liberty and self-government. If, from this struggle, a new world order dedicated to the principles of the Prince of Peace does not emerge, our sacrifices will have been in vain.

"I have lived, sir, a long time," said the venerable Franklin at the Philadelphia Constitutional Convention, "and the longer I live, the more convincing proofs I see of this truth—that God governs in the affairs of men. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without His aid?" In this hour of our Nation's peril the sacred fortress of prayer which rises, with unerring faith, from the hearts of the mothers of our land is our strongest bulwark. Who can prevail against a protective love so deep, so true that sacrifice and service are the breath of of its existence? What evil force can conquer a nation whose devoted mothers, from coast to coast, are banded together in one mighty army before the throne of Grace? Undaunted they stand, believing in the power of that Grace to save the sons and daughters they love and to grasp and preserve for them the glory of a world made finer and more beautiful by the tremendous price they have paid. Words are no antidote for the sorrow of those whose sons have made the supreme sacrifice. But may it be some consolation to them to know that of their boys we will say, as Pericles did of the young men of Athens:

"So they gave their bodies to the Commonwealth and received, each for his own memory, praise that will never die, and with it the grandest of all sepulchers, not that in which their mortal bones are laid but a home in the minds of men, where their glory remains fresh to stir to speech or action as the occasion comes by, for the whole earth is the sepulcher of famous men, and their story is not graven only on stone over their native earth but lives on far away, without visible symbol, woven into the stuff of other men's lives."

And when I repeat those words "woven into the stuff of other men's lives," I mean that through the travail of this war there will be firmly embedded in the minds and hearts of the American people the will for peace. Before victory is ours on the battlefield, it is unnecessary—indeed, it is undesirable—for us to attempt to blueprint our peace terms or our plans for a post-war world dedicated to a just and lasting peace. What is the meaning of democracy? What is the cost of war? What is the value of peace? "Whither wilt thou go?" For the determination of these fundamental issues there is no better time. Our Chinese Allies have a proverb which says, "A journey of a thousand miles is commenced with one step." Centuries have passed since the Lord said to Cain, "Where is Abel, thy brother?" Centuries have passed since the lowly Man of Galilee said, "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." Centuries have passed since the Roman Emperor Justinian gave to the civilized world a code of laws by which personal and property rights of the individual could be determined by a legally constituted tribunal, and not by the whim of some despot.

Centuries have passed since St. Paul claimed the highest privilege of a Roman citizen when he said to Festus, "I appeal unto Caesar." Progress made by the human race through those centuries toward a higher code of ethics and toward a better world has indeed been slow, and yet the fact that progress has been made cannot be denied. I welcome this opportunity to repudiate the false philosophy that, because the past has been characterized by recurring war among nations, it is useless to plan for a permanent peace. Now is the time for us and for every peace-loving nation in the world to commence the journey to that goal. Now is the time for the democratic nations of the world to plan not the terms of the next peace, not a hard peace or a soft peace, but an encirclement of the Axis Powers with an Allied cooperation for peace. Had General Patton recently said that it is the destiny of the United States, Great Britain, and Russia to unite in the post-war era for a permanent peace, instead of uniting to rule the world, he would have been praised and not condemned. It is not our destiny to rule any other nation nor any other part of the world. We are fighting for the privilege of ruling ourselves and of extending that privilege to all other nations. However, it is our destiny, it is our solemn duty and obligation, by precept and example, to lead the way to a peace that is just and a peace that is lasting. Another global war and civilization as we know it will perish from the earth. A selfish and materialistic spirit that whispered that we could live alone and die unto ourselves betrayed the veterans of World War No. 1. If we are to have a Christian civilization, in which the orderly and duly constituted processes of law are to be substituted for brute force, we and our democratic allies must have a Christian conception of justice.

"It must include," as Woodrow Wilson said in The Road Away From Revolution, "sympathy and helpfulness and a willingness to forego self-interest in order to promote the welfare, happiness, and contentment of others and of the community as a whole. This is what our age is blindly feeling after in its reaction against what it deems the too great selfishness of the capitalistic system."

Through the centuries brutal and selfish men have echoed the cynical answer of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" In this world conflict, on the battlefield and under the flying hoofs of the Four Horsemen, more than 20,000,000 men, women, and children have already perished, and our invasion of fortress Europe has not yet commenced. When the war drums throb no longer and the battle flags are furled in the parliament of man, the federation of the world, may the mothers of men be permitted on behalf of the nations of the world to give to the framers of the new peace their answer to Cain's question, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

Preventing Manufacturers From Being in the Retail Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, unless something is done to prevent it, a few large concerns will own practically all of the retail business within the next few years. I have a bill, H. R. 148, which is for the purpose of preventing the manufacturer from being in the retail business and vice versa. One of the principal means of monopoly is through the ownership of the different integrated units in distribution by one or a few concerns.

The following letter and statement to customers are self-explanatory:

VAN'S MARKETS,
Los Angeles, January 18, 1943.

Representative WRIGHT PATMAN,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Attached is a copy of a letter received by us from a manufacturer. I have also forwarded a copy to James Francis Byrnes, Director of Economic Stabilization, setting forth my opinion that were chain stores permitted to continue taking over the manufacture of commodities it would thereby take away the source of supply for independent merchants. Also the effect it would have today in driving the independents out of business, inasmuch as the source of supply is limited under the present conditions of war.

I have heard of your bill H. R. 148, and I believe this letter is a good specimen of support for your bill.

Yours very truly,

E. WEINSTEIN,
Manager, Van's Markets.

JELL-WELL DESSERT CO., LTD.,
Los Angeles, Calif., January 15, 1943.

To the Customers of the Jell-well Dessert Co., Ltd.:

After nearly 25 years as active head of the Jell-well Dessert Co., Ltd., and its predecessor corporations, during all of which period I have been its largest stockholder, it is with sincere regret that I am announcing my retirement from that business in order to devote my time and efforts to other pursuits that will permit me more leisure.

Although I am not going to bother you with a recitation of my personal reasons for this move, I might say here that my health and capacity to meet present problems have not been up to par since a heart attack nearly 3 years ago.

In arriving at this decision, I also took advantage of an opportunity to dispose of my entire financial interest as sole stockholder of the Jell-well Dessert Co., Ltd., and I want to let you know that I have sold all my stock in this company to the Safeway Stores, Inc.

As a result of this acquisition by the Safeway Stores, further sales to the outside trade will not be solicited; but Safeway has assured me that every effort will be made to see that unfilled orders received by us up to this time are delivered.

Finally, I want to take this opportunity to thank you all for the support you have given our product, especially those who have been on our list of customers and friends since the "red package" first appeared.

Sincerely yours,

A. H. LOEFFLER.

Rule by Whim and Wham

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Iron Age, of May 11, 1944:

RULE BY WHIM AND WHAM

"No business in this country is immune from seizure," says Attorney General Biddle, defending the New Deal's taking over of Montgomery Ward. Also, adds this eminent administration law twister: "Our courts should bow to the will of the President." The latter statement seems somewhat gratuitous considering the judicial hand-picking and hand-packing that have taken place in the last 10 years.

Mr. Biddle is hired to interpret the law and he certainly does a job that should please the boss. Whether or not it suits the little fellows who wear the barrels and who pay his salary through taxes is another question that will be determined, indirectly, on election day.

When Sewell Avery was carried out of his office by steel-helmeted storm troopers, something much more important went out of the door with them. Out of that door at the same time went the Bill of Rights and the Constitution of the United States, and through it, replacing them, stalked dictatorship. Dictatorship wearing the disguise of an attempt to protect and forward the war effort but actually a scurrilous and obsequious move to curry favor with and gain votes from a labor union which apparently has long had its headquarters in the White House.

There was no question in this case of damage to war production, for Montgomery Ward are distributors and, except for size, exactly like the general stores that you find throughout this country. And this company was continuing to do its normal business of distribution despite the fact that the New Deal, following its accepted practice of pressure, had applied the thumb screws of restricted postal service. The company merely insisted upon the American right of knowing with whom it was to do business before it signed a contract.

If Master Biddle's opinion becomes crystallized into precedent then these United States of ours are no longer governed by law and order but are to be ruled by whim and wham. And every proprietor or manager of any enterprise whatever, from the largest corporation to the smallest store or farm, will have good reason to listen for and to dread the approaching footsteps of a new and un-American Gestapo with the power to accuse, to try, to condemn, and to execute.

One hundred and sixty-nine years ago, Americans at the historic Boston Tea Party rejected the dogma that "the king can do no wrong." They thought and we did too that they had scotched this snake, but serpents have a way of coming to life again and this one is now showing its fangs once more.

Our forefathers then had no Congress to represent and protect them. We have, and it is about all of the protection that remains for liberty in this country. It is now time for Congress to act for the safety of our people and the safeguarding of the liberty for which our sons and brothers are dying.

Justice Is Blind and Sometimes Dumb

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, sometimes the courts move in mysterious ways their wonders to perform. We have all heard of the cow that gave a pail of rich sweet milk and then kicked the pail over and spilled all the milk. It was a queer quirk of the law and the laws enforcement that destroyed 2,700 jars of perfectly good peanut butter, because after shipping them across the continent their contents was a fraction of an ounce underweight. Destroyed at time of food shortage when most of us are going without real butter at a time when the august Senate restaurant has replaced real butter with tiny portions of peanut butter.

We know what is done with contraband liquor by the courts—sometimes. But to burn up perfectly good peanut butter by court order in wartime! What could our boys do with these jars of goodies among the starving population of Europe? No wonder the Lions Club of Idaho Falls is indignant as expressed in the following resolution:

Whereas on April 22, 1944, at Idaho Falls, Idaho, the Federal Government destroyed by fire a large quantity of peanut butter, approximately 2,700 bottles, on the grounds of being slightly underweight; and

Whereas the said peanut butter was nutritious and palatable, high in protein and fat values; and

Whereas this butter could have been used in these days of scarcity to feed starving allies, undernourished children, and the poor and needy through benevolent agencies near at hand; and

Whereas the said Government is working on food rationing, equal distribution of foods, conservation of foods, fats, and all things necessary in a united war effort; and

Whereas the times forbid such wanton and unwarranted acts on the part of our Federal agencies: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Idaho Falls Lions Club, That it condemns such wanton and unwarranted destruction of such valuable foods, as aforesaid, and condemns the destruction of any useful commodities that can be used for human sustenance, or that can help in any way the termination of this deadly war; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this club; that a copy be mailed to each of the Idaho Congressmen; that a copy be mailed to District Attorney J. A. Carver, and a copy to Judge Chase A. Clark, Federal officials of Idaho.

Done and passed at Idaho Falls, Idaho, this 27th day of April 1944.

Great Britain Endorses Four Freedoms of the Air

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LYLE H. BOREN
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, international aviation in the post-war world has been the subject of keen interest and discussion in all Allied Nations during recent months. Lord Beaverbrook, who has been designated by Prime Minister Churchill to form a post-war aviation program for the British Empire, addressed the House of Lords on this subject on May 10. I believe his remarks to be most interesting and informative and I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House the following excerpts from the Associated Press account of this speech which appeared in the New York Times of May 11, 1944:

Great Britain "reluctantly" has abandoned a Canada-backed post-war plan for central international control of civil aviation and has turned toward the American-sponsored idea of a "four freedoms of the air," Lord Beaverbrook announced in the House of Lords today.

* * * Britain had at first favored the Canadian plan, with its system of allocated quotas, but had turned to the American plan following United States opposition to the Canadian proposal.

The American plan * * * was based more along the lines of the four freedoms of the air—the right to fly, to land, to set down passengers, mail and cargo, and to pick them up anywhere in the world. * * *

This program (Canadian), Lord Beaverbrook continued, was considered by the Americans as too rigid as a basis for talks at the proposed international conference.

This conference will be held later this year, probably at Washington.

The broad purpose, Lord Beaverbrook explained, will be to draw up an international convention on air navigation to be supplemented by an international transport organization which would evolve standards, seek to eliminate uneconomic competition, work out for each nation a network of participation in world transport, and maintain a broad equilibrium between air transport capacity and transport offerings.

* * * Nothing that President Roosevelt had proposed for the future the right of innocent passage for all nations and the right to land anywhere, Lord Beaverbrook said he was authorized by Mr. Churchill to say: "We are joined with Mr. Roosevelt to the fullest extent in subscribing to these principles."

Lord Beaverbrook declared that the United States was prepared to make long-range aircraft available to Great Britain on a nondiscriminatory basis for civil aviation during the post-war period of adjustment of British plane production.

George Washington, Our First President, Realized Situation That Might Require a President To Serve Longer Than Two Terms or Even Longer than Three Terms in Great Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WRIGHT PATMAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, much has been said about our first President saying that no person should serve longer than two terms or by his actions indicating that a President should not serve longer than two terms. Let us refer to his own serious and thoughtful words written in a letter to Lafayette on April 28, 1788:

As for instance on the ineligibility of the same person for President, after he should have served a certain course of years, I confess I differ widely myself from Mr. Jefferson and you as to the necessity or expedience of rotation in that appointment. There cannot, in my opinion, be the least danger that the President will, by any intrigue, ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less perpetuate himself in it. Under an extended view of part of this subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the service of any man, who, in some great emergency, shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public.

This was the final judgment of the Father of his Country. This was the judgment that prevailed among the fathers when they established our Constitution. Purposely they did not place in that Constitution any restriction on the number of times a man might serve his country in the office of President. It is as if they foresaw just such an emergency that the Nation faces today—a crisis that calls for the man who has guided us through one great era of peril and now, with calm wisdom and a knowledge of international affairs not matched by any other leader in the world, is safely guiding us through another.

Plan for a Netherlands Commonwealth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include a letter which I wrote to a constituent on the plan for a Netherlands Commonwealth:

MAY 15, 1944.

MRS. HELEN WILSHIRE,
Greenwich, Conn.

DEAR MRS. WILSHIRE: I am delighted to answer to the best of my knowledge the questions which you raised on May 10 on the plan for a Netherlands Commonwealth.

You ask first if I believe the Dutch are "on the level" with this plan, which was described in the clipping you enclosed from the New York Times. I sincerely believe that they are. However, I think the best way to answer your question is to review briefly the history and progress of the Netherlands Commonwealth plan.

Among the empires of Europe the Netherlands has always led in the progressive and generous treatment of colonial peoples. Its record in this respect has not been without scars and blemishes, but the Dutch have in recent years tried hard and, to a great degree, succeeded in a program of thoughtful, enlightened, and benevolent imperialism.

They have introduced in their territories in the South Pacific modern ideas of sanitation and health and they have given the native peoples a chance for at least limited civic, conomic, and educational advancement. Moreover, they have at all times studied and tried to understand the people they sought to rule.

Plainly, the next step in such a progressive attitude toward overseas territories is the granting of freedom or at least some form of autonomy to the inhabitants of these lands.

This step the Dutch have been considering for some time now, in fact, even before the invasion of the Netherlands East Indies. On December 6, 1942, the first anniversary of the Netherlands' declaration of war on Japan, Queen Wilhelmina said in a broadcast from London:

"I am convinced, and history as well as reports from the occupied territories confirm me in this, that after the war it will be possible to reconstruct the Kingdom on the solid foundation of complete partnership, which will mean the consummation of all that has been developed in the past. I know that no political unity nor national cohesion can continue to exist which are not supported by the voluntary acceptance and the faith of the great majority of the citizenry.

"I visualize, wihout anticipating the recommendation of the future conference (of representatives of all parts of the Netherlands Kingdom), that they will be directed toward a commonwealth in which the Netherlands, Indonesia, Surinam, and Curacao will participate, with complete self-reliance and freedom of conduct for each part regarding its internal affairs, but with the readiness to render mutual assistance."

As the clipping which you sent to me showed, the latest development in this plan for a Netherlands Commonwealth took place recently in Curacao, one of Holland's Caribbean possessions, when the Governor, Dr. Piet Kasteel, introduced in the legislature a plan to decentralize the governments of the six islands of the Netherlands West Indies group. Under this plan, each island is to have its own insular administration, headed by a lieutenant governor and operating on a democratic basis.

Presumably, when war conditions permit, Surinam, the Netherlands colony on the mainland of South America, and the Netherlands East Indies, now almost entirely occupied by the Japanese, will start considering their part in the Commonwealth structure.

Now the point of all this is that little Holland is almost wholly dependent economically on its vast overseas empire, which is fabulously rich in bauxite, tin, oil, rubber, and quinine. The overseas empire of the Netherlands, it must be remember, is 65 times larger in area than the mother country and has eight times as many inhabitants. Yet the Netherlands Government in exile dares now, when there is so much talk of freedom for men of all colors and races, to grant autonomy to the brown people of Indonesia and the black and red and white people of the West Indies and Surinam. Only an empire supremely confident of the good will of its overseas subjects and earnestly concerned with its democratic responsibilities would attempt such a radical departure from the traditional policies of imperialism.

If the Netherlands carries through its announced policy, and there is every indication that it will, if the East and West Indies are granted autonomy in fact as well as in name, we may well be entering a new era of advanced thinking toward colonial peoples. The white man may at last be willing to law down his burden—which always consisted chiefly of loot from the natives and their territory—and extend to the people of Asia and other colonial regions a helping hand.

The people of the entire world, especially those who have long realized that freedom is not peculiarly the prerogative of the white race, will watch this venture of the Dutch with the greatest interest and the highest hope.

Americans would do well to remember, too, that on St. Eustatius in the Netherlands West Indies on November 16, 1776, the American flag was first saluted by a foreign power. The Dutch in 1776 honored our struggle for freedom and expressed confidence in the outcome. Now the Dutch are engaged with us in a war for freedom and may well also be working out a plan of colonial government which will be as inspiring to the world in this generation as our own Constitution was to the thinking of men on the national level in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. This is an opportunity for us, after 177 years, to return that salute.

Sincerely,

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by Horace C. Carlisle:

MOTHER

No matter where my steps may roam,
To this place or the other,
I think sweet thoughts of home, sweet home,
And my dear, darling mother,
Whose tender, soft, consoling voice
Once made my infant heart rejoice.

Each sunken furrow in her face,
That's daily deeper growing,
Was plowed to fit her for that place
To which she's some day going—
My evil ways helped guide the plow
That cut the furrows in her brow.

Her fading eye with age now dim
Is still a gem of beauty,
Her broken voice, a hallowed hymn
Of love and hope and duty,
Whose tender sweetness, soft and clear,
Is music always to my ear.

Her hand, one time so smooth and white,
Is now engloved in wrinkles,
Her hair, once dark, is growing light
With age's silver sprinkles—
Yes, many a shining, silver thread
Now beautifies her sacred head.

She taught me in my tender youth
To know and do my duty—
To live for peace and right and truth,
That life might beam with beauty—
If I had lived like mother taught,
My life would be more as it ought.

May her declining days be sweet—
Be free from anxious sorrow—
The rest she craves can't be complete
Till she, some sweet tomorrow,
Shall lay her weary body down,
To sleep till called to wear her crown.

O God, select, Thyself, the spot
Where soon must lie my mother,
And plant Thou one forget-me-not,
And let me plant another—
And let them, till the Judgment, be
A covenant 'twixt Thee and me.

M-an knows, though he has many a friend,
O-f this sort or the other,
T-here's one on whom he can depend—
H-is best friend is his mother—
E-'n when all others prove untrue,
R-eligiously, she sees him through.

Federal Aid for Readjustment in Civilian Life of Veterans of World War No. 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAY LeFEVRE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. LEFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, we have now had 2 days of discussion on the bill, (S. 1767) to provide Federal Government aid for the readjustment in civilian life of returning World War No. 2 veterans, and I do not believe I have ever seen more interest shown by the Members of this body on any former legislation. This shows that every Representative is extremely interested in our fighting men and all those boys and girls who are sacrificing their all for the freedoms and liberties we have always enjoyed in this Nation of ours. It was my good fortune to be able to see the picture shown by the courtesy of the House Military Affairs Committee, the Battle for New Britain. This brought right home to me what agonies our soldiers are going through. No one had a soft job or a "gold brick" in that encounter and that portrayed just one of hundreds of similar campaigns on the many war fronts.

Therefore, I want to congratulate the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation at this time for presenting us with a bill that seems to cover the problems that will face our returning soldiers about as near being perfect as is humanly possible. The committee gave every phase of this bill long and arduous study, and when the bill is finally adopted, with certain amendments offered and considered, I firmly believe it will be the best veterans' legislation passed by any former Congress or any other nation in the war. I am in full accord with each phase of the bill which covers the following provisions dealing with the veterans' civilian life after the war:

Title I: Hospitalization, claims and procedures.

Title II: Education of veterans.

Title III: Loans for the purchase or construction of homes, farms, and business property.

Title IV: Employment of veterans.

Title V: Readjustment allowances for former members of the armed forces who are unemployed.

Title VI: General administrative and penal provisions.

From the above I think all will agree that the needs of our returning veterans are amply covered. This bill is so written that the Veterans' Administration works in conjunction with the States on education, giving as little control as possible to our Government in Washington and as much control as possible to the States for the efficient effective administration of the law.

The enactment of this legislation should, first of all, take care of those disabled veterans, who well deserve the best attention possible and next deals with those able to go on from where they left off, prior to entering the service, properly rehabilitated, so America may live and our Constitution be preserved.

British Air Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYLE H. BOREN

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include the following interesting and timely news story which appeared in the New York Times of May 12 on the subject of Britain's air policy and the use of the Western Hemisphere air bases in the post-war era.

BEAVERBROOK SEES AIR-BASE CONTROL—SAYS UNITED STATES GOT LEASES ONLY FOR MILITARY PURPOSES

LONDON, May 11.—Western Hemisphere bases, leased by Britain to the United States in exchange for 50 American destroyers, were leased only for military purposes and may not be used for civil aviation without British consent, Lord Beaverbrook told the House of Lords today.

Lord Beaverbrook, in the second day of debate on civil aviation, assured the peers that Britain would receive fair treatment from the United States because Adolf Berle, Assistant Secretary of State, who recently discussed the subject with British authorities, "is a man we can trust and depend on with assurance he is going to give us a square deal."

Lord Winster asked if Britain should pay for the transport planes that Lord Beaverbrook said yesterday America would furnish Britain after the war until British production was resumed.

"I don't know," Lord Beaverbrook replied. "The Americans are treating us very well. We should be well treated."

Referring to post-war air basis, Lord Beaverbrook said that if Britain "is successful" at the planned international air conference an international authority would control use of the bases leased to the United States for military purposes.

The question of air and ocean traffic to South America was interwoven in the debate regarding the choice of the British Overseas Airways Corporation as the Government's "chosen instrument." Lord Winster said a group of five British shipping companies was "only awaiting the word to go" on an air line to South America, and he asked the Government's intentions.

Lord Beaverbrook replied that it was time for the shipping companies and railroads to come to the Government with their proposals "instead of asking the Government what is to be done about the Overseas Airways Corporation."

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, May 11.—The United States has accepted as a basis for negotiation the subcommittee report on international control of civil aviation that resulted from the British Commonwealth conversations, it was revealed today. Lord Beaverbrook, writing to Hon. C. D. Home, Canadian Minister of Munitions, made this statement in a letter of April 26. They were agreed on the principle of colonial cabotage (coastal traffic); that is, a nation had rights of cabotage on all air lines and within its colonies and dependencies, the letter said.

Declaration of Citizens of Wichita, Kans.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent heretofore granted me, I am inserting in the RECORD a declaration of a group of responsible citizens of Wichita, Kans., who are organized under the title of the "Town Hall Committee." Their declaration speaks for itself.

Whereas a state of extreme crisis is recognized to exist in the affairs of this Nation; and

Whereas this Nation was founded upon the principles of liberty, equality, and justice among all men; and

Whereas, through the experience of more than a century and a half, we have found these principles to be good, to wit:

We are now engaged in fighting a war for the survival of freemen on this earth, the importance of which cannot be too greatly emphasized by any man. Our efforts and the lives of those given in our behalf would, indeed, have been futilely spent if we were to win the military victory, yet lose the purpose of our fight.

Liberty (or freedom) is all things to all men who would neither deny it to nor restrain it from others. Its source is God, not governments or other men—a thing of the spirit, the mind, and the heart. All history has proven that its possession is retained only by those who would have the courage and faith to use and defend it at all times against all enemies.

The real strength of this Nation from the days of its birth and through all its history has had its source in one simple thing—the liberty of its people. Knowing that our great strength is the liberty of our people, we cannot now afford its loss, lest both we and liberty perish.

The only true and imperishable unity of our people lies in their common devotion to individual freedom. Today, as never before, this unity is needed, that we as a people shall live again in safety and happiness.

The proof of what freemen can accomplish in competition with all others in all fields of human endeavor needs no recounting. Our Nation, but ours alone, is the shining example through the ages.

For the past several years the people and their various governmental agents have been experimenting with our Government in attempts to alter both its form and substance, thereby creating and spreading confusion, unrest, and disunity throughout the land. This procedure should now be ended. We should now return to the basic laws and precepts of our Constitution. So many of us, so many times during recent years, have avowed our devotion to democracy, forgetting that our Nation is a republic—forgetting that no majority (nor minority) rules us, but rather that law governs us—that this law—the Constitution—must continue to govern us if we are to retain the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

If we would be true to our God and country, our methods—both in peace and in war—must be those of free people. We shall need to practice freedom while we fight for it, so that in the end, when peace comes, we shall not have forgotten.

Therefore, in the exercise of those natural rights of freemen, retained by the people of the United States as set forth in our Constitution, we, the undersigned citizens of Wichita, State of Kansas, and of the United States, alarmed by the continuous increase through recent years of powers exercised by the Federal Government over and upon the citizens of the United States, these same to such an extent as to make evident a design on the part of this Government to effect such control over the habits, the activities, and the lives of the people as to eventually render them incapable of retaining and exercising their God-given rights and liberties, do hereby make devotion to these principles and truths, and for the universal recognition and perpetuation of which, do pledge to ourselves and to each other, the use of our humble talents and efforts to bring the facts of this condition to the conscious and active attention of our fellow men, with the hope and prayer that prudence will determine and guide the actions of all to the end that the people of these States shall return to themselves and their local governments those powers and rights which have been usurped from them by the Federal Government at Washington, D. C., in violation of the spirit and letter of our Constitution.

Declaration of Town Hall Committee, of Wichita, Kans., signed by:

E. C. Moriarty, John A. Bowdish, John W. Harwood, Cecil A. Jordan, L. B. Brown, Jesse Vowel, C. E. Scrafford, Neil C. Kreeck, Edgar C. Stewart, Henry J. Allen, S. R. Hawes, H. C. Brady, Bill Hoke, Geo. N. Pottorff, H. M. Gillespie, Geo. E. Reeves, Earl K. Duke, A. M. Denny, R. E. Mannis, Jr., Louis E. Potucek, Geo. R. Temple, Charles S. Ritchie, Phil H. Manning, Fred Cochran, Jr., E. W. Pyle, Dr. Geo. G. Anderson, H. C. Yarnell, F. Paul Jernigan, C. J. Chandler, C. H. Cunningham, Emerson Dole, Edwin N. Carlson, N. E. Black, Wm. L. Handbook for Servicemen

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, in preparing House Document No. 285, first session, Seventy-eighth Congress, entitled "Handbook for Servicemen and Servicewomen of World War No. 2 and Their Dependents, Including Rights and Benefits of Veterans of World War No. 1 and Their Dependents," an effort was made to make it as complete as possible without making it too long. The section with reference to Servicemen's Dependents Allowance Act of 1942 includes most of the questions that are asked generally about the act. However, I have recently received an inquiry as follows:

May an enlisted man make a voluntary Class E allotment of pay in favor of a designated person, who is not dependent on nor related to such an enlisted man?

Title 10, article 895 of the Code of Laws of the United States, provides that an allotment of a serviceman's pay may be made for the support of his wife, child, or dependent relative or for such other purposes as the Secretary of War may deem proper.

Not being sure just what interpretation is being made by the Secretary of War on the part "or for such other purposes as the Secretary of War may deem proper," I asked the Secretary for his interpretation. Following is the information I have received from him:

Payments of allotments of pay to a person who is neither a relative nor a dependent of a man in service is considered to be outside the scope of the purpose of the administration of the allotment system by the War Department.

I am inserting this information in the RECORD at this time, thinking perhaps it will be helpful to Members who have had or will have this same inquiry.

An Excellent Choice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Daily Globe of May 11, 1944:

AN EXCELLENT CHOICE

The President's nomination of James V. Forrestal to succeed the late Frank Knox as Secretary of the Navy is certain to be a popular choice. It assures the mightiest fleet in the world a continuance of that capable direction through the Navy Department which the Nation's first defense received while Mr. Knox still lived. For, as Under Secretary, Mr. Forrestal was right-hand man to the late Secretary.

It is most heartening that the President boldly swept aside the normal considerations of party politics which would have had great weight in the selection of so important a Cabinet member in a campaign year under ordinary circumstances. The nomination of Mr. Forrestal gives recognition to a great ability and to loyal, highly competent service. His selection redounds to credit of the administration and gives new emphasis to the earnest concern of the Chief Executive in these dangerous times for first-rate talent.

The whole Nation extends its congratulations to the new Secretary and wishes him success in a task second to none in its importance at this hour of our country's history.

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over Station WNBF on May 13, 1944:

Dear friends of the Triple Cities and my Congressional District, so many affairs have come to my attention lately, I have not been given opportunity to review current activities of the Hall Furlough Clubs or do justice to the fine work of the patriotic women who are their members.

Of great interest to all concerned was the election of a new central council a few weeks ago to take charge of this entire section. Mrs. Dominick Virgilio, the enthusiastic president of Club No. 4, was designated as chairman of the council along with Mrs. June Phillips as vice chairman and Mrs. Mary Main, able president of Club No. 3 in West Endicott, as secretary-treasurer. Success to them.

Also of special interest was the formation last week of the seventh ward Hall Furlough Club. Everyone was pleased when Mrs. Reece de Vincentis was elected president, Mrs. Marie de John, vice president, Mrs. Joseph Pacth, secretary and Mrs. Anthony Di Mado.

The rest of my time this evening is going to be devoted to the folks of Johnson City, Westover, Endwell, Endicott, Vestal and the other places below Binghamton along the Susquehanna which are in the flood area. I'm going to read to you proceedings from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the flood control bill passed by the House this week.

The amendment which I presented and which the Congress accepted, provided for an extensive survey and examination of the Endicott-Vestal-Johnson City area of the Susquehanna River.

For the past few years, several flood-control organizations in these localities have called for action from the Army engineers. The Hall amendment assures such action and opens the way for substantial flood-control work at least after the war and possibly earlier.

Let me read to you from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 9, 1944 my remarks on this subject:

"The steps taken in flood-control work at that junction and in the Whitney Point Dam project did save the city of Binghamton itself from serious future flood ravages. Unfortunately, it did little or nothing for the municipalities of Johnson City, Endicott, and the village of Vestal, a few miles below, on the Susquehanna River. In fact, the construction of flood walls on the southern bank of the Susquehanna, in the city of Binghamton, may even have aggravated the situation farther down because as time passed, more and more sediment collected along the banks of the Susquehanna down near greater Endicott, and throughout the Vestal area.

Every year thousands of people are flooded out of the lowlands on each side of the Susquehanna as it courses down through Johnson City, Willow Point, Broad Acres, Vestal, and through the greater Endicott area. For this reason, I submit to the House that this job has been partly done. Nearly as many people are affected in these areas—and the distinguished Chairman is familiar with that section—as there are in the city of Binghamton. I hope the House will give serious consideration to further and additional flood-control work being done in the very near future by the Army engineers on those few miles beyond the confluence of the Chenango and the Susquehanna Rivers. Those people living in areas below the junction are just as much entitled to have their properties protected against floods as the good people in my own home city of Binghamton are. I am very happy about and satisfied with the work which the committee and the Army engineers have done in my home section. Nevertheless, I believe that the Army engineers owe it to the people of the municipalities farther down the river to see to it either that the river is dredged at Vestal and vicinity or that constructive and substantial flood walls are erected at these points so that floods will not in the future ravage and damage the properties of the people down there.

"I have appeared before the committee and I will say in all deference to the good chairman that he gave me a very sympathetic hearing. I have also talked with General Reber who at that time was in charge of the Army Engineer Corps. They have all been sympathetic with my proposal.

"If this amendment is adopted it will provide that those sections and those municipalities be added to the sections that have already been mentioned in this bill and that no steps can be taken until the provisions of this legislation I have applied to them, they to be subject also to such other legislation as should apply. Let me point out that no objections have been voiced by the Army engineers to this project so far as I know. Therefore, I hope the amendment will be adopted and I ask the favorable consideration of the committee."

The Late Honorable Lawrence Lewis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tribute to former Congressman Lawrence Lewis, of Colorado, by Gilbert H. Montague, of the New York bar:

CONGRESSMAN LAWRENCE LEWIS OF COLORADO

(A tribute by Gilbert H. Montague)

Lawrence Lewis, Member of Congress from March 1933 until his death in December 1943, was one of those Members of the House of Representatives who are seldom mentioned in the newspapers, but who devote themselves to arduous and self-effacing service in committees and in the routine of the House, with no expectation of personal fame or any other reward except the approval of their own consciences and the respect of their fellow Members in the House.

My friendship with Lewis began in Harvard College in 1899, when Lewis joined in the middle of the course the class that graduated in 1901. Only one who has done this can appreciate the handicaps of a boy entering unknown and 2 years late into a college class. Lewis came to Harvard because he sought the opportunity of inspiring contact with scholarship and tradition. He was discerning enough to see that if friendships came to him as a newcomer a little more slowly, there were meanwhile valuable lessons to be learned in patience, fortitude, self-reliance, character, and hard work without self-advertisement. These were the qualities by which Lewis made his way throughout life and in the House of Representatives.

Lewis' father and mother came to Pueblo, Colo., when he and his brother Hume were very young. The first boy Lewis met in Pueblo was Alva B. Adams, who later became United States Senator on the same day that Lewis entered the House of Representatives. Adams was several years older than Lewis, but they were together in grade school and high school, after which their paths separated until 1933, when they again came together in Congress.

Lewis worked and saved money and went to the University of Colorado, but after 2 years his money gave out, so he worked another year and saved enough to go to Harvard, from which he graduated in 1901. He then went to work on the Pueblo Chieftain, of which his brother Hume was managing editor. For 5 years Lewis worked on this newspaper, and for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., editing the company's publication, Camp and Plant, and writing articles on Colorado industrial and political subjects for various eastern newspapers and periodicals. In 1906 Lewis returned to Harvard and entered the law school, graduating in 1909. Meanwhile, he taught English composition as an assistant in the English department in Harvard College, and wrote articles for the Atlantic Monthly, World's Work, Travel Magazine, Harper's Weekly, Country Life in America, Outlook, Scientific American, and Engineering and Mining Journal. He also wrote a book entitled "The Advertisements of the Spectator" regarding the Eighteenth Century classic for which Addison and Steele wrote their famous essays. So outstanding was Lewis' study that in 1909 his book was published in America and England with an introductory note by George Lyman Kittredge, professor of English literature at Harvard for two generations, and one of the most distinguished literary scholars in the English-speaking world.

In 1909 Lewis settled in Denver, beginning in the law office of Edward C. Stimson. He opened his own office in 1913, and in 1928 he formed the law partnership of Lewis & Bond, which later became Lewis, Bond & Holland. From 1917 to 1918 he was member of the Civil Service Commission of Colorado by appointment of the Governor, and during World War No. 1 he was legal adviser of the adjutant general of Colorado, and associate legal adviser of the local and district selective-service boards. When the war ended he was attending the Field Artillery central offices training school at Camp Zachary Taylor in Kentucky.

When Lewis first settled in Denver, he became a precinct committeeman, the lowest rung of the political ladder, as he called it, and this he continued to be for many years. His first nomination for Congress in 1930 was unusual. The Denver congressional district had long been a Republican stronghold. While the 1930 Democratic National Congressional Convention was in session in Denver, Lewis happened to come into the hall as a visitor and was promptly drafted as the candidate. He was the only congressional candidate in Colorado in 1930 who publicly advocated drastic modification and even repeal of the prohibition amendment, to which from its inception he had been opposed on principle. His Republican opponent had been in office for 6 years and won in 1930 by 1,744 votes, but in 1932 Lewis defeated him by a plurality of 14,225. Lewis was reelected in 1934, 1936, 1938, 1940, and 1942, once winning a plurality of 40,759 that was almost 2 to 1, with substantial majorities in 372 of the 373 precincts comprising the Denver congressional district.

Writing to his Harvard class secretary Lewis said: "To the efficiency, loyalty, and forbearance of my partners, I am indebted for the opportunity of engaging in my present—probably temporary and doubtless professionally injudicious—excursion into the field of national politics. * * * In 1932, when I was elected to the Seventy-third Congress by over 14,000, I fully expected to be a 'one-term Congressman.' I anticipated that opposition, sufficient to defeat me, would be aroused among the numerous well-organized and militant minority groups, which cut across party lines and which are continually demanding things some of which, in the general public interest, they should not have—and would not get with my vote. So, I was astounded in 1934, when I was reelected by over 25,000."

In Lewis' first term he was member of the House Judiciary Committee, and was one of the House managers in the impeachment proceedings against Judge Harold Louderbach, of California. Early Lewis became assistant Democratic whip for the Rocky Mountain zone, acting under the direction of the House Democratic majority leader. From 1935 until the end, Lewis was a member of the Rules Committee. Most legislation, except revenue and appropriation bills, can be brought to vote in the House only by a rule, so that most legislation must be weighed by the Rules Committee before it comes to the floor of the House. Lewis' work in this committee was extraordinary. Unmarried, he repressed every personal and business and social interest that might subtract from the total devotion of all his time and thought and strength to congressional business. "Like most positions," said Lewis in a letter to his Harvard class secretary, "that of Congressman is largely what one makes of it. An immense amount of hard exacting work is involved, including much routine drudgery and many duties never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. Old-time Members say that, even during the World War, the pressure of work was nothing comparable to what it has been these last few anxious years. However, to one who tries to take his job but not himself seriously, it affords intense and vital interest and some opportunity for real service. All I can claim is that I have been trying to do the best I can."

Seats are not regularly assigned to Members in the House of Representatives as in the Senate, but for many years Lewis regularly occupied the front seat in the House, where he gave close attention and serious consideration to every Member who spoke. In his 10 years of service, until his health broke, he missed only 17 roll calls, from each of which he was excused because of official business.

"I doubt," said one of Lewis' colleagues, "if there is a Member of this House who worked harder on the legislation considered by this body than did Lawrence Lewis * * * there were few bills that were considered on the floor of this House that did not receive the closest scrutiny and study from this son of legislative toil. He regarded his duties here as a Representative of his people in this great legislative body as a high sense of trust. No legislation was treated lightly by him."

"I, too, know, as so many others have mentioned," said another of Lewis' associates, "of the long hours he spent and the midnight oil he burned, studying, planning, and thinking for the background of that official service which he gave as a Member while present in this Chamber. Many nights for several years I saw a light in his office when I left mine."

"He was opposed to anything that ever bordered on the demagogic," said another colleague. "He loved this country and he was concerned about these isms and doctrines and movements that apparently seemed determined to destroy our form of government."

"I knew years ago," said another associate, "that he had been overworking. * * * I have told him so and have remonstrated with him at times, but not with much effect * * * he kept on the job many more hours per day than most of us spend at our legislative tasks. He was one of the hardest-working Members of this body."

"I remember the day I arrived in Washington," said a Republican fellow Member. "Lawrence Lewis came to my office to greet me and made me feel at home. He told me that politics were largely forgotten after men were elected to Congress, and it then became our duty and privilege to work together side by side without regard to party affiliations."

"I know of no man with whom I have served here," said another associate, "whose nature was more gentle, whose attention to duty was more conscientious, and who was freer from criticism of his fellow men than Lawrence Lewis."

Lewis never obtruded his scholarly interests, but he never forgot them. He was secretary and a member of the board of directors of the State Historical Society of Colorado. He collected a great deal of material, apparently with a view to eventual publication, regarding the life and explorations of Lt. Zebulon Montgomery Pike, discoverer of Pikes Peak.

In some research for the Society years before he entered Congress, Lewis wrote to Dr. Herbert Putnam, Librarian of Congress, and was deeply impressed by Dr. Putnam's prompt and intelligent reply. Lewis was a Member of Congress when Dr. Putnam retired in 1939, and Lewis took this occasion to deliver on the floor of the House an outstanding literary address reviewing the growth of the Library of Congress during Dr. Putnam's 40 years' service as Librarian.

To Lewis' literary instincts, the House of Representatives and its Chamber, with all the history associated with them, made an irresistible appeal. To Lewis' sense of duty, the House of Representatives and its legislative processes, with all their opportunities for public service, were a veritable religion.

Prime Minister Winston Churchill proudly calls himself a "House of Commons man." Lawrence Lewis was truly a "House of Representatives man."

The House of Representatives has many moods. Sometimes it is placid, sometimes it is turbulent, sometimes it is tense, sometimes it is expansive. In September 1943, after many months' absence because of illness, Lewis entered the House one afternoon, and took his accustomed front seat. In affection and admiration for his courage the entire House rose and applauded him. Nothing in Lewis' whole life, probably, gave him deeper satisfaction than this moment. Several weeks later he was again absent because of illness, and then came the end on December 9, 1943.

The House of Representatives is never more impressive than when it is in a memorial session. As one Member after another rises to pay the last honors of the House to the departed Member, the Chamber takes on the beauty, dignity, and solemnity of a great cathedral. A House of Representatives man has gone to join—

"* * * the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence."

This was the tribute that the House paid to Lawrence Lewis on the afternoon of December 9, 1943. This was the only memorial he would have liked. To him the House was always hallowed ground. This was his cathedral.

"Speak no more of his renown,
Lay your earthly fancies down,
And in the vast cathedral leave him,
God accept him, Christ receive him!"

Comptroller General's Annual Report to Congress for the Fiscal Year Ending June 30, 1943

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, Admiral Land's review recently of so-called irregular practices discussed in the Comptroller's Report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, discloses how easily erroneous conclusions may be drawn from that report indicating that the Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration fail to cooperate with the General Accounting Office. The contrary is true. At times corrections are made subsequent to the expiration of the fiscal year in question, and such corrections do not find their way into the report.

This situation arose with reference to charge I, "Failure to account properly for receipts from revenue-producing activities such as housing, cafeterias, transportation facilities," and so forth.

Admiral Land says:

This charge we believe grows out of a complete misinterpretation by the Comptroller General's field staff of the character of the Commission's contracts and the relations between the Commission's prime contractor and his subcontractor, and overlooks certain provisions of the Merchant Marine Act with respect to the Commission's revolving construction fund.

The charge originally made was that the Commission was deliberately utilizing for its ship-construction program, funds which should have been covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and therefore defeating the will of Congress as expressed through its appropriations.

This matter was the subject of correspondence between the Comptroller General and our office during 1942 and 1943. In his communications of October 26, 1943, the Comptroller General departed from his original position, and then agreed with our view, that the Commission had the option of having these funds deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the revolving construction fund, and there to be available for expenditure by the Commission or that where the Commission deemed it advisable and more practicable from an administrative standpoint, it was in order for the Commission to approve of the application, by the contractor, of the receipts from the subcontractor operating the facilities in reduction of the reimbursable costs of the construction work involved.

This understanding was reached subsequent to the expiration of fiscal year 1943, and possibly the time lapse before the Comptroller General made his report to Congress was not sufficient to allow the correction on this point.

Charge 3:

Reimbursement of improper expenditures such as for lectures on human engineering, excessive rentals, bonuses to officials and employees, and the cost of yard publications.

On April 26, 1943, the Comptroller General was advised in a communication from this office that the reimbursements heretofore made by the Commission to three shipyards on the Gulf coast for the expenditures made by them covering the cost of "human engineering" lectures had been subsequently disallowed, and that the amounts that had been reimbursed to the contractors had been deducted on subsequent vouchers presented for payment. He was further advised prior to the end of the fiscal year 1943, that two other yards which had expended their funds for this purpose had not and would not obtain reimbursement for this expenditure from the Commission.

It is an accepted practice in industrial plants to spend considerable effort and time on matters affecting working conditions, health and sanitation for employees to insure the best results for all concerned, and while the theory back of the "human engineering" lectures appears to have been of considerable merit, the Commission auditors immediately raised the question of the excessive cost and its value when going over the accounts of a contractor, and noted it for disallowance. This particular item was pointed out to the General Accounting Office auditor by the Commission auditor in the field as evidence of the disallowances he was noting.

In connection with the charge of reimbursement of payment of improper bonuses to officials and employees we surmise, in the absence of direct reference, that this refers to payments that were made to officials and employees of a yard now devoted to naval work. The reimbursements in this particular case were subsequently adjusted on the basis of the control plan referred to in connection with the second charge and in no case did the final adjustment represent any exception from that plan.

Most of the shipbuilding contractors building ships for the Commission as well as hundreds of other business concerns, large and small, put out publications at regular intervals devoted to upbuilding the morale of their employees. Experience has shown that properly edited publications of this nature are of very considerable benefit.

Meetings have been held on numerous occasions with the editors of the yard publications of most of the shipbuilding contractors handling commission construction in order to produce efficient and economical handling of these publications. The necessity of keeping the reimbursable costs of these publications down to a reasonable figure has been repeatedly stressed by the commission and its representatives.

Our regional directors of construction and our regional auditors check these costs, and the publications are constantly under review here in Washington.

There are other items discussed in Admiral Land's letter including certain special reports which have been disposed of through the medium of Congressional investigations.

The report says that during the past year three special reports were submitted to the Congress involving excessive prices paid for vessels, as follows:

Five vessels were acquired from the Waterman Steamship Corporation at a cost of $1,995,602.68 in excess of the amount required to be paid for five similar vessels which the Commission had a contract right to acquire. (See H. Doc. No. 840, 77th Cong., 2d sess.) The Commission has since acquired the five vessels in accordance with the contract, but there remains for consideration the reasonableness of the prices paid for the five vessels acquired in Decmber 1941, reported to Congress in House Document No. 840.

The Waterman Steamship case was considered by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Report thereon was made on November 12, 1943, and is House Report No. 859, Seventy-eighth Congress. The case was satisfactorily disposed of subsequent to the Comptroller General's report as evidenced in a letter of December 16, 1943, from the Comptroller General to the War Shipping Administration, which appears at length in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page A570. In that letter, the Comptroller says to the War Shipping Administrator, after setting out the circumstances under which the charges are withdrawn:

Accordingly, you are advised that your understanding—that the charges originally raised against Waterman Steamship Corporation may be regarded as having been eliminated by subsequent developments—is correct.

Another case mentioned was the purchase of the President Roosevelt from the United States Lines was disposed of by the findings of the Congressional Committee on the Baltimore Mail case, which was submitted to the House on November 12, 1943, and is to be found in House Report No. 860, Seventy-eighth Congress.

The important points covered by the Comptroller General's report on the President Roosevelt were a comparison between the book value and the sale price and a discussion of the applicability of section 902 (a) of the Merchant Marine Act. The transaction referred to occurred on October 31, 1940. On pages 9 and 10 of the Baltimore Mail Report there is a discussion of the applicability of section 902 (a) to the transactions occurring before the President's proclamation of May 27, 1941, as well as a reference to "highly controversial factors" including book value, depreciated value, and market value.

Another case not mentioned in the Comptroller General's Annual Report but specifically reported to Congress was one involving the Tampa Shipbuilding Co., Inc., and Mr. George B. Howell, president of the company. That case was considered by the congressional committee and report made to the House on December 6, 1943, House Report No. 938, Seventy-eighth Congress.

Under date of December 18, 1943, the Comptroller General wrote the Tampa Shipbuilding Co., Inc., and Mr. George B. Howell, president of the company that the matter of indebtedness certified against each of them by the Comptroller General had been referred to the Department of Justice for appropriate action against each of them, and by letter of September 17, 1943, the Attorney General advised in substance that upon the basis of facts disclosed by the record and upon his analysis of the legal questions involved, he was of the opinion that there was no basis for bringing suit. Whereupon the Comptroller General advised the Tampa Shipbuilding Co., Inc., Tampa, Fla., and Mr. George B. Howell, president of the company, that by reason of the Attorney General's action in the matter, he had issued instructions directing the cancelation of the settlements previously made finding the indebtedness due and the matter will be considered as closed.

The Red Sea charters are still under study by a special subcommittee which is headed by the Honorable EDWARD J. HART, of New Jersey. A report is being prepared and will be submitted at an early date.

The Comptroller General's report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, and Admiral Land's review of irregular practices, have been referred to the general counsel of the committee for investigation with the request that the two papers may be studied and investigations made of all matters requiring investigation as it is desired that the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration follow proper regulations and practices in their business operations and their expenditures of public funds.

Comparison of Overseas Troop Movement in American Ships in World War No. 1 and World War No. 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein an article from Marine Age, April 1944, comparing overseas troop movements in American ships in World War No. 2 with similar movements in World War No. 1. It is gratifying to advocates of an American merchant marine to compare the results in this war with the work done in the last war.

When we consider those results and realize how our work in World War No. 2 surpassed our troop movements in World War No. 1, we learn how truly an American merchant marine is a guaranty not only of our Nation's safety but also of her peace. It is my solemn conviction, frequently expressed, that if our Nation in World War No. 1 and in World War No. 2 had been prepared with an adequate merchant marine, we would never have been drawn into our last two wars.

The article referred to by me is as follows:

OVERSEAS TROOP MOVEMENTS

America's passenger liners, converted into troop transports, have carried 70 to 75 percent of the 3,000,000 United States troops sent overseas in this war, Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell, Commanding General of the Army Service Forces informed the American Merchant Marine Institute April 2.

"This estimate reveals that a greater portion of American troops is being carried by American ships in this war than during the last war," General Somervell stated.

War Department statistics on the transportation of American troops in World War No. 1 show that only 45.8 percent of the A. E. F. was carried by vessels flying the American flag. British liners transported 51.9 percent with French and other foreign flag vessels carrying the remainder.

In a recent speech, General Somervell announced that 3,000,000 men had already been shipped overseas By July 1, 5,000,000 Americans will be overseas according to President Roosevelt.

On the basis of General Somervell's estimate, Frank J. Taylor, president of the Institute, pointed out that American liners have already carried overseas 2,100,000 American soldiers as compared to 987,736 Americans taken to France in World War No. 1.

"The Nation was fortunate that it had passenger liners that could be converted into troop transports," Mr. Taylor said. "A good many of them were taken over by the Government before Pearl Harbor and were ready when war came. Not only are our liners carrying more men than in the last war but they must travel greater distances. In the last war they operated a 3,000-mile shuttle service to France. In this war the battlefronts and various bases are on sea lanes that total 56,000 miles."

It Happened Right Here, or the Night After Christmas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LEMKE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a poem on farm conditions:

IT HAPPENED RIGHT HERE OR THE NIGHT AFTER CHRISTMAS

(By Dakota Cal, Minot, N. Dak.)

I met a queer old fellow in a dugout in the hills;
He'd fled the "great deliverance from economic ills";
Out 90 miles from nowhere, no one knew his age or name,
Where the buckbrush hid his cavern, on an old abandoned claim.
The wind was blowing wildly; it had just begun to storm,
And in desperation looking for a haven that was warm
I glimpsed him disappearing in a frantic sort of haste
As I scanned the landscape quickly, in its rolling desert waste.
I sneaked upon him quietly, this timid, furtive soul
Hiding in a scooped-out burrow, in the manner of a mole.
He cowered in his shelter, but I caught him e'er he fled,
Drew him out and learned the reason for the hermit's life he led;
In a voice half cracked from silence, in a rasping toneless wheeze,
And with halting words he told me what had caused his Q. E. D's.
I tell it as he told it; then, I thought him off his beam,
But I modify that verdict as I ponder o'er his theme.
Thus it ran:
"I farmed about a section, took all hurdles in my stride—
Ran my tractor through the pastures, pointed to my fields with pride—
But I found I couldn't lick 'em, they were always at my heels
With their planning and their theories, their regulating spiels.
I tried to do my business, but they thwarted every plan;
They roped me with their programs for regimented man.
Before that, I was raisin' grain, I'd bot myself machines,
And any time we had a rain, the dough was in my jeans;
Then came the drought, and round that bend, the agents came in flocks;
They told me what I had to spend, they damn near darned my socks.
They cut my wheat production down, and on it loaned me dough;
They called me weekly into town; at first I liked to go.
They took a mortgage on my plows, said when to ship my sheep,
Told where my cattle ought to browse, and where my dog should sleep;
They told me when my work was done, where I had made mistakes;
They supervised me on the run; they turned my fields to lakes.
They gave me aid I didn't need, and charged me up, for life;
They took their liens on next year's seed, they hypnotized my wife.
They dished out apples and relief, whenever I would groan;
They set up penalties for men who tried to stand alone.
And when I had learned to grow a crop the way they called the turn,
They switched the programs without stop and cash began to burn.
Three days in every week I spent, in town, preparing blanks
That went their way through every cent they got me, at the banks.
I asked them what I might not buy, and what I might not sell
If unadvised, I sold a pig, say brother, that was hell!
I used up tires and gasoline consulting them on means,
They gave me orders when to buy repairs for old machines.
I had to sign their slips before they countersigned my checks;
(My crop was reckoned now, no more in bushels, but in pecks.)
I had no time to watch the rains or work my well-known land;
I took the corners on their brains, on systems, they had planned.
They told me I should raise more stock, they engineered the sales
Our geese and turkeys went in hock, for rye-straw doled in bales.
When I woke up, my debts were high, and hogs were down in price;
(They didn't know the reason why, but offered more advice.)
I sat and heard them plan my feed, they said to trim my herds,
They worked out my tomorrow's need, protecting upland birds—
They told of subsidies to be, they said that stock was "out."
That grain was up again; that we would "change it all about"
They had me mortgaged to the teeth, and rationed to the bone
They couldn't see me underneath, I begged "leave me alone."
By now I didn't own a thing, in stock that I could slaughter,
I didn't own a crock by jing, in which to put my water!
My wife had loved me, but bereft of independent man,
One night aboard a freight she left; don't blame 'er; no one can!
I'd lost ability to think without some agent guide;
At night I couldn't sleep a wink; and hope within me died—
From Washington new rules would come, they said, to win the war;
Raise wheat, start over; don't be dumb; here I could stand no more.
T'was then I took my walking shoes, put on my sheepskin coat
And left it all to buckaroos who rule the realm by rote.
Their regulations stacked in piles, I burned before I went
They made a bonfire seen for miles, before the flames were spent.
The land bank has my acres now, the F. S. A. my sheep,
Farm Credit owns my only cow; but here, God lets me sleep;
I only hear the coyotes howl, and know the blizzards roar,
The quaver of the great horned owl, the groundhog's gurgling snore.
Across the seas, in Freedoms name, men now are waging war;
Good-bye; I love it, but its gone; for me it is no more!"
I left the hermit in his cave, his whiskers in his hands—
And turned my steps toward where the knave now regiments his lands!

School Lunches

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, on May 9 I introduced into this House H. R. 4777, a bill to assist the States to establish and maintain school-lunch programs. Since that time I have been receiving communications from organizations all over the country giving their enthusiastic support of and endorsement to the principles of this legislation.

The legislative chairman of the National Congress of Parents and Teachers writes me that she will do everything possible to aid the passage of the bill, and points out how very important the national P. T. A. views such principles. The president of the American Dietetic Association wires me from Milwaukee:

Sound nutritional practices and teachings are necessary in the school lunchroom program. Good nutrition for our children must be paramount in our legislation. We feel your bill H. R. 4777 embodies these principles; therefore the American Dietetic Association wishes to go on record as approving and supporting the bill H. R. 4777.

A representative of the American Home Economics Association writes me that she hopes the bill will be extensively supported and passed; while the executive secretary and the legislative representative on school-lunch programs for childhood education lend their endorsement in the following language:

H. R. 4777 provides for the administration of school-lunch programs through the United States Office of Education. Not only is this good educational practice, but it is good government for the State departments of education to be made responsible for the program at the State legislatures. It is our privilege to endorse the principles in and to work for the passage of H. R. 4777.

Mr. Speaker, while we are engaged in the most serious war in our Nation's history we cannot afford to ignore such vital elements on our home front as the health of the children of this country. The school-lunch program is a most important factor in maintaining and improving the health of our children. I trust that the Members of this House, regardless of political affiliation, will lend their active support to speedy and favorable consideration of this legislation.

Chicago Sun Article on Sewell Avery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, permission having been granted, I am inserting in the RECORD the first of a series of articles, which appeared in the May 15, 1944, issue of the Chicago Sun, entitled "Sewell Avery Against the People—Mail Order Napoleon Threatens Machinery Stabilizing Economy."

The article is as follows:

SEWELL AVERY VERSUS THE PEOPLE—MAIL-ORDER NAPOLEON THREATENS MACHINERY STABILIZING ECONOMY

(By Thomas F. Reynolds and Charles O. Gridley)

WASHINGTON, May 14.—Sewell Lee Avery is at war with the people of the United States.

He has waged this war since 1933, when his formula of hard-boiled management and low wages began to turn a Montgomery Ward & Co. deficit of $5,686,784 into spectacular profits.

His rise to the top rank of profit-makers during the depression coincided with the advent of President Roosevelt's administration. Since then Avery has consistently produced heavy profits for his stockholders—and for himself—in Montgomery Ward and other companies.

Yet he has fought every inch of the way against measures enacted for national economic recovery and the betterment of the "little people" who comprise the bulk of his customers.

Most Americans know Sewell Avery as a bland old man of 69, hands folded across his stomach, being carried out of his plant by two soldiers. Few Americans know him as the shrewd legal intriger of great wealth whose obstructive tactics have snarled up the work of the most important Government agencies in Washington.

These tactics of legal delay and obstruction now approximate a formula which threatens the whole machinery by which the United States has sought to stabilize its economy in its hours of greatest crisis.

Seizure of Ward's Chicago properties by the Federal Government last month was merely another climax in Avery's effort to establish the principle that "the law applies to everybody but me."

Although the properties now are back in Avery's hands, the seizure is being capitalized by the Roosevelt-haters, the entrenched interests, the reactionaries, and the ill-informed as "confiscation," "Gestapo operations," and "fascism."

Those who hold this view have forgotten one important thing: If the seizure were all that they implied, Avery would be in a concentration camp today. Under fascism or under the Gestapo, that is the way things are done.

The story of Sewell Avery embodies no such principle of might versus right. It is the story of one man versus the people. It is as simple as that.

For more than a decade the shadow of this man has been cast across the path of national progress. He has battled social reform and economic reform with unrelenting vigor.

He has berated and fumed at the administration while accepting its bounty. Some of Montgomery Ward's largest sales were made in distressed areas where Federal relief and farm benefit payments gave the people the purchasing power with which to trade with his mail-order house and shoot its balance sheet from a red-ink deficit of $5,686,784 in the 13 months ending January 31, 1933, to a net profit of $2,227,957 in 1934, $9,161,054 in 1935, and $13,527,310 in 1936. Last year the company netted $20,437,583.

He has preached the gospel of the balanced budget. Yet this $144,810-a-year executive is in the forefront of a movement to place a ceiling of 25 percent on the amount of Federal taxes which could be imposed on any individual or corporation.

He fought with great bitterness the $25,000 net salary ceiling invoked by Mr. Roosevelt in 1943, but he sees nothing wrong with placing a 95-cents-an-hour top limit on the pay of Montgomery Ward workers below the grade of executive. In fact, he chortled amiably last week over the wage freeze now in effect, which, he said, would make it impossible for Ward's to grant its employees higher wages.

Avery likes to think of Herbert Hoover as the greatest President of contemporary times, and is considered a hero by many of his more reactionary colleagues. But the viewpoint of business is by no means unanimous. There are many conscientious men of capital and industry who look upon Avery as one of the gravest threats to the continued existence of free enterprise, whose cause he so volubly espouses.

Typical and revealing is the comment of H. L. Derby, president of the American Cyanimid Co., director of the National Association of Manufacturers, and former management member of the National War Labor Board, which Avery considers his arch enemy.

"Ward has done the greatest disservice to industry and the private enterprise system of any concern in the United States," Derby said.

Avery represents a small but exceedingly articulate group of industrialists and businessmen, but he does not represent them all, and certainly not a majority. As evidenced by Derby's denunciation, his tactics have been condemned by other industrialists as important in the business world as he.

On the nine occasions on which the W. L B. has voted on the Montgomery Ward case, Avery's position has been disapproved unanimously by the 17 industrial members of the board, with one exception. On this occasion one member voted in his favor.

The industrialists who opposed Avery's fight against the Government and his defiance of the acts of Congress are top-flight executives of some of the most prosperous and influential corporations in the United States corporate structure.

It is significant that of the 6,500 labor dispute cases which have reached the W. L. B. since its creation in 1942, only seven cases of defiance by employers—and 10 of defiance by unions—have been sent to the White House for action, and that of the seven employer cases, two involved Montgomery Ward and thus Sewell Avery.

Avery's tactics, which his lawyers faithfully pursued in the courts, have been to attack every act of Congress with which he did not wish to comply. And while these battles raged and Avery cried out against Government interference, Ward profits became so good, in fact, that he was able to become a member of the national executive committee of the Liberty League, and to chip in $5,000 to the Crusaders, both of which fought the process of national recovery, including the relief activities of the Work Projects Administration.

In addition, the record shows that Avery contested at every turn the measures by which the President and Congress were trying to throw off depression and better the condition of working men and women..

In 1935, he was snarling at the National Recovery Administration, which announced that Montgomery Ward could not use the "blue eagle" insigne because Avery refused to pay his company's assessed share of the cost of administering the retail code.

A year later he attempted to carry a fight to the United States Supreme Court for abatement of $39,110 in income taxes, which represented deficiencies for 1930, 1931, and 1932, during which his income was $927,805, before he deducted "capital losses." The Supreme Court refused to review the case after the Seventh Circuit Court at Chicago had found against Avery. During the argument in the lower courts counsel for Avery challenged the constitutionality of the Income Tax Act, and was overruled.

Avery undoubtedly still believes the application of the law to his income in this case was unconstitutional.

His opposition to labor unions came into the open after Congress enacted the Wagner Labor Relations Act. He began breaking lances against the law as Montgomery Ward employees, in plants scattered across the country, hurried to the newly created National Labor Relations Board with grievances and requests for protection of their bargaining rights.

Under his direction, Montgomery Ward took four N. L. R. B. cases to circuit courts of appeal, lost three and won a technical victory on a point of law in the fourth. N. L. R. B. records list 91 Montgomery Ward cases, 40 involving questions of election or representation and 51 alleging violations of the Wagner Act.

Montgomery Ward and Avery at that time were not content with passive resistance to unions. They were not above using labor spies to break up collective bargaining units inside the company's national organization. This is disclosed by an N. L. R. B. order, upheld by a circuit court of appeals on January 30, 1940, which instructed Ward's at its Portland, Oreg., plant to cease "employing detectives to investigate the activities of its employees in behalf of Weighers, Warehousemen and Cereal Workers Local 38-123 of the International Longshoremen's Association, or any other labor organization of its employees, or employing any other form or manner of espionage for such purposes."

That order also directed Ward's to reinstate 23 employees discharged for union activities and compensate them for pay losses amounting to $32,000.

The scores of lawyers who carry out Avery's orders in his war against the Government were very busy in the late thirties. The Fair Labor Standards Act followed the Wagner Act, and it, too, met a prompt challenge from the mail-order Napoleon. The Wage and Hour Administration had to go to court to sustain its right to inspect the records of workers in the company's employee files. Again Ward's fought stubbornly through the lower courts, up to the United States Supreme Court, which once more sustained the Government's authority and refused to review the case.

When it became necessary to prevent prices from going through the roof and Congress enacted the stabilization law, Avery and his company were soon embroiled with the Office of Price Administration. Ward's was enjoined on December 3, 1942, from violation of general maximum price regulations after the Government had alleged a violation of ceiling prices.

The court found that 728 items in the Montgomery Ward Chicago catalog were priced over the ceiling, with violations ranging from 1 cent to $1.02 an item. In another O. P. A. action the company has carried its fight to the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago.

Unable to break through two injunctions obtained by the Government in Chicago courts, prohibiting it from violating price regulations in its mail-order business and in its retail stores, Montgomery Ward now is following the familiar Avery legal pattern by attacking the validity of a key price regulation before a Federal emergency court of appeals.

While these major contests were in progress, the company also was carrying on a running and often embarrassing fight with the Federal Trade Commission against charges of misrepresentation of its products.

All of these court skirmishes were preliminary to what has proved to be Boss Avery's most spectacular battle—his clash with the W. L. B. He sought to evade the arm of the law, only to land in the arms of the troops.

Your Country's Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT GORE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, a very fine and talented lady, Mrs. Stella Bohanan, of Cookeville, Tenn., has written a poem entitled "Your Country's Flag."

I believe many will enjoy reading it, and I include it in my remarks:

YOUR COUNTRY'S FLAG

I am more than just your country's flag
With stripes of red, white, and blue;
I am more than just plain bands of cloth
Swung in skies of azure hue.

I am your emblem of justice and power,
I am Old Glory as I wave on high,
I go before your conquering hosts,
And shot and shell defy.

I lead the way for marching feet
As they go forth to defend,
I proudly wave along your shores,
And to no monarch bend.

I bow my head in sorrow
When grief assails your land,
And speak to the world in sad acclaim
When your great sons pass beyond.

I've been dragged in dust and heroes' blood
But never put to shame.
Brave hands have hoisted me once more
Their victory to proclaim.

Then raise your hand in proud salute,
Wherever I may wave,
In peace or on bloody battlefield,
Where lie your fallen brave.

Rabbi Baruch Korff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a letter received today by me from Rabbi Baruch Korff, 160 Central Park South, New York, N. Y., who has given much of his time, labor, and effort to one of the most important subjects confronting our country; namely, the suffering, hardship, and privations of the thousands of unfortunate victims of oppression, the Jewish and other war refugees.

Rabbi Korff has been working untiringly for the establishment of free ports of refuge for these human souls and that other nations may be primarily interested in this most important subject matter. The entire Nation owes this man a debt of gratitude for his contribution to the various agencies of our Government in helping to solve this most difficult situation.

NEW YORK, May 16, 1944.

The Honorable THOMAS LANE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LANE: I find your address and those of other Congressmen made in the past 2 weeks excellent and eloquent. All have called the attention of the House to the desperate plight of the Jews and other minorities in Hitlerite Europe. Needless to say, that with the sentiments expressed in those addresses, I am heartily in accord. Indeed, no American mindful of the long history of this Nation in speaking out against oppressions and offering refuge to the oppressed could do otherwise.

This Government has lived up to this noble tradition by establishing a War Refugee Board to deal exclusively with the pressing problem of rescuing victims of enemy oppression in imminent danger of death. The choice of a director for this great objective was very fortunate. In John W. Pehle, the President has selected a brilliant administrator who will bring to this urgent task a vigorous mind nurtured on the basic grassroots principles of democracy and humanity. His ability has already been vividly demonstrated by the excellent job he did in dealing with novel and tremendously difficult problems as Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, in charge of the administration of Foreign Funds Control. We can be thankful that Mr. Pehle's excellent talents will now be devoted to the humanitarian task of saving the lives of the oppressed.

The Executive order creating the War Refugee Board wisely makes use of the facilities of three great Departments of our Government—War, State, and the Treasury—and also requires other agencies of the Government to cooperate with the War Refugee Board to enable it to achieve its objectives. Armed with these facilities and under the brilliant leadership of Mr. Pehle, we can be sure that the War Refugee Board will leave no stone unturned in its gallant struggle to save the victims of oppression from the forces of evil.

It seems to me, however, that one step is essential if the War Refugee Board is to succeed in rescuing any appreciable number of victims of Nazi terrorism. I refer to the establishment of havens of refuge in the United States or its territories. Unless we are prepared to make this elementary humane offer, we stand convicted, along with the rest of the civilized world, of indifference to the pitiful appeals for help coming from the hunted, downtrodden, and terrorized victims of tyranny and persecution.

How can the United States, with her wealth of resources and noble traditions of providing aid for the oppressed and unfortunate, call upon other nations, with lesser resources and lacking our traditions, to extend refuge to fleers from oppression, if she herself is unwilling to do the same. Such appeals, unaccompanied by a similar offer by us, are empty, meaningless gestures, foredoomed to failure.

I am not suggesting that our immigration laws be thrown out or disregarded. That is not the question at all. The refuge that we can and should offer is a temporary shelter where persons who have been hunted for 10 years can rest awhile, secure of their lives, until the successful conclusion of the war permits the civilized world to cooperate to make orderly arrangements for their relocation and rehabilitation. I do not suggest that they be given the status of immigrants, but merely that they be accorded the treatment we offer merchandise in a free port or, at the least, enemy prisoners of war in internment camps.

In simple, artless language, Samuel Grafton, a columnist on the New York Post, states the moral issue so vividly that I am taking the liberty of quoting him at length:

"The need is for reservations of a few acres here and there where a man who has been running for 10 years can sit down and catch his breath, and where somebody can tell a story to a frightened child; a few reservations where it would be possible for those who cannot satisfy the requirements of law to rest a bit, without violating the law. We do it, in commercial free ports, for cases of beans, so that we can make some storage and processing profits; it should not be impossible to do it for people."

To those who would place legalistic objections over the demands of humanity by using the immigration laws as an insuperable barrier to this proposal, Mr. Grafton gives the complete answer. I quote him further:

"Let us look upon these refugee free ports as it they were moored ships, ships of land. Anyone who would step over the boundary of the free port into the country proper should be made to satisfy all requirements of immigration law, precisely as if he were proposing to come ashore from a ship. But surely it should not baffle our ingenuity to find some legal way in which to grant a stateless woman the comparatively small bit of room which she needs in order to deliver a baby."

The moral and practical effect of establishing such havens is excellently summarized by Mr. Grafton:

"If we set up a system of refugee free ports, our fine new War Refugee Board can then properly appeal to other countries to do the same. If we do not go at least that far, the board will be answered with a snicker should it make such requests of other lands.

"The refugees, Jewish, and other, ask only for a few fenced-in acres of the poorest land in America. They don't want to keep it. They just want to sit on it until they can go home again. They are letting us off more easily than does conscience itself, for they don't even ask that we do our best for them. They plead for our worst."

It is not surprising that this simple, decent, humane proposal made by Mr. Grafton has spread like wildfire throught the country. Were our people's reaction otherwise, then we should really have been shocked into reexamining what had happened to us that we should have so far departed from the ideals and examples of our founding fathers.

Here are a few typical editorial reactions to Mr. Grafton's proposal:

The Akron (Ohio) Beacon-Journal:

"Grafton's suggestion ought to be carried out immediately."

The Seattle (Wash.) Star:

"As constructive and kindly a suggestion as a columnist has yet come up with—that is Samuel Grafton's suggestion of a free port for refugees. What finer gesture could the rest of the world make at this time?"

The Mitchell (S. Dak.) Daily Republic:

"By such action this country would be taking the lead in providing refugee relief and our War Refugee Board would be in a position to ask other countries to establish similar ports where they are badly needed.

The San Diego (Calif.) Daily Journal:

"A free port for human souls is certainly no less desirable, no less practical, than free ports for merchandise, and these have been integral parts of international commerce for years."

The Asheville (N. C.) Citizen Times:

"Here is a ray of hope for the homeless, destitute, and oppressed. There are today more than 130,000 German prisoners of war lodged in this country. They will not reside here after the war. It could be the same, if charity follows this counsel of wisdom, for the war refugees."

The Charlotte (N. C.) News:

"It seems to us that American opposition to British action in closing Palestine to Jewish refugees could best be expressed in the opening of free ports for refugees of our own and by later insistence that other nations follow our example."

The Wilmington (Del.) Star:

"It seems to us that this is the least we could do and should do at the earliest possible moment as our share in saving the lives of the helpless minorities who have so far escaped brutal slaughter.

"The Government could authorize the War Refugee Board to proceed with the establishment of such free ports, under whatever safeguards may be necessary to guarantee to human flesh and blood just what we already guarantee to inanimate goods—a stopping place en route to their final destination—a free port where they have no rights except the right to safe, temporary storage."

The New York (N. Y.) Times:

"When the idea of free ports in this country for war refugees was brought up in Washington recently there seemed to be two possible objections to it, one good and one bad. The first objection was that it would be inhuman to establish what might be regarded as concentration camps for refugees we were not willing to admit. The second was that some of these refugees might eventually get into the country, beyond the restrictions of the quota law.

"A study of the situation indicates that neither argument is valid. A refugee brought, say, to Ellis Island and there comfortably housed and fed and treated with consideration, would be in heaven compared with the same person in Germany or Rumania. As for the danger of refugees escaping into the United States from their places of detention, this is hardly a menace to the safety of the Republic. We take this risk with our captive enemies. Why not with our luckless friends?

"The War Refugee Board, as its director, John W. Pehle, has indicated, would be a logical agency to carry out the 'free port' plan. Perhaps Army camps, vacated as the peak of training passes, could be used. After the war some of the refugees might safely return to their countries of origin. Others might find homes in other countries where immigrants might be needed and welcomed. Still others could in time be admitted regularly to the United States. The plan has nothing to do with unrestricted and uncontrolled immigration. It is simply a proposal to save the lives of innocent people."

The prince of liberalism, the Honorable JOHN W. MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts, House majority leader, stated in a telegram addressed to me:

"I am deeply moved by the human tragedy of your people and other minorities, and I am extremely grateful to you for calling my attention to the humanitarian activities of the War Refugee Board headed by John W. Pehle, its executive director. I am indeed wholeheartedly for any project that the War Refugee Board may devise. I am particularly for the measure of free ports. Consider the moral blow to the Axis and its satellites which this project will deal. Consider the effect this will have on the neutral countries, and above all consider the constructive safety of human lives the free ports will promulgate. It is the least we can do for the afflicted and oppressed peoples of the globe. The President of the United States has expressed the wish of the American people when he established the War Refugee Board and will in the future no doubt facilitate the rescue program of the War Refugee Board, including the project of free ports in this country for the admission of war refugees who are otherwise barred by immigration laws."

The Honorable JAMES M. MEAD, of New York, once again exhibited his devotion to American principles and as the globe-circling Senator is in a far better position to express the following:

"I am supporting the free-port project and will so advise the War Refugee Board and the White House. It is the least the United States can do under the circumstances to alleviate the suffering of so many unfortunate victims of oppression."

"President Roosevelt's Refugee Board should lose no time in translating this plan into reality. I am sure every liberty-loving American will welcome such action."

The lady of humane letters, an American at head and at mind, Hon. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, from Connecticut, added her voice in an appeal for free ports.

Others were William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor; the Y. M. C. A.; and many other notables and organizations.

I know that I am expressing the will of the American people when I call upon the War Refugee Board, in the interests of humanity, in accordance with our American ideals and traditions, to establish temporary havens of refuge in this country. Here, the oppressed and the hunted can find respite, until the overthrow of the oppressor permits their departure to permanent homes, in accordance with the orderly, humane arrangements to be cooperatively devised by a civilized, peaceful world.

Yours with great respect,

RABBI BARUCH KORFF.

Small Business in Post-War America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE E. HANCOCK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, under the permission given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a timely and thought-provoking speech delivered by our colleague, Hon. WALTER C. PLOESER, of Missouri, before the sixty-second annual convention of the New York State Association of Local Insurance Agents, held in Syracuse, N. Y., on May 8 and 9, 1944:

There is at the present moment a plan in Washington to extend a war agency into the post-war period as a permanent "wet nurse" to small business. The agency to which I refer was created for the purpose of protecting and integrating the productive capacity of small business into the war effort. This plan follows the normal tendency of governmental bureaus and agencies to never let go—even after their emergency need has expired. The antidemocratic program sets up one man as the potentate over small business. This man would be equipped with a powerfully created and Government-financed corporation, which would have the power to determine the disposition of many billions of dollars of surplus Government property. He would be the official lobbyist for all small business, with power to intercept and distribute the lifeblood of trade. He could say whether this or that small business shall have a participation in these surpluses and, therefore, accordingly say whether or not this or that small business may live. Conversely, by the same power, he could exert influence to the end that no small business could enjoy such surpluses and, by the same stroke of power, play exclusively into the hands of the post-war surplus profiteers.

This man would be given the power to determine the financial policy of post-war small business. He would be empowered and privileged with the control of $1,000,000,000 of Government funds for this purpose. With this power he could put blood into or withhold it from any small business which he chooses. This same power is so broad that he may give this life to small business which operates under the profit system or to enterprise which operates under a socialistic pattern.

This program has a heavy sugar coating in two colors: One, the label of aid for the reconversion of small business to peacetime pursuits; two, preference for the veterans of the war. Both are most worthy objectives. But both will suffer by the heavy hand of paternalistic government.

This evening I wish to dwell briefly on these important objectives. To clearly do so I think a basic statement is essential: Independent small business is the keystone in the arch of free competitive enterprise. With time to think this statement over, I believe that all of us who believe in free competitive enterprise can come to agreement. To me this is basic.

The future of small business in post-war America can be either brilliant and prosperous—or dull and declining—dependent upon whether it is free or regimented.

War controls have caused many to contemplate the risk of compromising with some form of post-war regimentation or governmental supervision. This is dangerous to the future of small business. Small business, in my opinion, is the keystone in the arch of a free competitive enterprise—and the more units of small business operating in America—the more secure is the American way of life.

If this be true, then it follows naturally that anything that tends to stifle free competition, chokes off the opportunity for small business to prosper.

There are two great dangers against which we must continually fight if small business is to prosper. First, the danger of private monopolistic encroachment. Against this danger, the Federal antitrust laws should be strengthened, and in many cases State laws should be strengthened. Second, the danger of the paternalistic hand of government, which means eventually governmental supervision and regimentation. We must guard carefully against the temptation to extend war controls for any period of time longer than necessary to taper off and liquidate such agencies. Governmental agencies which have been protective in their service to small business during war could serve no other purpose than to become regimental tools in peacetime. A heavy paternal hand of government means eventual death to the prosperous free operation of small business.

All small business needs and wants, therefore, is protection against private monopolistic encroachments which are destructive by their very nature and freedom to operate.

Many preferences can and should be given the veterans of this war by both Government and business. The only preference to be offered to these worthy veterans under the program which I warn against is to be found in ostentatious print.

The insurance industry is one made up of hundreds of thousands of small business units. Its financial stability stems from great resources aggregated into fewer hands. Yet, these few hands, holding this capital as security, do not all begin to qualify as big business. In fact, most of them are small, secure, dependable, profitably managed small businesses, carrying an important public confidence and trust. These aggregations of capital perform two important functions in a free economy. They pay and spread the loss from myriads of hazards and feed into the economy many millions of dollars of risk capital annually. These dollars and their hundreds of thousands of agents could do more for small business in the way of distributing risk capital without one iota of impairment of security of funds for the payment of losses. These same dollars have competent agency representation in every nook and cranny of America. Insurance dollars, plus the insurance organization of the capital stock companies, have a great opportunity to directly aid the reconversion of small business from war back to peace. This is the private enterprise way of business helping its biggest customer—small business. Small business is the biggest customer of big business. Small business is the biggest customer of the insurance business. Why not follow through all the way and help our customers grow and prosper and reemploy the millions of veterans and other Americans after this war?

I remind big businessmen, Government regimenters, and small-business men alike, that—independent small business is the keystone in the arch of free, competitive enterprise. All that small business wants, therefore, is protection against monopolistic encroachments—and, freedom to operate. Business has the energy, the "know how" and the will to do all this for itself.

The Atlantic Charter and Mid-Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 11, 1944

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, on May 9, 1944, there appeared in the New York Times a concise and illuminating editorial statement with respect to the application of the Atlantic Charter to the boundary dispute between Russia and Poland. The editorial follows:

BACKGROUND OF THE CHARTER

The Soviet magazine War and the Working Classes takes to task people in England and the United States whom it accuses of attempting to "use" the Atlantic Charter to bolster the "conqueror's pretensions of the so-called Polish Government toward territories in the Ukraine and White Russia." The Russian publication argues that the Atlantic Charter cannot properly be regarded from an abstract point in space but should be read in the light of the conditions actually obtaining when it was formulated.

If this is done, it seems to us that the record strengthens the case for collective action rather than unilateral action in the settlement of problems of this kind. For the record reveals four important entries so far as the Atlantic Charter and Poland and Russia are concerned: (1) On June 22, 1941, Germany attacked Russia, thus nullifying the Soviet-German treaties of 1939. (2) Five weeks later the Government of Russia and the same Government which it now describes as "the so-called Government of Poland" signed a treaty of mutual aid (July 30) in which the Russian Government "recognized the Soviet-German treaties of 1939 as to territorial changes in Poland as having lost their validity." (3) The 1939 partition of Poland was thus rubbed out officially when, in another 6 weeks (on August 14), the Atlantic Charter was proclaimed, with its pledge against any "territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned." (4) Another 6 weeks later, on September 24, both the Government of Russia and the same Government of Poland signed an agreement in London in which they "made known their adherence to the common principles set forth" in the Atlantic Charter "and their intention to cooperate to the best of their ability in giving effect to them."

This is the sequence of events which made, and still makes, many people in England and the United States believe that the Russian-Polish border problem is essentially a United Nations problem which can be settled most fairly and most hopefully by discussion in common council.

Hon. Martin Dies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the Chicago Tribune and the Washington Evening Star:

[From the Chicago Tribune of May 15, 1944]

BRUTALITY, INC.

Congressman MARTIN DIES, chairman of the Dies committee and the Nation's most effective foe of communism and of other subversive activities, has announced his retirement as a candidate for reelection because of a throat ailment diagnosed as malignant.

The C. I. O. United Steel Workers' Convention in Cleveland greeted the news of Representative DIES' retirement with cheers, and C. I. O. President Philip Murray said: "I think it is the greatest single contribution he has made to the welfare of the country since he entered public life."

The brutality of the C. I. O. is clearly shown in the fierce joy these delegates and their president expressed on learning that Representative DIES has the most dread disease known to man. The public will know from this how to appraise Murray and his cold-blooded gang of revolutionaries.

[From the Washington Evening Star of May 15, 1944]

RESIGNATION OF DIES SEEN FORCED BY C. I. O.—COMMITTEE HE ORIGINATED WILL NOT PASS, WRITER BELIEVES

(By David Lawrence)

Decision of Representative MARTIN DIES not to be a candidate for reelection from his Texas district has more in it than meets the eye. Mr. DIES probably didn't quit because of ill health as stated. He quit because the C. I. O. made it too hot for him and might have defeated him for renomination.

The significance of the episode, however, is not that the C. I. O. can reach into Texas and exercise a threat at the polls by concentrating its political weapons in a single district, but that amid great jubilation the C. I. O. is announcing also that the Dies committee is to end.

It would be a grave mistake for anybody to assume that the Dies committee was ever just the creature of MARTIN DIES. Back of the Dies committee inquiry which six times got a vote of confidence from the House of Representatives and almost all the funds it asked for were such powerful organizations as the American Legion and the American Federation of Labor as well as the Daughters of the American Revolution and many other patriotic societies, to say nothing of certain church groups which have deep-seated convictions about the introduction of communism or Communist ideas in America.

COMMITTEE WILL NOT PASS

MARTIN DIES may pass off the stage but it is a safe bet that the committee which he originated will not pass. The effort of certain groups in America to use Communist technique to transform American institutions may seem inconsequential to many, many citizens. It may seem even to be "seeing things under the bed," but the Dies committee wasn't organized to wait till communism got a foothold and real strength. It was organized to use the power of publicity to nip communism in the bud.

The principal opponents of the Dies committee have not been Communists in America, but left-wingers who resent the Communist label when tagged on to them. The most frequently heard charge from the left-wingers is that the Dies committee isn't hard enough on the Fascists. One reason is, of course, that the Roosevelt administration has been doing a very effective job in getting at the Fascists and the promoters of religious hatreds. The present sedition trials show that the administration has used the prosecuting arm energetically in the direction of the so-called lightists. MARTIN DIES, of course, can show by counting the pages of testimony and the volumes of words that his committee has spent a good deal of its time exposing Fascist groups and those with a sympathy for nazi-ism.

The Dies committee has, to be sure, been clumsy at times in its methods and has engaged in rough and tumble fighting which is a bit uncomfortable for the leftists because since 1933 they have been so seldom on the receiving end of congressional smearing. But if they go back during the last 11 years and look at the behavior of congressional committees sponsored by the administration and the left wing, they will be reminded of how irresponsible and extreme a congressional investigating committee engaged in a witch hunt can be.

PART OF DEMOCRATIC SYSTEM

Investigating committees are an unpleasant but necessary part of the democratic system. So are extremists. The left wingers perform a function whether or not they admit that the ideas of Karl Marx or Stalin or anyone else on the subject of private capitalism are basic in their philosophy. The right wingers perform a function in resisting encroachment on private property and in their attempt to prevent communizing of American enterprise. These tidal waves of social upheaval will be helped toward the day of equilibrium and relative contentment by exposure to the healthy air of free discussion.

The danger in America is not committees like that headed by MARTIN DIES, not altogether the Communist or Fascist-minded groups that organize societies, but the persons with political and official power who have a totalitarian instinct. This is the instinct which first calls names and then persecutes people for their religious, racial, or economic views and then seeks to win the debate by exterminating the protagonists of the other point of view. The extremists do not really favor discussion. They do not rely on the correctives that an informed public opinion can bring even to smears by congressional committees. They want their opponents squelched or abolished. If those who have started out to abolish the Dies committee think that the withdrawal of the chairman means an end of the committee, they will have another guess coming. There will be another committee to keep the spotlight on un-American activities and it should avoid the blunders and injustices of its predecessor.

Address of Hon. John A. Byrnes, Chief Justice of the City Court of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. FAY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. FAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a speech delivered at the annual communion breakfast of the United Holy Name Societies of the city of Mount Vernon, N. Y., on Sunday, May 14, 1944, by Hon. John A. Byrnes, chief justice of the City Court of New York:

In this era of doubt and uncertainty and questioning, in this day of assault on the cherished principles of religion, it is an encouraging and wholesome spectacle to witness so many men unafraid to do open homage to their faith, by their reception of the sacrament of the eucharist within this paschal time.

And it harmonizes beautifully with the spirit of Mother's Day that this communion breakfast be given by the Society of the Holy Name—a society whose fundamental designs are propagation of "true love and reverence for the holy name of God and Jesus Christ" and the suppression of the profanation of the divine name.

Thus we are assembled here this morning in observance of the second commandment, which admonishes us that we "shall not take the name of the Lord, thy God, in vain," as well as the fourth commandment, which charges us to "honor thy father and thy mother."

To revere and love our God and to honor our parents are not only holy commandments and a holy duty, but the observance of the commandments and the duty produces a spiritual satisfaction and a soulful peace and a physical contentment which have no substitutes.

No more appropriate occasion could have been selected for this Holy Name breakfast than Mother's Day.

Thackeray, in his Vanity Fair, truly says that—

"Mother is the name for God on the lips and in the hearts of little children."

Mother should also be the name for God on the lips and in the hearts of grown-ups.

Edgar Allen Poe gave utterance to the sublime thought that—

"In the heavens above
The angels, whispering to one another,
Can find, amid their burning terms of love
None so devotional as that of mother."

It is impossible to speak on this particular day without inviting the criticism of being sentimental. Well, if in recounting and emphasizing the selflessness of our mothers, of their myriad sacrifices, of their unyielding devotion, of their steadfast care, of their unmovable loyalty, of their inexpressible and ineffable love—if that, I say, be sentimentality, then you may register me as an incorrigible sentimentalist, and I am unashamed about giving expression to this sort of sentimentality, for I prefer a soft heart to a hard one.

Need I tell you—you who are sons of good mothers—that a mother's love defies logic, that it challenges reason, and that it triumphs over adversity?

As the poet Lowell beautifully voiced it:

"A woman's love
Is mighty, but a mother's heart is weak and by its weakness, overcome."

Yes, a mother's love makes the possible probable and the probable, reality.

But if this day is to be more than an occasion dedicated to mere vocal appreciation of our mothers, we must convey our expressed sentiments of fealty into deeds of worthwhileness. We must make our actions speak louder than words. For there is more eloquence and meaning and gratitude in performance than in promise. Fine thoughts which do not beget fine actions are akin to seeds which never flower.

Love and faith carry corresponding commitments. The more profound the love, the more unshakable the faith, the greater and more authentic must be our redemption of the trust. So, we can prove our love for our mothers by proving that we are worthy of their love for us.

And we must prove ourselves worthy not merely on Mother's Day, but on every day.

As the love of our mothers for us functions every day of the year, so our love for them must manifest itself throughout the year.

The spirit of Mother's Day calls for the never-ceasing exercise of our loyalty to them. The spirit of Mother's Day is not the celebration of a day but the consecration of our lives. We can render no higher tribute to our mothers than to so live day by day that they will justifiably be proud of us, or would be proud were they still in our midst.

And a mother wants no other reward than the knowledge that her self-sacrificing efforts have not been in vain; that her faith has not been misplaced; that her love has been, and is being, repaid by a devotion, not only to her but to society—by a devotion that manifests itself daily through righteous living.

Every man, no matter how humble or poor, can by reflecting the teachings of his mother be a living monument to her.

"'Tis an old proverb that one good mother is worth a hundred schoolmasters."

At no time in the history of the world has there been such a need, such a desperate, imperative, pulsating need, for those qualities which characterize a good mother. The sores of the world can be healed by the application of the wondrous, mysterious, but never-failing process of mother love. The world needs to be humanized. The world needs to be imbued with the self-sacrificing nobility of motherhood.

The world needs a heart that beats with warmth; the world needs blood that is compassionate; the world needs a tongue that speaks only the language of truth; the world needs arms that are always lifted for the right; the world needs ears trained to the rhythm of music, yet ears that hear and understand and sympathize with the woes and wailing of a distressed humanity; the world needs eyes that see the gutter as well as the stars; the world needs a voice that cries out for a genuine brotherhood; the world needs a soul that rebels against injustice.

Talk of war, preparation for war, instilling and propagating and fastening the fervor of militarism, the destruction of young manhood in warfare—these constitute the very negation of the spirit of motherhood. The warm, benign spirit of peace, not the mad, devastating spirit of war, is the spirit of the mother.

On this Mother's Day, our fervent prayer is that all nations treat their citizens or subjects with that tolerance and understanding and sympathy that mothers indiscriminately bear for their children—a treatment that has no regard for the beauty or the imperfection of the offspring.

The practice of that sort of love would make impossible the cruel treatment which Germany is meting out to her Jewish citizens; the practice of that sort of love would give the Catholics of Mexico, the Catholics of Russia and elsewhere, the same liberty of conscience and freedom of religious pursuit that is accorded to those of different faiths; the practice of such love would banish that racial, social, and economic discrimination and persecution which infects and poisons the world, and which wantonly debases the very name of mother.

Suffering would be alleviated, want would be lessened, industrial strife would be substantially abated, misery would decline, if we put into practice those concepts of decency which were taught to us by our mothers.

Yes, if those who are directing the affairs of the world and in control of its destinies would only talk less about their love for their mothers, and do more toward harnessing that love to the problems of the day, what a different, and better, and happier place this old world would be.

We would have been endowed with the true faith; yes, all the peoples of the world, have heard that voice of love and compassion; all mankind has seen those arms lifted in righteous indignation. All the world has turned a deaf ear, an unseeing eye. The voice crying in the wilderness of a world gone mad is the voice of holy mother the church, through its supreme pontiff.

The thought that I have earnestly endeavored to bring to you this morning is that not only on Mother's Day, but on each and every day, we consecrate our lives to the teachings of our mothers.

Then, and only then, will we be fulfilling the obligations which we owe to our mothers, and which they have a right to expect us to discharge.

Such a life, lived every day of the year, would be more emblematic of our love for mother than the mere wearing of a flower on Mother's Day. What really counts is the feeling in our hearts, the expression in our souls, the practice of our lives, and not the flower that adorns our lapels. The flower wilts and fades and loses its fragrance, and perishes. The love of mother is ever present, ever living, as fresh and as fragrant and enkindling today as the day we were born.

Highway Use Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JESSE P. WOLCOTT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 8, 1944.

Hon. JESSE P. WOLCOTT,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WOLCOTT: During the current hearings before the Roads Committee on post-war highway legislation the subject of special highway user taxes has been referred to from time to time. In this connection views have been expressed and suggestions have been advanced that are wholly at variance with the facts as well as with the thinking of highway user groups generally. Hence we deem it important that the views of the latter, as represented by the organizations the signatures of which are attached hereto, be made a part of the record of the hearings.

We are all in complete agreement as to the importance of a planned program for post-war highway construction. As users we have a vital interest in the sound development of adequate highway facilities. However, as the users who pay an overwhelming part of the cost of highways, we are deeply conscious of the necessity for keeping special user levies on a sound basis and within reasonable and justifiable needs. Sound construction and sound financing must go hand in hand.

The ability to pay of those to be taxed is of primary importance. It is a factor which has been given too little consideration in the past with the result that in many instances the highway user taxes that already prevail are unnecessarily burdensome. Far from being a luxury to take or leave at will, the motor vehicle in its various forms has become a necessity. The family automobile has become a transportation necessity. It is normally used more for business and other necessary travel than for anything else. Our huge fleet of commercial vehicles is used for business exclusively. These vehicles are employed in competition with other modes of transportation which are given an unreasonable competitive advantage when the tax burden of highway users is made heavier. The farm truck, of which there are more than a million, is a vital tool used by the farmer in virtually every phase of his operations. Excessive taxes on that tool diminish or even eliminate the fruit of the farmer's labor. Failure to recognize these facts and to give due weight to ability to pay is to invite a popular revolt against the sound highway programs that are so urgently needed.

In testimony given before your committee several witnesses expressed the belief that it would be in order to increase special user taxes to defray the additional cost of post-war highway programs. One witness had this to say:

"We hear very little opposition to the highway user tax, so it is quite evident that the highway user would pay additional imposts if he can be assured that the money will be used for his safety and comfort by the improvement and the extension of our highway system."

We take direct issue with this and with all similar statements and inferences. Such views have come from persons who do not represent highway users and are therefore not qualified witnesses from the standpoint of what taxes the users should pay or are able to pay. The highway is essentially a community facility, with many groups and classes reaping direct and indirect benefits from its use and its availability. In view of this those users who pay the taxes will naturally resent the implication that every increase in cost, real or contemplated, is to be passed on to them in the form of higher rates. A study by the Federal Coordinator of Transportation (the late Joseph B. Eastman), published in 1940 by the United States Government, showed conclusively that motor vehicle owners and operators have been paying more than their fair share of highway costs. As representatives of the users who pay the taxes, we cannot find a vestige of authority for the statement quoted above to the effect that it is quite evident that the highway user is willing to support increased tax rates. There is, in fact, much criticism of various phases of the motor vehicle tax structure. It varies from place to place depending upon the conditions. What we want to stress is that your committee would not be warranted in basing a post-war Federal-aid highway program on the assumption that the highway users are prepared for the pyramiding of the levies they are now called upon to pay.

As a practical matter, there is no reason at all why the question of increased motor tax rates should be agitated at this time. State receipts from current motor tax rates are more than adequate to provide the highway user's fair share of necessary post-war highway facilities. What we need is not higher tax rates but better use and better control of the revenue derived from the taxes now paid by the users. In 1941, receipts from State motor vehicle imposts amounted to $1,468,554,000. The bulk of this revenue was applied in varying proportions to State highways, local and urban roads, and to the defrayment of charges on bonded indebtedness. However, there was diverted in 1941 alone to purposes wholly unrelated to roads, the huge sum of $215,039,000. During the 8-year period, 1934–41, a grand total of $1,350,837,000 was diverted. Until we have succeeded in stopping this unconscionable abuse of taxes paid by the motor vehicle operators for roads that they did not get, any talk of increased user taxes is manifestly ill-advised. As you well know, the Congress of the United States has stigmatized this practice as "unwise and unfair."

Tax rates should be determined on the basis of actual conditions and actual needs from State to State and from time to time, but always with due regard to "ability to pay." To us the immediate objectives are clear. We should move aggressively on every front to stop diversion, which is a glaring breach of faith with the highway users. We should seek to prevent dispersion, that is, the waste of road money due to lack of adequate controls of motor vehicle revenue allocated to local units of government. We should seek to get back on a pay-as-you-go basis in order that we may secure relief from the continuing drain of highway debt against current revenues. If we do these things we may well find that existing tax rates are more than sufficient to meet the cost of expanding highway programs. In that eventuality the users should get the benefit in the form of lower rates.

Not satisfied to tell your committee that the highway users are ready to foot increases in the rates of regular State levies—the gasoline tax and the registration fee—the witness quoted above went still further and suggested that tolls might be superimposed upon the State's tax structure. Said he:

"Another possibility of financing highway construction is the direct use tax in addition to the ordinary user imposts."

This suggestion warrants little consideration. The country would not look with favor on a post-war highway program which envisioned the return of the tollgate. Toll financing is justifiable only under exceptional circumstances and when surrounded with safeguards such as have been established from time to time by the Public Roads Administration as a matter of sound public policy. As highway user groups, it is our unalterable position that tolls should have no place in the planned financing of the post-war highway program that your committee is now considering.

Some of the witnesses who have appeared before your committee sought to establish a connection between Federal levies imposed upon highway users and Federal-aid highway disbursements. This is wholly contrary to the facts. Federal aid was originally conceived and was effectuated down through the years as a contribution by the Federal Government to the States in the interest of a limited road mileage that performed significant services for the Nation as such. Federal aid was never predicated on a special Federal tax levy on a special class of highway beneficiaries. The Federal automotive excise taxes were originally imposed by Congress as an emergency measure for balancing the budget. They were continued because of revenue requirements. This is equally true of the so-called "use tax" more recently imposed. Thus, historically and factually, Congress has always regarded these levies as a temporary expedient.

In this connection we beg to call your attention to the report of the Committee on Federal, State, and Local Government Relations, which was printed a few days ago as a Government document. This report was jointly sponsored by the United States Treasury and by the Institute of Public Administration. On the subject of the Federal automotive taxes, the report had this to say:

"For the motor-vehicle tax field, the coordination device recommended is the separation of sources, withdrawal of the Federal Government from the field as much and as soon as its fiscal exigencies will permit."

The user groups fully subscribe to this recommendation, with the difference that we would include in it the "use tax" as well as the Federal automotive excise taxes proper. We hope that your committee will be guided by it in weighing the Federal-aid problem and its various impacts.

In the event that you or any member of your distinguished committee should want any further information from the user groups on the subject discussed herein, we shall be glad to supply it, whether it relates to tax facts or highway user views.

Respectfully submitted.

That Horse, That Stream

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, I include therein an editorial appearing in the Washington Times-Herald on Sunday, May 14, 1944, which editorial follows:

THAT HORSE, THAT STREAM

The Democrats held their annual $50-a-plate Jefferson Day dinner in New York a few nights ago; and at the ceremony the most probable fourth-term campaign strategy and tactics were broadly outlined.

Robert E. Hannegan, new Democratic national chairman, and "Dear" ALBEN BARKLEY rang the changes on the old familiar refrain, "Don't change horses in midstream."

Mr. Hannegan didn't quite compare Almighty God unfavorably with Franklin D. Roosevelt. But he did call the President a man of destiny, the best man among us to serve as Commander in Chief for the duration of the war, and the American best equipped to hold up our end in establishing a just and durable peace.

If we should vote Mr. Roosevelt out of office next November 7, Mr. Hannegan foresaw disaster for us. The "vision and idealism of Woodrow Wilson" would be "submerged by the cynicism and the opportunism of another Harding." Mr. Roosevelt was part of a great historical process which must be completed without interruption.

Mr. Hannegan then went into a long smear of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York—indicating that the New Deal leaders fear Dewey more than they fear any other possible Republican Presidential candidate.

Dear ALBEN BARKLEY, taking up where Hannegan left off, tried to grab for a Democratic administration, headed by a Democratic President, all the credit for the enormous United States war effort. Apparently American industry, American labor, and American soldiers, sailors, airmen, and taxpayers have had nothing to do with it.

The "don't change horses," "indispensable man" keynote was keened when Senator BARKLEY said that "we cannot afford" to let the disputes of a political campaign retard the momentum of our war effort—though he big-heartedly said that he personally was willing to see the election held as now scheduled by the Constitution.

During the political campaign it is now clear that the new dealers hope to sell the majority of the voters on the proposition that Mr. Roosevelt is indispensable, and that 135,000,000 Americans will be defeated in war, or ruined in peace, or both, if they don't reelect him.

The argument is a complete phony. No man is indispensable; no man ever has been.

The argument against changing horses in midstream is only another wording of the "indispensable man" argument; and it is equally phony.

Plenty of horses have been changed in plenty of midstreams, to the great benefit of the riders. England swapped Asquith for Lloyd George in World War No. 1, and Chamberlain for Churchill in World War No. 2, and British war fortunes looked up after each swap.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT CHANGES HIS MIND

Mr. Roosevelt himself once understood all this clearly, and took the horse argument apart in a crisp and forceful way. Winding up a Jefferson Day address at St. Paul, Minn., on April 18, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt said:

"There will be many in this Nation during the coming months who will implore you not to swap horses crossing a stream; there will be others who will laughingly tell you that the appeal should have been worded: 'Do not swap toboggans while you are sliding downhill.' But it seems to me that the more truthful, the more accurate plea to the people of the Nation should be this: 'If the old car in spite of frequent emergency repairs has been bumping along downhill on only two cylinders for 3 long years, it is time to get another car that will start uphill on all four.'"

Those remarks are to be found at pages 638-39 of volume 1 of The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt. The chapter carrying the speech is entitled: "The First Campaign for the Presidency, 1932; Part 1—Before the Nomination at Chicago, July 1, 1932."

The passage, too, stands on its own feet in the speech. Tacked to it are no qualifying remarks, no ifs, and or buts. That was the way Mr. Roosevelt felt about the "indispensable man," "don't change horses in midstream" tommyrot in 1932, when he was first running for President; and those were the words with which he torpedoed that tommyrot. A neat job of torpedoing it was, too.

Since that time, Mr. Roosevelt obviously has changed his mind.

One Hundred and Sixty-fifth Infantry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. FAY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. FAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a letter I received from Col. Gerard W. Kelley, present commander of the Fighting Sixty-ninth, known as the One Hundred and Sixty-fifth Infantry. I had the honor of serving with this regiment in the First World War. Its history is resplendent with victories during the early fighting of the Civil War. In the present war the regiment had the honor and glory of capturing the island of Makin in the Pacific, during which engagement the commander, Col. Gardner Conroy, was killed. The present commander, Gerard W. Kelley, is a boyhood friend of mine, he lived in the old section of New York, called the "Old Gas House District." The regiment is located in my district and most of its commanders and personnel were from the neighborhood. We are proud of Gerard Kelley and of our beloved regiment, and know that just as they were fighting at the gates of Sedan when the armistice was signed in the last war, they will be at the gates of Tokio when victory is achieved.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-FIFTH
INFANTRY, A. P. O. 27,
San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR JIM: Thanks for your kind note of congratulations. The signatures of Rosemary and John and Mae Byrnes and Ed O'Connor made it that much warmer, because Eighteenth Street has never left me and is always a source of pride to me. I owe it so much.

Your letter gave me a pleasant boost because not many people (outside of Madaline, Violet and Gene) realize how much the Regiment has meant to me all my life. With all of West Point, Regular Army and other influences, I still thought and think that this is the greatest Infantry outfit in any Army. As a boy, under the influence of the Duffy's and then Allie Anderson I had hopes of belonging to it. I don't remember ever having confidence that I could command it. The commander of it was always a "big shot" in my eyes.

Knowing that you are one of the few people who can conceive of the above, I am sure you will understand when I write that I am very humble in the realization of my responsibilities.

In addition to training the individual to fight better than the Jap and thereby live longer, I am fighting for the gas house, New York Americans of Irish ancestry, and everything that has been dear to us, and our parents. That's a big order in anybody's book. I'm not afraid of it but I'm going to need the prayers of those at home. Even as we prayed for you a quarter of a century ago.

Please give my kindest regards to Hazel and all the Fays and the gang in the neighborhood who remember me.

My very best.

JERRY.

A President's Wartime Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of May 14, 1944:

A PRESIDENT'S WARTIME POWER

When the Government, on the eve of a decision on its application for an injunction in the Montgomery Ward case, withdrew from occupation of the Ward plant, it left Federal Judge Holly without an issue to decide.

Whether the judge would have ruled on the extent of a President's wartime powers may never be known. It is noteworthy that there never has come a conclusive ruling on this question.

Attorney General Biddle's declaration that "No business or property is immune to a Presidential order" seemed sweeping. Much was made of it. It does have elements that raise serious questions. More startling was Mr. Biddle's declaration that "particularly in time of war the court should not substitute its judgment for that of the Executive." That is a doctrine which would logically mean there is no authority in the courts in time of war. This phase of the Attorney General's reasoning will not be accepted by a democracy which believes in courts as the protectors of constitutional right.

Mr. Biddle also declared that the President has "a great constitutional reserve of power." That is true, and how great that power is, what its limits are, has never been decided by final court authority. But how can it be if the question revolves around an emergency? The emergency is not known beforehand, and its shape is never predetermined.

Lincoln in his first inaugural dealt with complaints of Southern States that constitutional rights had been invaded. He said:

"No organic law can ever be framed with a provision specifically applicable to every question which may occur in practical administration. No foresight can anticipate, nor any document of reasonable length contain, express provisions for all possible questions."

Lincoln wrote later: "If a commanding general finds a necessity to seize the farm of a private owner for a pasture, an encampment, or a fortification he has the right to do so and to so hold it as long as the necessity lasts." He telegraphed General Fremont in 1862: "You are authorized to purchase the 400 horses or take them, wherever or however you can get them."

This, it will be said, applied to military occasions, while our forces were facing an armed foe. But Lincoln went beyond that. He drew on what Attorney General Biddle calls "a great constitutional reserve of power." He operated for weeks at the beginning of the Civil War without any express authority from Congress. He suspended habeas corpus. He proclaimed the slaves free in regions in rebellion against the United States.

None of these acts was ever decided on its constitutionality. Why not? Because, with a war on, Congress accepted what had been done. The results of the war were satisfactory to the prevailing opinion of the country.

If now some court were to decide—and the decision might possibly reach the Supreme Court while the war is still in progress—precisely the limitations of a President's power, what would it mean? First, a demand for congressional authorization to the President. And if this were held unconstitutional, a demand for amendment to the Constitution.

Meanwhile an emergency might arise, unforeseen by Congress, unforeseen by the Court, but great enough to have the whole country demanding that the President act. That such an emergency might be far greater than Fremont's need of 400 horses 80 years ago will be generally agreed.

We have worked out in this country a way of living together in which no clearly written provision of the Constitution may be violated, but which leaves the Constitution flexible. This gives the President, any President, a reserve of power. His authority for its exercise may be taken to court, or the President may be impeached if the prevailing opinion of the country is that he has abused the power.

Meanwhile Government is not helpless in the face of emergency, as it almost certainly would be if some court, or many courts, had undertaken to draw up precise specifications of a President's wartime authority.

Placing American Legion Insignia on Veterans' Markers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM M. RUSSELL

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I know of no organization that has done more to advance the cause of Americanism than the American Legion. For many years, their sole aim has been one of service to our country. Every member of this organization has the interest of our country at heart and they are willing to do everything possible in the interest of same. No sacrifice is too great for a member of the American Legion to make at this time, as each member is willing to go the length.

In my district, the American Legion Post at Albany, Tex., has passed a resolution recommending that markers furnished by the Government to deceased veterans provide for the emblem of the American Legion to be placed on such markers whenever requested to do so by the relatives of the deceased. I heartily agree with this resolution and in order to advance such a move, I am including herewith a copy of the resolution.

To the Congress of the United States:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has provided for a headstone or grave marker with certain emblems and inscriptions thereon for deceased ex-servicemen, to be shipped, without cost to deceased's relatives, to point of destination; and

Whereas the said headstones are more than grave markers, they are testimonials of honest and faithful service by the Government whom they served, and are highly appreciated by Legionnaires and their families; and

Whereas the emblem of the American Legion is a symbol of service to community, State, and Nation in time of peace for those who served their country in time of war: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States further provide that the emblem of the American Legion may, and shall be, placed upon the headstone or grave marker of deceased Legionnaires entitled to same, at the request of relatives or responsible persons, accompanied by statement or certificate of post adjutant that deceased was a member of the therein-named Legion post at time of demise; be it further

Resolved, That the headstone or grave marker, when bearing the Legion emblem, shall have the religious emblem placed in the upper left-hand corner thereof with the appropriate date of birth thereunder, viz, 9-18-1890, and the Legion emblem placed in upper right-hand corner thereof, bearing appropriate date of demise thereunder, viz, 5-20-1942; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Hon. TOM CONNALLY, of the United States Senate; a copy to Hon. SAM RUSSELL, of the House of Representatives; a copy to National Commander Warren H. Atherton; a copy to Department Commander Sam D. Forman, Jr.; and a copy spread upon the minutes of Guy Taylor Post, No. 61.

Approved and recommended by Guy Taylor Post, No. 61, Department of Texas, Albany, Tex., May 4, 1944.

Commander.

The 12 Federal Reserve Banks Should Be Public Institutions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, there must be jobs awaiting them when the men come home from this war.

No "ifs" and "ands" will do, nor can mistakes and blunders be excused.

Jobs there must be—good jobs and full opportunity. It is not a question whether this is to be done but how.

It will require a high rate of production and a high national income—at least at $125,000,000,000 a year. It will require full employment of all willing and able American workers, since, without that, 11,000,000 soldiers can hardly be employed, even with a preferential status. It will require, therefore, the one mainspring that can cause full employment and a high production rate—namely, a full home market, a correspondingly high level of consumer demand for goods.

It is altogether probable that a period of prosperity—perhaps even a period of boom—will immediately follow the end of the war. How long it will last, no one can foresee, but it will be followed by a time in which powerful economic forces will tend and work toward a deflation of our monetary supply and our country will be threatened with depression and a period of unemployment. While there is yet time, therefore, we must prepare to meet and to defeat these forces and we must develop a means whereby we can, above all, prevent any serious decline in the American home market for the products of our agriculture and industry.

There will be no single touchstone to success in this great battle to win the peace. A good many more than one measure will be required. But I know no more logical first step than for Congress to recover its constitutional power to issue the Nation's money. The simplest way to do this is for Congress to purchase from the member banks of the Federal Reserve System the stock of the 12 central banks which they now own and thus to make of those central banks a true national bank of issue.

In every Congress since I have been a Member I have introduced a very simple bill to accomplish that purpose.

BANK OF ISSUE SHOULD ALWAYS BELONG TO THE PEOPLE

Now this measure rests on two utterly unassailable principles of justice and good government. The first is that the function of original creation of money is essentially a governmental function and cannot be delegated away to any private agencies—as it is now delegated to the banking system—without violating the fundamental sovereignty of a nation. The second principle is this: That it is elemental economic justice that whatever advantages derive from the creation of any volume of the medium of exchange—whether by coinage or printing of money or by expansion of credit—should always accrue to the people generally and never to any privileged or selected group of them.

The ridiculousness of our present practice has never been more forcibly stated than by Christopher Hollis in his book, The Breakdown of Money, where he says:

Indeed the historian has to record that in almost every age there was some superstitution or other of utter unreason which strangely occupied the minds of men, otherwise of activity and vigor. He has to confess that he cannot explain how it was that men once believed in the mystical significance of numbers or in the claims of astrology. We are sometimes ready to congratulate ourselves that our age has outgrown all superstitions. But the historian of the future will, I fancy, reckon in the same class as number worship and astrology and the study of the gizzards of birds the strange superstition that, whenever money is invented, a percentage must be paid forever afterward as a propitiation to a banker. It is on that superstition that the whole empire of Mammon is built.

RICARDO OF BANK OF ENGLAND

This is no new problem, nor are the two principles just set forth new principles. As long ago as 1824 the great economist, David Ricardo, left behind him at his death an unanswerable argument in favor of having the English Government instead of the private Bank of England issue the nation's money. In the course of Ricardo's argument he included the following paragraph, which has a strangely familiar ring to it:

If the view which I have taken of this subject be a correct one, it appears that the commerce of the country would not be in the least impeded by depriving the Bank of England of the power of issuing paper money, provided an amount of such money, equal to the bank circulation, was issued by government, and that the sole effect of depriving the bank of this privilege would be to transfer the profit which accrues from the interest of the money so issued from the bank to government.

THOMAS JEFFERSON

And Thomas Jefferson, founder of the Democratic Party of the United States, has left behind him the warning which we may well heed today:

If the American people ever allow private banks to control the issuance of their currency, first by inflation and then by deflation, the banks and corporations that will grow up around them will deprive the people of all their property until their children will wake up homeless on the continent their fathers conquered.

Today, however, the case for this move rests not alone on theoretical grounds, or on those of principle, but on the facts of the present situation as well.

BUSINESS OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS TODAY

Twelve years ago only 20 percent of the earning assets of the 12 Federal Reserve banks consisted of United States Government securities. Today over 99 percent of their earning assets are United States Government securities. The detailed reasons for this change would take a long time to discuss. But the main fact is that the business of the Federal Reserve banks today consists almost entirely of creating money and lending it at interest to the United States Government. When the Federal Reserve banks buy Government bonds, they buy them with credit created for the purpose—with entries on their books. But the people of America pay interest on those bonds from that time on. This sovereign Nation has given to these privately owned banks the power to create its medium of exchange. But on the other hand, the Treasury of the United States must raise by means of taxes the money to pay the interest on or to retire the bonds which were purchased with costless credit by these private banks. We are paying interest to the Federal Reserve banks for the use of the credit of the Nation itself, which is all on earth the Federal Reserve buys the bonds with. This situation is wrong and should be ended by the purchase by the Government of the stock of the 12 Federal Reserve banks from the present owners—the member banks. Then the bank of issue of America would be, as it should always have been, a bank belonging to the sovereign people of the Nation.

In a paper entitled "The Nature of the Federal Reserve Banks," written by Mr. E. A. Goldenwiser, Chief of the Research Division of the Federal Reserve Board, we find this statement:

The Reserve bank derives the funds available for its loans and investments from powers conferred upon it by Congress. The capital it has is prescribed by Congress and constitutes a small part of the funds at its disposal. The other sources of the funds of the Reserve banks is its power to issue notes and to accept and create deposits.

Note the words "create deposits." It is with these created deposits that bonds of the United States are bought.

WAR FINANCING

On February 6, 1942, a bill was presented to the House to permit Federal Reserve banks to purchase bonds of the United States directly from the Treasury. This was in the middle of a great war, but there was no special provision concerning the interest on the bonds. Interest was to be paid as usual, even in the midst of a war and dire national need, and even though the bonds were bought by privately owned banks of issue with the people's own credit. At that time I offered an amendment to the bill, which read as follows:

And provided further, That all obligations of the United States bought directly from the Treasury by any Federal Reserve bank shall be non-interest-bearing obligations.

But my amendment was not adopted. And the Nation as a whole, including the men actually fighting this war, were consequently committed to the continuance of the payment of interest on their own credit.

Thus, in order to finance this war, we print interest-bearing bonds at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and deliver them to the Federal Reserve Board. In payment for the bonds the Board simply creates what is called "Reserve bank credit" and enters such credit as a demand deposit in favor of the Treasury. The Federal Reserve has obtained ownership of a portion of the interest-bearing debt of the whole American people and has given back to the people a non-interest-bearing checking account in an amount equal to the principal of the bonds. Thereafter if there is need for Federal Reserve notes, those same bonds can be used as collateral for an issue of Federal Reserve notes. Those notes in turn are printed at the same Bureau of Engraving and Printing which originally printed the interest-bearing bonds.

According to the terms of the Federal Reserve Act, "Federal Reserve notes, to be issued at the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board for the purpose of making advances to Federal Reserve banks through the Federal Reserve agents as hereinafter set forth and for no other purposes, are hereby authorized." In other words, Federal Reserve notes can be "made available" to member banks of the System for their use, but cannot be "made available" to the United States Government unless it pays interest upon them. Should the Treasury of the United States seek to borrow any such money which is the principle currency of our country today, it would have to borrow it at interest from a private banking institution. Nevertheless, every Federal Reserve note bears upon its face these words: "Redeemable in lawful money at the United States Treasury or at any Federal Reserve bank." The only thing that lawful money could possibly be is money issued by the United States Government. Therefore, it is perfectly clear that the Government of the United States must stand behind and, if called upon, redeem every dollar of Federal Reserve notes which is issued.

And so the power to issue money, which has been given to the privately owned Federal Reserve banks, is, in the final analysis, supported, and the notes resulting from the exercise of that power are, in the last analysis, made valid by the constitutional power of Congress to "coin money and regulate the value thereof." The question inevitably arises, therefore, why Congress should not exercise this constitutional power in the first place instead of literally presenting to the Federal Reserve banks the interest which is now paid to them upon the credit of the Nation itself.

HOW THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT HAS WORKED

The original Federal Reserve Act, section 7, paragraph 1, provided that the Federal Reserve banks should pay a small rate of interest to the Government on all Federal Reserve notes issued. This was no doubt done because it was so plain that the money-creating power was being delegated by Congress to these banks. But by one method or another this requirement has been avoided, and no such interest has ever been paid. Again the original Federal Reserve Act, section 16, paragraph 4, required the payment of a franchise tax by the Federal Reserve banks to the Government in the form of the delivery to the Treasury of all surplus over and above the guaranteed 6 percent dividend on the stock. This provision was repealed in 1933, so that no franchise tax is now required. It was the hope in 1913 that the Federal Reserve System would prevent the growth of financial monopoly. Instead about 75 giant financial houses control about half the assets of the entire banking system of 15,000 banks, and the squeezing out of small independent banks proceeds apace with the march of branch banking and the growth of holding companies.

It was the hope originally that the Federal Reserve System would prevent booms and depressions. But the fact is that the worst and most disastrous depression in all American history took place with this system in operation, and was undoubtedly caused in part by the deliberate and cruel deflation carried out in 1920 by the orders of the then Federal Reserve Board itself. And the present Board tells us that it has no power adequate to prevent either disastrous inflation or deflation if certain forces favorable to either of these conditions should assert themselves. Should inflation of bank credit start to take place the Board has not the power either to raise reserve requirements or to engage in open-market operations to a sufficient extent to check it.

Under the threat of inflation the Board ought to sell Government bonds so as to take money out of circulation. But if it did so, it might—in peacetime at least—contribute to a collapse of the Government-bond market and cause the price of such bonds to sharply decline. So this power is ineffectual. As to the even more serious menace of deflation there is nothing in the present Federal Reserve System that can effectively check it. For at present we solely depend for the supply of money to carry on the war work or peacetime business of this Nation upon the private banking system creating money in the form of demand-deposit figures for the purpose of making loans at interest. At the present time almost 85 percent of those loans are made to the Covernment of the United States rather than to private borrowers.

In times when there is need for additional money in circulation such as was the case during the depression, every bank in the Nation seeks to call in its loans, to restrict the making of new loans, and thus to bring about a more and more severe contraction of the monetary supply of the Nation. On the other hand in periods like the present when additional money is not needed and when the creation of additional money might contribute to a serious inflation, the banks attempt by every possible means to loan additional money, thus bringing on an inflationary expansion. It is natural enough that the banks should do these things. They are only seeking to protect their self-interest. But it is not either natural, logical, or right to permit the entire economic fate of the whole Nation to be subject to periodic booms and depressions by leaving the entire control of our monetary supply at the mercy of the self-interest of the private banking business.

I do not think it is necessary to go on. The 12 central Federal Reserve banks now belong to the member banks of the System. The stock is worth a par value of about $154,000,000. But with the ownership of that stock goes the power of control over the monetary system of America. The total paid-in capital stock of the 12 central banks—all the money the member banks have ever paid in for their stock ownership is $154,000,000.

By spending the $154,000,000 to purchase the capital stock of the central Federal Reserve banks from the private member banks Congress would do the following things for the American people:

First. Acquire an accumulated surplus of over $200,000,000.

Second. Reduce the public debt by some $11,500,000,000, the amount of United States bonds, notes, certificates of indebtedness, Treasury bills, and guaranteed securities held by the central banks on December 31, 1943, and bought with reserve bank credit, which, as has been explained, is the credit of the United States and the people thereof.

Third. Restore to Congress its constitutional duty and right to issue the Nation's money and regulate its value. The Federal Reserve banks are now the bank of issue of America. As such they should be—they should always have been—an agency of Congress and the property of the American people.

Fourth. Place our Nation in the position of being able to answer the problem of interest-bearing public debt.

Fifth. The purchase by Congress of the 12 central banks would mean that the Nation could earn its way out of debt, that when the Federal Reserve Board purchased—as it normally does—outstanding Government bonds from member banks in order to expand the volume of money and credit in circulation, in line with increasing production, those bonds would belong to an agency of the Government and would in effect have been retired without the necessity of any tax revenues being used to do so. Interest upon such bonds would, of course, be saved. Hence by increasing their production the people of the Nation would, if only the 12 central banks were a Government institution, be able to earn their way out of debt.

If Congress does not do this, we will have to account to the Nation for our failure to do it. We will have to try to explain to the people why we marshalled all other resources for national defense but left control of the Nation's own credit in private hands. We will have to tell them why we failed to take this constructive action, even when the welfare of a Nation was at stake. We will have to tell them we deliberately decided to afflict them with an interest-bearing debt when we might by a simple act have avoided doing so.

FUNDAMENTAL MONETARY PRINCIPLES

The bank of issue of America should be a Government bank belonging to the people and paying into circulation under the explicit direction of Congress such money or national credit as the national economy may require to maintain in our dollar a stable buying and debt-paying power in our domestic market. And such national money or credit must be placed in circulation debt free at the point of origin, which in every case must be the National Government. If this Congress did nothing else but pass a bill making the 12 central Reserve banks Government institutions, it would go down in history as one of the greatest Congresses of all time. This one measure will not solve all our problems, but it will put us in a position to attack them from a point of vantage that will give substantial hope of real and speedy success.

The text of my brief bill follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed forthwith to purchase the capital stock of the 12 Federal Reserve banks and branches, and agencies thereof, and to pay to the owners thereof the par value of such stock at the date of purchase.

(b) All member banks of the Federal Reserve System are hereby required and directed to deliver forthwith to the Treasurer of the United States, by the execution and delivery of such documents as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, all the stock of said Federal Reserve banks owned or controlled by them, together with all claims of any kind or nature in and to the capital assets of the said Federal Reserve banks, it being the intention of this act to vest in the Government of the United States the absolute, complete, and unconditional ownership of the said Federal Reserve banks.

(c) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any funds not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

The Federal Reserve banks are to all intents and purposes the banks of issue of the United States; they put Federal Reserve notes, our principal currency, into circulation. They have been given gold certificates which give them a lien against over $20,000,000,000 of the gold in Fort Knox. They create money at will in the form of Federal Reserve credit and when they do so they obligate all the resources of all the people to make that credit good. They execute the open-market policy of the Board, which determines largely the price of Government securities, as well as the volume of money in circulation; they rediscount for the commercial banks. But the Government and people of the United States own not 1 penny of stock in these banks. They belong lock, stock, and barrel to the commercial banks which are members of the Federal Reserve System.

The Federal Reserve banks should become the property of the American people and they should be operated as one central bank of issue under a specific mandate passed by the Congress. Their sole purpose should be to serve the general welfare of all the American people, their agriculture, commerce, and industry, by providing at all times a dollar of steady, stable, and constant buying power.

French Phoenix

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of an editorial from the Washington Post, of date May 16, 1944, as follows:

FRENCH PHOENIX

The brilliant fighting qualities displayed by the French troops at Bir Hacheim are being demonstrated anew in the present fighting in Italy. Entrusted with an important and difficult section in the Cassino area, the French and North African troops under General Juin have distinguished themselves. Theirs has been the honor of opening the first important gap in the Gustav Line by capturing two key strong points—the towns of Castelforte and Ausonia.

The symbolic as well as the practical significance of the French action in Italy can hardly be exaggerated. It was 4 years ago next month that France went down to defeat under circumstances that left deep scars on the minds and hearts of democratic Frenchmen everywhere. The sense of humiliation was great, and everything that the Vichy regime has done since has only intensified that feeling. Fortunately there were Frenchmen who not only refused to accept the armistice—that was probably true of a great many inside France—but were also in a position to continue the fight against Nazi tyranny. They have nobly acquitted themselves. Now they stand shoulder to shoulder with Americans, Englishmen, New Zealanders, Indians, Poles, and other allied units in a campaign which marks the opening stage in the final struggle against the Wehrmacht.

It must be an inspiring moment for Frenchmen everywhere. As Lt. Gen. Mark W. Clark, commander of the Fifth Army, declared in a communication to Gen. Alphonse-Pierre Juin, the French commander, the French troops in Italy are "proving to an anxiously awaiting France that the French Army has returned, sacred to its finest fighting traditions." What has been done in Italy is an earnest of what will be done in France. In France there is another army of Frenchmen, a silent army, an army recruited under the very eyes of the Germans. Four years ago France was drinking the dregs of defeat and betrayal. France now awaits the hour of liberation, not passively but as a full-fledged participant in the common struggle. We share France's pride in French arms in Italy. There is a France.

Our Post-War Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, as we look toward the future and the post-war world, no one can do so without facing the haunting fear that the same disaster which confronted the American farmer following World War No. 1, will come again at the conclusion of this war. We need not come from districts which are wholly agricultural in order to share this great concern. It should be perfectly clear to all, regardless of the particular kind of economy he represents, that unless agriculture is prosperous, or at least it is able to receive a fair and reasonable return for the crops and livestock raised, there cannot be any assurance of prosperity for any of us. Agriculture is our basic industry, and its prosperity or its failure has a decided influence upon the lives of our people.

Without doubt, our American farmers are our greatest producers. By that same token they are our largest consumers. There has never been an overproduction of farm products, but there has frequently been an underconsumption of them. Our farmers have frequently been unable to consume desirable commodities produced by others, because they have been unable to purchase such desirable commodities—in other words, our farmers could not afford to purchase them because of their limited income. After this war is over—and we hope that glad day will soon come—our farmers will doubtless find themselves unable to purchase many desired commodities for their use precisely as they found themselves following the conclusion of World War No. 1. Our farmers had lost their markets, and they were unable to purchase, on the open market, those many commodities which they desired but which they were unable to purchase.

Mr. Speaker, after our farmers lost their markets they found themselves trying to discharge their obligations which had been incurred during the days of high prices while living at a time of greatly deflated farm prices. There are many pet schemes advanced for the salvation of the American farmer, but I do not know of any sound or adequate solution of this problem of preserving and improving farm prosperity, except to secure him against the loss of his market for his produce at a fair price therefor. Many people believe that the enactment of H. R. 1649, which has the support of many people in this Nation, and which measure should, perhaps, be designated as the national insurance plan, will aid materially in solving this portentious problem.

During this war we have witnessed the wholesome effect of a broad scale of the circulation of money, and the effect it has had upon increasing the national income. Certainly, if the national income can be raised in time of war, that same rule would apply to the advantage of all in time of peace. By the provisions of the measure, above referred to, it is planned to establish and maintain a sound and equitable market for the farmers, based upon the consumer's need and his ability to pay, and upon the cost of production to the farmer with a fair margin of profit assured to him in his own markets. Under this plan it is proposed that a tax be levied against all citizens, based upon the gross income, payable monthly and which tax would approximate 3 percent after exempting the first $100 of individual income, thereby creating a fund which would be available for use in creating the proposed circulation of money. Under this proposed plan, each month there would be apportioned, equally, among the aged people, who are unemployable because of age, illness, or infirmity, or because they are widows who are supporting children, and each recipient would be required to spend the money thus received within the next 30 days after the receipt thereof. The net result would be a tremendous circulation of money, and the money so provided would be kept in circulation. This plan has been proposed by many of our people as a means of meeting the post-war problems.

Mr. Speaker, the key to the maintenance of business, agricultural prosperity and every progress in our economic life is the turn-over of money. There is no other method of securing a sound and continued prosperity. The antitoxin which may be used against new and more terrible depressions in the future rests in the hands of the people. Legislation, such as is now proposed, has won for itself enthusiastic support from the general public and from many Members of Congress. It is claimed that it would aid materially in solving our post-war problems. In order to avoid great distress in the future among our people, and among our farmers, we should make every effort to get our own house in order to meet the serious problems of the future. The present is the time to act upon the program for the future. When the depression strikes it is then too late to apply the remedy. Let us look well to the future, and to the welfare of the people of this great Nation.

Federal Aid for the Readjustment in Civilian Life of Returning World War No. 2 Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. FAY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. FAY. Mr. Speaker, before recording my vote in favor of this bill, the object of which is to provide care, treatment, guidance, training and help for the veterans of this war, I have taken considerable time in analyzing its various provisions and in consultation and discussion with experts in every field encompassed by its provisions. I did this, not out of any distrust for either its objectives or provisions or the administrative machinery set up by it to insure the veterans' welfare. Too close to my heart is the solution of their problems, and alas! too vivid indeed are my memories of their distress, indignities, and sufferings after the First World War, in which I served and gave my right leg. With the fertility of these ever-present memories, I have as part of me, a firm resolve that the boys of today, the veterans of tomorrow, who are now suffering, shedding their blood and giving their lives, may have and hear the most eloquent assurances from the halls of this Congress, that theirs will be a different lot—a better lot.

With the purposes of this bill my heart and soul are in tune. But I want to be sure we are providing our veterans with something real, not merely crumbs, nor a political sop to lull them into temporary quiescence during a time of national political shadowboxing. Too often I have seen pacific, but highly inadequate measures rushed through the legislative mill for just this purpose. I do not lay any blame for this at the door of this honorable House nor any specific Member of it. The fault and cause lies in the huge volume of considerations before this body and the limitations of chronological time to deal better or more fully with them.

History will no doubt record the acts of this Congress as among the most stupendous and important ever entrusted to the representatives of this Nation, during the most critical time of its existence. Our treatment of the veterans' problems and affairs will indeed be a criterion by which we shall be judged. And rightly so. Because as we legislate on these matters here and now will depend not only the welfare of more than 40,000,000 of our people in the years to come, but the quality and intensity of their devotion to their country and their willingness to suffer and die if necessary to preserve it. And, gentlemen, if economic cycles mean anything, our post-war conditions may well call for loyalty even beyond the hazards of war itself.

This act, cited in lines 9 and 10 of page 44 of the bill, as the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, is an excellent initial step, but calls for a great deal of amplification and clarification, lest its enforcement and administration go the way of so many legislatively well-intentioned programs which run afoul on the reefs of red tape or administrative arrogance. Consider the provision found in lines 19 to 24 on page 49 of the bill, which provides that no veteran will be deprived of the benefits of this act, for any wrongdoing in service while he was "insane." What shall the basis for such a determination be? After all, there is such a thing as shellshock, or as they have labeled it in this war, "Battle fatigue." Who shall judge that for the veteran returning from this war? Can we leave so important a matter to future chance, or the whims of theorists in the fields of psychiatry or neurology? I do not believe so, because as noble as these great professions are and as great as their services have been to us and to all mankind, we must remember that other noble callings have been burdened by unscrupulous and sometimes unconscionable men and that even the pulpits have given us a share of rogues and scoundrels. We must provide the standards for this condition and all similar broad conditions described in this bill, which will either grant or deny the veteran the benefits we are here attempting to assure to him. It is true the bill, in section 301, provides the machinery for reviewing the difficulties of a veteran who is not eligible for relief under this act by virtue of something he did, or did not do in service. But even this is too vague and the powers and limitations of the reviewing authority thus set up are too general ever to give it the humanity which the veteran had, when he fought and died for all of us.

Then there is the question of post-war education for the veterans as provided for in subsection 1 of part 8 on page 52 of the bill. This provides among other things that education or training will only be given if the veterans' "Education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interferred with by reason of entry into the armed services." If it was, he can get as much as 4 years of training and education at Government expense. If his education was not so interrupted, and so forth, he can only get a refresher course not to exceed 1 year.

Now why the distinction? The college boy who left his freshman, sophomore, or junior year to bear arms for his country certainly risked no more than many of the sons and daughters of your constituents and mine, whose education had either ended or never begun.

We are headed for a period in our history when we will need a great many more highly trained and skilled men and women to remake this world after the war and to reestablish our own economy and social order, than we have ever needed before. And who will most likely do as good a job at that as those who risked their lives and suffered to preserve it?

Gentlemen, that provision needs some serious thought and calls for some change. There are amendments to this bill now pending, and after listening most attentively to the discussions of them and the debates on them on the floor of this House I fully realize we are striving to insure the veteran a maximum of benefits. We must, however, provide for them with a minimum of administrative claptrap and a set of standards which will guarantee equal facilities to each and all veterans, with artificial discriminations against none of them. Remember, they are fighting and dying together without the slightest ideas about the next fellow's educational background. Let us provide adequately that those of them who return to us may grow and progress together. We cannot hope to do this by unequal educational facilities and opportunities.

May the record show clearly, however, that I am in favor of the act as a starter in the right direction. First, it provides and guarantees adequate hospitalization, treatment, care, and physical rehabilitation for the returned veteran. To this end it even ranks the administration of this care second only to the needs of the Army and Navy, and grants all priorities necessary to administer it properly. It provides for more hospitals and even sets up sub and local stations for treatment and care of the veteran. This makes available to the sick and ailing veteran the time-respected therapeutic value of proximate love from the veteran's family. There will be no self-imposed exiles such as there were after the last war, where veterans withered up and died in oblivion. Nor will there be any all-filled-up signs on any hospital where the veteran applies for treatment. There will be adequate beds and a prohibition against reducing their number. Never under this act will there be waiting lists for veterans' treatment. This bill makes someone guilty of a crime if such a thing ever happens again. It has teeth in it, and that is why I believe it is a good and healthy step forward. But we must not be satisfied with mere steps. We must keep on stepping until we have formulated a perfect routine for the veterans' future well-being.

Another World War No. 1 abuse which this bill eliminates is the easing out of a veteran before he is cured and ready to take his place in life. Under this act he cannot be discharged from a curative institution until he knows his rights and signs himself out. And even this must be explained to him by a responsible officer of the institution and his rights read to him. But even after this, if the veteran requires further care or treatment, he may return to the hospital and be sure of getting it.

Other phases of this bill which delight me no end provide for loans to veterans to enable them to buy or build homes, or farms, or to get into business. This time veterans will not be just tossed out of service and, with a few paltry dollars, told, in effect, to sink or swim.

We aim to send him back to life as healthy and well as science can make him; to train him for making a decent living; to help him get started in business by aiding in purchase of business or farm properties; to help him with employment placement. And finally, we aim through this bill to help him make his own home—the type of American living he fought to preserve for all of us.

My one great skepticism about the bill rests in its administration. Provision has been made in it for the various problems arising under it. These are fine. But I still intend fighting for my bill introduced at this session of the Congress, to put the responsibility for enforcement and administration of all veterans' laws, including this one, directly under the President of the United States. This can be accomplished, as I advised this House during March of this year, by having the head of Veterans' Administration, a member of the President's Cabinet.

Gentlemen of the Congress, I am voting for this bill, not as a cure-all for veterans' ills, nor the final pay-off for what they are doing for the Nation and for civilization. But I recognize and accept it as a beginning—a good beginning in the right direction, upon which a grateful Nation can build a lasting and suitable testament for history that the veteran to whom we owe our lives, our fortunes, and our futures, will not only be regarded as the savior of civilization—but rather the object, purpose, and measure of whatever civilization we may attain.

O. P. A. Rough-Rice Ceiling Does Not Make Sense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to again call to the attention of the Congress that I have been, together with the Senators and Members of Congress from the rice-producing States, protesting the placing of a ceiling price on rough rice by the O. P. A., and we have previously placed in the RECORD our arguments to the effect that such a ceiling price is unnecessary, unfair, unreasonable, discriminatory, will be ruinous to the rice producers and industry, and will, as a result, reduce production of this important food crop. Mr. Speaker, the O. P. A. has been intransigent in this as well as other instances, and since we are unable to obtain any consideration from that agency, it will be necessary for us to appeal to the Congress for relief by offering an amendment to the Price Control Act when the same is presented for consideration in the near future. Mr. Speaker, as a further evidence of the untenable position of the O. P. A. I desire to have included in these remarks a copy of an editorial from the Crowley Daily Signal, of Crowley, La., the rice center of America, as follows:

RICE CEILING DOES NOT MAKE SENSE

Anybody can make a mistake, and the people do not expect infallibility even in our Government bureaus. However, when a mistake is made and the fault is pointed out to the Government by experts who know the situation, and still nothing is done to remedy it, the people have a right to complain and question the capability of those in charge.

The O. P. A. made a mistake when it placed a ceiling on rough rice. The reasons why it is a mistake are very simple. They have been explained in Washington by men who know what they are talking about. The situation is not a complicated one, nor would it be difficult to remedy.

The plain facts of the case are that, because of the high cost of labor and material, growers must put out more money on crops, yet are not allowed to sell their rough rice at a price that will allow them any margin of profit. The farmer spends more but gets less. On the other hand, the millers, not hindered by such rigid Government control, are allowed to buy the rough rice at a low price, process it, and sell it at a fat profit. These facts are obvious to everyone but the men who are in a position to do something about the situation.

Even the most disinterested person will understand the unfairness of the ceiling, and common sense and fair play should convince anyone that it is a mistake. It is not difficult to understand why the O. P. A. has made the blunder which will prove disastrous if not corrected. The men who investigated and decided upon the case of rice ceilings were either not familiar with their subject or were working for the favor of rice millers who will grow rich under the regulations. The O. P. A. has done a half-way job by not getting to the bottom of the case.

And the incompetency in handling the situation will affect not only the rice growers, but the rest of the Nation as well. Laboring under the present regulations, the rice grower is not encouraged to plant as much as he formerly did. The Government tells us that rice is important to the war and we must grow more of it, yet prevents us from doing so by a foolish blunder which it refuses to correct.

Price ceilings are established to reduce inflation, and are a boon to our economic system when handled correctly. But the rough rice ceiling, instead of reducing inflation, is reducing production of a vital food. Today Japan controls 95 percent of the world's commercial rice. Yet we are placing our production in jeopardy by policies which will curtail that cutput. Unless price and production are placed in balance they will result in a program of subsidies. Subsidies will not help because they themselves are inflationary. Two of our greatest problems today are inflation control and production, and each must be handled separately. Price ceilings are not a cure-all, and they alone will not stave off inflation. Instead of jeopardizing our vital rice production with a remedy that will not work, the Government should concentrate on absorbed savings and taxation to do the job.

The issues at stake in the rice situation are too important to be tinkered and experienced with by men who continue to insist that the price ceiling is a remedy when common sense shows otherwise. The whole matter now lies in the hands of the O. P. A. It is they who made the mistake and they are the ones to remedy it. Our growers and Louisiana Congressmen have done all they can to make the Bureau realize its mistake and have suggested workable remedies. The fate of the Nation's rice production can be decided only by men who are jeopardizing it. We trust that common sense and fairness will cause them to change their present policy.

International Air Transport

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly concerned as to the welfare of our present and future international air-transport operations. Prior to the war this country was represented in the international field by the Pan American Airways System—an organization which did an outstanding job in placing the American flag at the forefront of international aviation. During the war, American Export Airlines and a large number of our experienced and capable domestic operators have been conducting air-transport operations abroad under contract with the Army and Navy. High officers of the Army and Navy agree that these contract operations have been of immense value in the prosecution of the war. They have actually changed the course of the war in important theaters. This, of course, has been the paramount benefit of the international contract service. But of almost equal effect upon the long-range welfare of this country has been the great accumulation of experience in international operations and overocean flying which these domestic air lines and American Export have acquired. This experience will be of incalculable value to this country when the war is over and our international air services must go out and meet vigorous competition from the air carriers of other nations.

During recent hearings before a subcommittee, of the House Committee on Appropriations considering the Navy Department appropriation bill for 1945, members of the subcommittee expressed doubt as to the wisdom of continuing certain of the civilian contract services—pages 875–881. These members indicated the belief that public funds could be saved by canceling these contracts, since the Navy had, since the war began, acquired experience in long-distance air transport operations. In the first place I am convinced that study would show that cancelation of these contracts would not save the public any money. Secondly, and more important, we would be playing into the hands of our future international competitors if we cut off these important contract services now. The British are not contemplating the adoption of any such short-sighted policy. The British Air Ministry is building up British Overseas Airways Corporation as rapidly as possible. I invite the attention of the House to the following quotation from a statement by Sir Archibald Sinclair, the British Secretary of State for Air, presented to the House of Commons on February 29, 1944:

The route mileage of the British Overseas Airways Corporation increased by over 20 percent in the last year, and, in fact was, in 1943, four times as great as the combined route mileage of Imperial Airways and British Airways in 1938. That does not look like putting civil aviation into cold storage. Their routes include the North Atlantic service, on which they have flown regularly during the whole of three winters, services to Stockholm, to Lisbon, down the west coast of Africa, to Cairo, and on to Turkey in the north and India in the south, besides the important route from Durban up to the east coast of Africa to Cairo, and so on by Baghdad and Basra to Karachi. So the horizons of the British Overseas Airways Corporation are in no respect narrowed by the coexistence of Transport Command, but are, on the contrary, expanding, and its resources are growing.

This country has long been a leader in international air transportation, just as it was a leader in merchant shipping during the era of clipper ships. Let us not, through the hasty adoption of a short-sighted and unwise policy, lose our supremacy in air transportation as we did in shipping.

Solicitude for the Veteran of All Wars Is Our Patriotic Duty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, for the past 5 legislative days the House has had under consideration S. 1767, popularly known as the G. I. veterans' bill. This bill is one of the most important and far-reaching pieces of legislation ever introduced in the House. The honor of writing this bill cannot be claimed by any individual. It is the culmination of the efforts of many individuals and organizations. The American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and many other veteran groups and veteran leaders have helped with their suggestions. The members of the World War Veterans' Committee have labored diligently and sincerely to produce the best bill possible. Several clarifying amendments have been accepted on the floor, and I am confident others will be offered and accepted. I shall be quite frank and say that the bill does not conform 100 percent to my personal ideas. There are some provisions I would like to see changed.

Many of the Members fear the concentration of power in the hands of one administrator, and on the other hand we know the waste and inefficiency that resulted after World War No. 1 by the division of services and responsibilities into various agencies. Therefore I feel that this bill in its many provisions is an attempt to compromise the views of many men into a practical workable piece of legislation.

The main purpose of providing just treatment for the veterans of World War No. 2 has been adhered to. The experience in dealing with similar problems after World War No. 1 has been invaluable. The long, hard fight of the veterans of World War No. 1 for decent treatment has formed the foundation for this piece of veterans' legislation.

The men and women engaged in this war, will reap with scarcely a struggle on their part, in a legislative sense, the results of all the experience and organizational strength of the veterans of the previous World War. The present Congress, which includes among its Members many veterans of World War No. 1, has shown a fine nonpartisan spirit in considering the present G. I. bill as well as many previous pieces of veteran legislation.

Since my first day in Congress I have supported all the legislation brought before the House for consideration, which had as its purpose the veterans' welfare. I yield to no man a higher regard or more sincere admiration for those men and women who have left their civilian paths and entered the armed forces of our country.

The resources of America which they are preserving, in many instances with their maimed and broken bodies, should be mobilized in such a manner that their rehabilitation and readjustment into civilian life can be assured.

Of course it will cost money. Of course it means more taxes for all of us, but without their efforts and sacrifices we would have lost all our physical possessions. Our tremendous natural resources and productive machinery would have been lost to a Hitler or Tojo. We would have lost those things more important than physical wealth. The wealth of the spirit. The liberties of free men and the dignity of our souls. Shall we draw back then at the expense necessary to partially show our appreciation? Our Nation stands secure today from the invader because of the bravery of these men and women of the armed forces, the veterans of tomorrow.

The future of our Nation will be in their hands when they return. In their absence we must take the necessary steps to prepare for that return. They must be assured of a place in our economy. The able-bodied must be provided jobs. The sick and disabled must be provided with adequate hospitalization. Where vocational or academic education is desired, it must be made available. Where homes or farms are needed, provisions for long-term, low-interest loans must be made. Many of these men and women will not return, their bodies will remain buried in strange lands. To their dependents we owe not only a financial obligation we must try to discharge, but a debt of gratitude which a thankful people can never repay.

I rejoice that the Seventy-eighth Congress has moved steadily toward the goal of veteran rehabilitation and readjustment. We have not been stampeded by a section of the press, which for its own gain has constantly criticized and denounced the present Congress. The record is being written for all to see. Much has been accomplished, more remains to be done. I am proud to have had a part in writing the record of the Seventy-eighth Congress in veterans' legislation.

New $8,500,000,000 Lend-Lease Item Astounds Senate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of May 6, 1944:

NEW $8,500,000,000 LEND-LEASE ITEM ASTOUNDS SENATE

(By William Moore)

The Senate, astounded by a new $8,500,000,000 lend-lease item, abruptly halted consideration of the administration's plea for a 1-year extension of the lend-lease program yesterday.

Senator TAFT (Republican), of Ohio, sharply questioned administration leaders on the possibility of efforts to carry lend-lease spending into the post-war period.

DELAYED UNTIL MONDAY

The Senate then postponed voting until Monday to give Members a chance to study an eleventh-hour report on lend-lease and related spending which disclosed an extra $8,500,000,000 of spending.

The report, made public Thursday by Chairman MCKELLAR of the Appropriations Committee after the Senate had begun consideration of the lend-lease measure, was crammed with facts which Senators said they would demand to know more about before voting to extend lend-lease.

Senator BUSHFIELD (Republican), of South Dakota, drew especial attention to this one: Although lend-lease spending reported before the $8,500,000,000 extra was discovered is charged to President Roosevelt's $24,500,000,000 lend-lease appropriation, lend-lease transfers up to $36,000,000,000 are also possible from funds appropriated to the War and Navy Departments and the Maritime Commission.

SILVER MINTED IN BRITAIN

Some surprise was occasioned in the brief session today when Senator TAFT drew from Chairman CONNALLY, Democrat, of Texas, of the Foreign Relations Committee, the information that silver, supplied by the United States as metal, has been minted by the British. The coins thus produced, CONNALLY said, will be used in the Near East and other parts of the world.

The report over which the Senators expect to spend the week end is 36 typewritten pages long, accompanied by voluminous charts. Its subjects range from a project described by Senators as a "WPA" for banana trade work in Honduras to American buying aggregating $4,172,856,091 in foreign lands.

The report was compiled by investigators whom MCKELLAR's committee had assigned to get the entire picture of lend-lease from the various Government agencies. But the committee members had not even seen the report until MCKELLAR produced it Thursday as speed was being urged in passage of the extension.

The report showed that lend-lease reported as such now totals $21,794,237,819. But other spending in foreign lands, which Senators say is part of lend-lease operations, bring the actual total to $30,362,687,362.

NINETEEN BILLION TO BRITISH

The hitherto undiscovered $8,500,000,000 extra was spent, lent, or given away by a number of Government agencies, principally the Army and Navy, the foreign economic administration and the Export-Import bank.

Senator BROOKS, Republican, of Illinois, said this is the first time that the lend-lease spending of agencies which do not report directly to lend-lease authorities has ever been uncovered.

The largest share of the extra $8,500,000,000 went to the British. MCKELLAR reported that they got $15,640,479,250 of the funds actually reported as lend-lease. But the British share of the over-all total was $19,700,297,674.

M'KELLAR ERROR ADMITTED

Latin America received $2,327,378,789, as MCKELLAR explained the figures. But Senator BUTLER, Republican, of Nebraska, who recently charged that the United States has spent $6,000,000,000 boondoggling in South America, said MCKELLAR's statistics do not change the $6,000,000,000 estimate.

Senators said MCKELLAR has admitted being in error and that a statement mutually satisfactory to him and BUTLER will be made Monday.

The report said the Honduran banana workers were left idle by the halting of banana exports. So the State Department and Nelson Rockefeller's Inter-American Affairs Office put them to work building a road.

FOR COASTAL PROTECTION

Various agencies succeeded in spending $427,742,152 in Brazil. Of this $100,000,000 went into coastal protection on the theory that the Germans would travel 1,800 miles to invade the country. MCKELLAR reported that the investigators have the list of expenditures in each Latin-American country but can't make them public "for obvious reasons."

MCKELLAR and CONNALLY said in response to questions by TAFT that they don't believe lend-lease funds may be legally used for post-war projects. MCKELLAR and CONNALLY said further that they didn't think the Arabian oil pipe line could be charged to lend-lease, and agreed with TAFT that Congress should specifically pass on any nonwar lend-lease spending.

The United States History of Pensions and Veterans' Aid From 1636 to 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, on the evening of April 26 it was my pleasure to participate in the program commemorating the second anniversary of the organization of the David A. Hurt Post, No. 203, Regular Veterans Association, at Groton, Conn.

It was my privilege to discuss with the large number of men and women who attended those ceremonies, the history of pension legislation in the United States, and the various steps taken by this, the Seventy-eighth Congress, to assist the men and women in the service of the past and present wars, and their dependents.

Under the unanimous consent accorded me by the House, I submit the address delivered by me on that occasion. It follows:

National Commander Floyd, of the Regular Veterans Association, Commander Bolen, and members of David A. Hurt Post, No. 203, members of the Auxiliary, and ladies and gentleman, I first wish to express my sincere appreciation for the hospitality that has been shown me since I have arrived here in Connecticut. I am quite sure that the men and women who are stationed here at this submarine base, as well as nearby naval bases and Army camps, coming from the several States of our great Union, have enjoyed as much as I have the hospitality of the good people of Connecticut. Now and then it's well to come up New England way. Its culture and history have had its effect on all of our 48 States, and, in fact, not only on our States, but our insular possessions. It was from the fine coast line of this State that the ships manned by Connecticut Yankees sailed the trade winds to the 4 corners of the earth, and the term "Connecticut Yankee" was known wherever trading ships touched foreign ports. It is the history of this part of our Nation that has always had a special intrigue to me. The history of Connecticut and New England is too well known to you folks for me to take up time to reiterate any of it to you.

This is a gathering of veterans and members of our armed forces and their wives and sons and daughters. I thought perhaps you would be interested if I would discuss briefly the history of pensions and pension legislation, and then some of the very recently enacted laws that are of benefit to our veterans and their dependents, particularly to the present members of our armed forces and those who have been discharged after having rendered an honorable service during the present conflict.

I wonder how many of you ever tried to visualize or, for that matter, given thought to conditions in the pre-Revolutionary War period, when the boys of the Colonies were frequently disturbed by Indian uprisings, and, for that matter, inter-Colonial scraps. The recorded history of our Colonies refer to many instances of relief of the wounded and maimed soldiers.

Probably the first pension law enacted in America was in 1636, when the pilgrims of Plymouth by their courts enacted a law that provided that any man who should be sent forth as a soldier and return maimed should be maintained competently by the Colony during his life. There had been a prior law enacted in 1624 by the Colony of Virginia, which passed a resolution which read as follows: "That at the beginning of July next, the inhabitants of every corporation shall fall upon their adjoining salvages, as we did last year. Those that shall be hurte upon service to be cured at the publique charge; in case any be lamed, to be maintained by the country according to his person and quality."

Incidentally, this act was ineffective because it did not receive the approval by the mother country. Thus, the Plymouth Colony, in fact, really enacted the first effective pension law in America.

In 1676 regular meetings in "Boston towne house" were held by a standing committee of the General Court of Massachusetts Bay to hear applications of wounded soldiers for relief. After the union of Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay Colonies under the charter of 1691, the Province continued to make provision for the relief of disabled soldiers out of the public treasury.

A disability pension law was passed by the Virginia Assembly in 1644, and later this Colony made provision for the relief of the indigent families of soldiers who should be slain. In the colonial statutes of Maryland and New York similar acts are found. Rhode Island in 1718 enacted a pension law providing an annual pension for disabled soldiers, and for the wife, children, parents, or other relatives of one slain in the Colony's military service, so long as these relatives were unable to provide for themselves.

In the Maryland Colony a certificate from the country court was requiring stating that "he, she, or they are objects of charity," before payment could be made. These provisions for monetary benefits by the several Colonies were almost without exception offered as an inducement to enlist and were considered a part of the pay.

With the outbreak of the Revolution, the disability pensions provided by the various Colonies were, for the most part, continued until that terrible winter of 1777-78, when Washington became convinced that all would be lost unless something were done to stop the resignations among his officers. His solution of the problem was to promise all officers who should remain in the service to the end of the war, half pay for a period of years after its conclusion, or for life. The first national pension law was passed by the Continental Congress on August 26, 1776, and promised half pay for life or during disability to every officer, soldier, or sailor losing a limb in any engagement, or being so disabled in the service of the United States as to render him incapable of earning a livelihood. On May 15, 1778, half pay was promised for 7 years after the conclusion of the war to officers who should continue in service to the end of the war. Incidently this law was passed only after the most violent opposition on the part of many Members of Congress, to the establishment of what was designated as a "favored class." In the early trying days of the newly born Nation, the money was not always in the Treasury to pay the pensions after the same had been granted, much being promised but little realized. Many were paid in commutation certificates payable to pensioner or bearer and drawing interest at 6 percent, but these were not readily redeemable and many pensioners were compelled to part with their certificates as low as 12½ cents on the dollar. The earliest pension acts of 1789 and 1790 did not specify any procedure for the administration of the pension system other than to provide that the pensions granted should be continued under such regulations as the President might direct.

The President accordingly placed the administration of these earlier laws under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War, although Congress still retained control of the actual allowance of claims. Under the general pension law of 1792 the duty of adjudicating pension claims was imposed upon the United States circuit courts with the requirement that they should report their actions to the Secretary of War. This action brought objection from all the judges as an unwarranted interference with the judiciary and resulted in Congress enacting the law of February 28, 1793, which required the judges of the United States district courts or commissioners appointed by them to receive the evidence in the claims and submit it to the Secretary of War, who then placed the individual claims before Congress for action.

It will be noted that Congress still reserved the power of final adjudication. This law also was objected to by the judges, and a new pension law, which gave the Secretary of War final power to allow claims, was enacted in 1803. This authority remained unchanged until 1828, when the administration of the law granting pensions to Revolutionary War survivors was placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and then in 1835 it was retransferred to the Secretary of War. Also during the period from about 1799 to 1832 pensions were paid from the Navy pension fund under the administration of the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War. However, in 1832 the full management of the fund was placed under the Secretary of the Navy. On March 2, 1833, the Congress enacted a law providing for the appointment of a Commissioner of Pensions under the direction of the Secretary of War, who was charged with such duties.

When the office of Commissioner of Pensions was created James L. Edwards, of Virginia, who had served as principal clerk on pension work in the War Department for a number of years, was appointed the first Commissioner of Pensions at a salary of $2,500 per annum. His office force consisted of a chief clerk at $1,600 per annum, 4 clerks at $1,400 each, 2 clerks at $1,200, 5 clerks at $1,000, 8 clerks at $800, and 1 messenger at $300 per annum—a total force of 22 at an annual cost of $23,800.

At the beginning of the Civil War the personnel of the Pension Bureau numbered 72, with a total salary of $95,340. That part of the pension business transacted under the Secretary of the Navy was also transferred to the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Pensions. The office of Commissioner of Pensions was continued from time to time by subsequent legislation until the act of January 11, 1849, which gave the office a permanent status.

In this year the Department of the Interior was established, and the Bureau of Pensions became a part of the new Department. The Secretary of the Interior was given certain supervisory and appellate powers. The Bureau of Pensions continued in this status until July 21, 1930, when it was made a part of the new Veterans' Administration in conformity with the act of July 3, 1930.

VETERANS' ADJUSTED-SERVICE PAY ACT OF 1944

Earlier this evening, over the facilities of radio station WMLC, I discussed in detail the provisions of the Veterans' Adjusted-Service Pay Act of 1944, which I introduced at the request of your national commander, W. M. Floyd, and the heads of other national service organizations.

I know the questions that are put before Commander Floyd and his representatives when they appear before congressional committees in support of legislation like my bill, H. R. 4335. The very first question that the presiding Congressman or Senator asks him is, What is the membership of the Regular Veterans Association? Naturally, you have a young and growing organization, and it is not as large as some of the other organizations, but your national commander has the interests of the organization at heart and is working night and day to build up the organization He is ably representing them not only before the several committees of Congress but before the War and Navy Departments and the Veterans' Administration. He has been your national commander for less than a year, but I can attest to the fact that he is highly respected and has built up an enviable reputation as a champion of the veterans and the members of our armed forces.

It, therefore, proves that the harder you individual members work, both of the Regular Veterans Association and its auxiliary, the more support and the greater incentive your national officers will have. I say to you that it is to your advantage to go out on the by-ways and seek new members. You have an excellent opportunity with all of the men in the armed forces in this vicinity, and it is apparent that both Posts 203 and 182 are alive and awake. I say keep up the good work and I trust that in the not too distant future you will have double or triple your present splendid membership. One never gets anything without working for it, and the harder the members of the Regular Veterans Association and the members of its auxiliary work, the better can be the results, and you will increase the prestige of your national officers in all of their activities before the several governmental agencies.

VETERANS' LEGISLATION

I want to discuss some of the legislation that is of interest to men and women in the armed forces and to their dependents; also I want to call attention to legislation that has been passed which is very important to those who have been discharged on account of service in the present global war.

SOLDIERS' VOTE

Preliminary to this discussion, however, I want to mention the provisions of the law which entitles men and women in our armed forces to a vote in the coming elections.

Public Law, 277, Seventy-eighth Congress, which provides for such a ballot, became a law some time ago without the approval of the President. This legislation was designated in the newspapers as a compromise and I supported it. Prior to its enactment there was legislation providing for the so-called bobtailed ballot, which consists of almost a blank piece of paper and provided that men and women in the armed forces could write in their choice for President, United States Senator, and Member of the House of Representatives. There was no provision in the bill granting men and women in the armed forces the opportunity to vote for State and county and local officials. Public Law 277 gives men and women in the armed forces that privilege. The War Department under date of April 3, 1944, issued Circular No. 128, giving in detail the procedure to be followed in voting by members of our armed forces. Of course, the Minnesota Legislature has passed a splendid law which will facilitate the voting of every man and woman in the the service of their country. I take this occasion to suggest to relatives of every man and woman in the Army, Navy, or Air Forces to contact the county auditor of the county in which such person has legal residence and see to it that the county auditor is requested to have a ballot sent to the person in the service. Under the Federal statute, Public Law 277, and under the law enacted by most State legislatures there is no reason why every member of the armed forces cannot vote. Any statements to the contrary are false and circulated purely for political and propaganda reasons.

LEGISLATION AFFECTING MEN AND WOMEN IN THE ARMED FORCES AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

Congress has passed many laws which are to the advantage of those in the service of their country. I have always suggested legislation aiding the veteran of our armed forces, his wife or widow, his children or his estate. I would suggest that interested parties confer with the service officer of their local veterans' group because they have the necessary information and can advise fully as to rights and procedure. A great many people are not familiar with the rights and benefits under the various laws enacted by Congress, and I would again repeat that it is important that they confer with the service officers.

I have been informed that you have a most efficient one here at David A. Hurt Post 203, Lt. George B. Owens.

I will now discuss legislation in which you are perhaps more particularly interested.

BENEFITS PROVIDED BY LAW FOR VETERANS OF THIS GLOBAL WAR AND THEIR DEPENDENTS WHILE IN THE ACTIVE MILITARY OR NAVAL SERVICE

Active service in the Army or Navy during the present war includes active service in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard and the personnel is composed of regular officers and enlisted men, members of the Army and Navy Nurse Corps, female reservists, National Guard men called into active service, volunteers and selectees, and persons appointed to the armed forces from civilian life. The Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard are included among those in the active military and naval service. The Office of War Information, in its release of April 6, 1944, announced that the Army of the United States has reached its planned strength of 7,700,000 officer and enlisted personnel, but will require 75,000 to 100,000 men a month throughout the remainder of 1944 to maintain that strength. The Navy Department has estimated that it would reach a strength of 3,500,000, including the Marine Corps and Coast Guard personnel, by July 1, 1944, and that approximately 300,000 men will be needed to reach that net strength and at the same time provide necessary replacements. An additional 100,000 men will be added to the net strength of the Navy between July 1 and September 1, 1944.

ACTIVE-SERVICE PAY

The Pay Readjustment Act, 1942, as amended, increased the pay of privates from $21 to $50 per month, with proportionate increases for noncommissioned officers to $138 per month for master sergeant or chief petty officer, first grade. Longevity pay was improved by adding 5 percent to the base pay for each 3 years of service up to 30 years. A 20-percent increase is provided for enlisted men and 10 percent for officers on sea duty or in any place beyond the continental United States or in Alaska. Active flying duty increases base pay by 50 percent and active parachutists duty increases the base pay by $100 per month for officers and $50 per month for enlisted men. Similar liberal increase is provided for submarine and diving duty. The Pay Readjustment Act, 1942, as amended, also provided entitlement for retired personnel to adjustment of retired pay.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

The Servicemen's Dependents Allowance Act of 1942, as amended October 26, 1943, provides family allowances for dependents of any enlisted person, male or female. A rate of $50 per month is provided for a wife where there is no child; $80 per month if there is a wife and one child, with $20 for each additional child; a rate of $42 per month if the enlisted man has no wife but one child, with $20 for each additional child; a rate of $50 is provided if the enlisted man has one parent dependent upon him for chief support, but no dependent brother or sister; $68 if such enlisted man has one parent and one brother or sister dependent upon him, with an additional $11 for each dependent brother or sister; a rate of $68 per month is provided if the enlisted man has two dependent parents but no dependent brother or sister, with $11 additional for each dependent brother or sister. A rate of $42 per month is provided if the enlisted man has no dependent parent but has a dependent brother or sister, with $11 for each additional dependent brother or sister. The monthly pay of the enlisted man is reduced by or charged with the amount of $22 per month for any month in which an allowance is paid with an additional $5 if the dependents include more than one class of dependents.

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS

The Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended, provides for a temporary suspension during the war and for 6 months thereafter of legal proceedings and transactions which may impair the civilian rights of persons in the active service. These rights involve rent, installment contracts, mortgages, insurance, taxes, homestead rights, and so forth. The primary purpose of this act is to relieve members in the military service from worry over their inability to settle their civilian liabilities by reason of reduced income because of military service. It does not relieve a soldier from the obligation but provides a means of relief. The courts are given jurisdiction to stay the enforcement of certain obligations.

In title IV of this act, which is administered by the Veterans' Administration, any person in active service having a commercial life policy or policies meeting the requirements of the law, upon application to the Veterans' Administration upon a form supplied by the Army and Navy may secure guaranty of premiums on the amount of insurance not in excess of $10,000 while he is in the service during the present global conflict. The premiums guaranteed by the Government constitute a lien and must be paid by the company out of any settlement. In the event of the discharge of the insured, he has a period of 2 years within which to pay the premiums with interest so guaranteed, otherwise the indebtedness constitutes a lien upon the policy with interest. As of March 31, 1944, 72,204 applications, with insurance totaling approximately $178,000,000 have been approved and premiums guaranteed.

NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

Members of the active military and naval service may at any time while in such service file application for national service life insurance, which is administered by the Veterans' Administration. If the service person applies within 120 days after enlistment or enrollment no medical examination is required, otherwise satisfactory evidence of good health must be furnished. Insurance in the amount of $10,000 with premiums paid by the Government is available for aviation cadets of the Army Air Corps; enlisted men detailed to schools as aviation students, participating frequently in aerial flights; cadets at the Military Academy while undergoing flight training; enlisted naval and Marine Corps Reserve or cadets undergoing training as aviation pilots; and aviation cadets of the Navy or Marine Corps are included within this protection. Upon being commissioned or released from flight duty they must pay premiums on the insurance. This insurance is against death and includes waiver of premiums during total disability existing more than 6 months and commencing prior to the insured's sixtieth birthday. The policy is a 5-year level premium term policy and is payable to specified classes; widow, widower; child, including stepchild or illegitimate child if designated as beneficiary by the insured parent, including person in loco parentis; brother and sister of the insured; and is payable only in monthly installments. The insured may change the beneficiary at any time. If the policy has been in effect for at least 1 year, while in force it may be converted into an ordinary life policy, 20-payment life, or 30-payment life policy upon application to the Veterans' Administration, without examination.

As of March 30, 1944, over 14,000,000 applications had been received representing a total of over $105,000,000,000 of insurance. The average policy is approximately $7,382.69; the average coverage per life is $8,926.74. In the event of the death of the insured the policy is payable as an annuity in 240 monthly equal installments of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance to any beneficiary under 30 years of age at the time of death of the insured; otherwise it is payable in continuous monthly installments throughout the life of the beneficiary with a guaranty of a payment of 120 monthly installments. Under the latter method of payment, the amount of the monthly installment is dependent upon age of the beneficiary. For example, if the beneficiary is 40 years old, the monthly installment is $4.50 for each $1,000 of insuranee; if 50 years of age, $5.39 per each $1,000; if 60 years of age, $6.81 per each $1,000; or if 70 years of age, $8.51 per $1,000. Taking those particular ages and a policy for $10,000, the monthly installment would be $45 if the beneficiary is 40 years old; $53.90 if the beneficiary is 50 years; $68.10 if the beneficiary is 60; and $85.10 if the beneficiary is 70. Claims for insurance benefits should be addressed to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C., but the necessary forms may be secured from the nearest Veterans' Administration facility.

GRATUITOUS INSURANCE

Any person in the active service on and after October 8, 1940, who, while in the service, and before April 20, 1942, died in line of duty without having in force at the time of death insurance under the War Risk Insurance Act, as amended, or the World War Veterans' Act, as amended, or the National Service Life Insurance Act, as amended, in an aggregate amount of at least $5,000 is deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance in the amount of $5,000. This gratuitous insurance is payable to the widow or widower; or if no widow or widower, to the child or children; or if no widow or widower or child, to the dependent mother or father of the insured, if living. Provision is also made for gratuitous insurance to those who within such period suffered line-of-duty disability for 6 months or more without having in force an aggregate amount of $5,000 insurance under the acts aforementioned. The law also provides for gratuitous insurance to those who, prior to April 20, 1942, were captured, besieged, or otherwise isolated by the forces of any enemy of the United States for a period of at least 30 consecutive days and extending beyond April 19, 1942.

DEATH GRATUITY

A death gratuity equal to 6 months' pay at the rate received by the veteran at the time of his death in line of duty is payable by the War and Navy Departments. Provisions for payment of this gratuity are administered by the Service Department having jurisdiction of the person in the armed forces, and the benefit is payable to persons within a certain class. Application for the 6 months' death gratuity should be submitted to the Chief of Finance, War Department, Washington, D. C., if the person served in the Army; Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, Washington, D. C., if the person served in the Navy; Commandant United States Marine Corps, headquarters, United States Marine Corps, Washington, D. C., if the person served in the Marine Corps; and to the Commandant, United States Coast Guard, Washington, D. C., in the cases of members of the Coast Guard.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

With certain exceptions set forth in the act of February 3, 1944, members of the armed forces discharged or relieved from active service under honorable conditions on or after December 7, 1941, may receive mustering-out pay. The rate is $100 if there was service of less than 60 days; if the person served more than 60 days in the continental United States, the rate is $200, payable at the rate of $100 upon discharge and $100 1 month later; if the person served more than 60 days and served outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska, the amount is $300, payable at the rate of $100 upon leaving service, $100 1 month later, and $100 2 months later This pay is in addition to whatever regular pay and allowances to which the person may be entitled. Persons entitled to base pay of over $200 per month or who are retired with pay, or who were discharged at their own request to take a job, or who served only as a student in the Army educational program are not included for mustering-out pay. If the person served overseas, however, he would be entitled to mustering-out pay, even though discharged at his own request. Mustering-out pay is exempt from taxation and is not subject to the claims of creditors.

IN-SERVICE EDUCATION

Extensive programs of in-service education, including the retention in service of persons whose disabilities do not disqualify them completely for active service for readjustment into proper activities in the armed forces, have qualified and will qualify thousands of persons for lucrative employment after the war, and in a great many instances it has been possible for persons to supplement their education while in the active service, so that in many instances the handicap from an educational standpoint has been materially reduced.

REEMPLOYMENT

The Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended, preserves employment rights of persons entering the military and naval training forces who occupied permanent positions at the time of entering service. These provisions are administered through the Employment Division of Selective Service. These provisions apply both to Government employment and private employment to insure restoration of the veteran to the former or similar position upon his discharge or release from the armed forces. It is necessary to apply for reemployment within 40 days after discharge.

The United States Employment Service, Veterans' Placement Service, with local agents, are ready to assist veterans in getting a job.

HOSPITALIZATION

Members of the armed forces are provided with all necessary medical care and hospital treatment, and their rights upon discharge as veterans of World War No. 2 will be stated later.

OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS' AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

These benefits are administered through the Federal Security Agency and the operation of State plans. Practically all of the States have enacted legislation protecting the unemployment-insurance credits of persons in the armed forces and legislation is pending to make certain that all necessary protection is afforded the insured workers who are in the service and to liberalize in any other manner which may be justified the laws governing these benefits.

RETIREMENT PAY

In addition to the regular retirement of officers and enlisted men of the armed forces, Reserve officers and officers appointed to the Army of the United States from civilian life and enlisted men with 20 years or more of service may be retired for disability incurred in service in line of duty and in such event they are entitled to three-fourths of their base pay, which is paid by the Veterans' Administration upon certification of eligibility by the War Department.

BENEFITS ADMINISTERED BY THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION AND PERTAINING TO WORLD WAR NO. 2 VETERANS

The Veterans' Administration administers pension to disabled veterans of the present global war, their dependents, national service life insurance, hospitalization and domiciliary care, and vocational rehabilitation for the service disabled as well as some other benefits, which I will not enter into at this time.

The Veterans' Administration has 94 facilities throughout the country. To give you an idea of what has already taken place in connection with benefits to veterans of this war and their dependents, I will give you a few figures. From December 1941 to January 31, 1944, there had been paid to veterans of the present war for service-connected disabilities over twelve and one-half million dollars, and in addition approximately $700,000 in retired pay administered by the Veterans' Administration. There had also been paid approximately eleven and one-half million dollars in pension to dependents of deceased veterans of this global war, making a total expenditure of approximately $25,000,000. You will understand that this is an accumulated figure and the expenditures are of a continuing nature and are increasing steadily. Between December 1941 and January 31, 1944, the Veterans' Administration had paid national service life insurance cash benefits for death in the amount of approximately $20,000,000. Over the same period the cost of hospitalization and domiciliary care, veterans of this global war, was over $9,000,000. Through February 29, 1944, there had been approximately 52,500 admissions of veterans of this global war for hospitalization or domiciliary care. The number remaining under such care at the end of February 1944 was 11,622.

PENSIONS

Pensions are payable for disability or death incurred in or due to active military service in line of duty and not the result of the person's own misconduct. Disability pension is payable to any person honorably discharged depending upon the degree of disablement, ranging from 10 to 100 percent, with payments from $10 to $100 per month. For specific losses, as the loss of a hand or foot, blindness, and so forth, additional amounts are payable, the highest rate being $250 per month. Death pension is payable where the veteran of this global war died as the result of service-incurred disability. The rates of pension are: Widow, with no child, $50; widow, with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child; no widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38, with $10 for each additional child; dependent mother or father, $45, or both, $25 each. As to the widow and children, the total amount cannot exceed more than $100 per month.

REHABILITATION (HOSPITALIZATION, EDUCATION, AND TRAINING)

The first step of rehabilitation is that of physical and mental repair for the service disabled. Medical and hospital care, prosthetic appliances, and domiciliary care are available to any veteran of the present war honorably discharged for a service-connected disability requiring such care, treatment, or appliance, or one who was discharged for disability and not dishonorably discharged, and also one not dishonorably discharged who is unable to defray his own expenses is entitled if he has tuberculosis or neuropsychiatric ailment or disability which requires hospital care. Any veteran of the present war, not dishonorably discharged, suffering from disability, disease, or defect, and who is in need of such care and is unable to defray the expenses therefor is entitled to hospitalization or domiciliary care, notwithstanding the disability, disease, or defect is not shown to be due to service. This latter benefit is contingent of availability of facilities. It might be stated at this point that in the 94 facilities of the Veterans' Administration, as of March 23, 1944, there was a total of 92,019 beds. The Veterans' Administration also has 7 diagnostic centers. The present building program will raise the total beds to 100,000. The Veterans' Administration anticipates and expects an eventual need of 300,000 beds to enable veterans of this global war and of prior wars to receive hospital and domiciliary care to the extent now provided. However, this is an estimated maximum and should not be needed until long after the war or require eventual additional construction of more than 100,000 beds since there will be, under present plans, 100,000 beds in Veterans' Administration facilities, and it is anticipated that it will be possible to obtain another 100,000 beds from the Army and Navy shortly after the termination of the war.

Vocational rehabilitation of the disabled veteran of this global war is provided by the act of March 24, 1943. It covers the veterans of the present war, honorably discharged, and who have a disability incurred or connected with such service which is pensionable or would be but for the receipt of retirement pay and who are in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of the disability. This benefit is administered by the Veterans' Administration through the Director of Vocational Rehabilitation in central office and the planning and control functions are performed there. The operations, which include the determination of the need of training, vocational advisement, induction to training, supervision, and selection of training facilities, are handled by the Vocational Rehabilitation Division in the facility of the Veterans' Administration in the territory where the veteran resides. There are 53 such facilities. The veteran while in training, unless his pension equals such amounts, is entitled to $80 per month if single; $90 per month if married, with $5 additional for each child and $10 for each dependent parent. All expenses of training including necessary transportation, are paid. Medical care is given as required. Persons honorably discharged from the service may make claims for vocational rehabilitation with the nearest Veterans' Administration facility.

TAXATION

Payments under any of the laws relating to veterans are exempt from taxation, exempt from claims of creditors, and are not liable to attachment, levy, or seizure by legal or equitable process. The exemption does not apply to certain claims of the United States arising out of such benefits or to property purchased in part or wholly out of such payments.

PENDING LEGISLATION

There are numerous bills pending in the present Congress proposing to grant additional benefits to veterans and their dependents and which would, if enacted, be applicable to persons who served in the present war. Exclusive of the bills to liberalize pensions and to change the existing law pertaining to national service life insurance, the major proposals are those which would grant aid to veterans of this global war in securing employment; provide reasonable allowances as a protection against unemployment; afford educational and training opportunities without the requirement of a service-connected disability producing a handicap, and centralize in one agency, namely, the Veterans' Administration, the services to veterans without physical transfer thereto of other established agencies or any part thereof.

In addition, my bill (H. R. 4335), which would provide adjusted service pay is pending. I discussed this in detail earlier this evening over Radio Station WMLC. If any person desires a copy of this measure, I'll be glad to send out a copy to anyone who writes me a card or letter requesting it. Furthermore, if any aid or help is ever needed, just write your Congressman. He'll be glad to help you on your problems and your case.

For the information of the people of the Ninth District of Minnesota, my address is: United States Representative HAROLD C. HAGEN, 1620 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Thank you one and all, and good night.

Victory and Peace Not Election Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the permission given to me by the House, I include a pertinent editorial from the Ann Arbor (Mich.) News, which is as follows:

VICTORY AND PEACE NOT ELECTION ISSUES

President Roosevelt now has the endorsement of the C. I. O. president, Philip Murray, for a fourth term, but it does not necessarily follow that the labor organization which he heads will accept his direction to the extent of casting its ballots en bloc in the November election.

Mr. Murray expresses the conviction that "the overwhelming majority of the people of this Nation, regardless of political affiliation, demand reelection" of Mr. Roosevelt. Thus, he would have us believe that Democratic and Republican Party lines will not be observed when it comes to the business of voting. That may be true, but it also may be true that members of the C. I. O. and of other labor organizations will vote primarily as American citizens, with personal feelings on the subject, rather than as union followers. It is difficult to believe that the head of any organization, be it labor or employer, be it church or be it lodge or luncheon club, will have the power to speak for those in the ranks when it comes to expressing their choice, as freemen, for the Presidency of the Nation.

Though not using the term, Mr. Murray suggests that the people will not want to "change horses in the middle of the stream." He says that "our Commander in Chief, President Roosevelt, is the man who, through his policies and action, has demonstrated the will, courage, and statemanship to forge the unshakable unity among the peace-loving common people for victory." But there are other men, among them possible candidates for the Presidency, who have the will, the courage, and the statesmanship, and who believe that unity is essential to victory and for maintenance of the subsequent peace.

Thomas Dewey, for one, has demonstrated courage and idealism equal to those of Mr. Roosevelt. There is every indication that the Republicans will be as determined for victory and for international cooperation to prevent future wars as the Democratic administration has been. There is no reason to believe that a change in the Presidency would upset either the war or peace plans. It is likely, and it is hoped, that this will be made clear, so far as Mr. Roosevelt's political opponents are concerned, long before election day.

The election cannot be permitted to have as one of its issues a question of how vigorously the war is to be waged, how much national or international unity there will be, or whether the C. I. O. or some other organization of workingmen or businessmen or industrialists or anything of the sort is to dominate national or international policies. President Roosevelt is regarded by many Americans as an able war leader, but surely it cannot be believed that he is indispensable to either victory or peace. He has already been in office nearly 12 years, and the strain has been severe, and if he should be obliged to retire from active service, someone else would have to assume the leadership. It has happened, and it could happen again, in the Nation's history. That is why Vice Presidents are provided, and it is why an order of succession among the cabinet members is prescribed by the Constitution.

If an overwhelming majority wants the President to continue in office, he should continue, but it is inexcusable, un-American defeatism for anybody to attempt to tell the American people that they can win the war and have a lasting peace only if Mr. Roosevelt is elected for a fourth term.

Our country has not developed and waxed great on such oligarchic one-man belief.

Benefactor to Mankind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 16, 1944

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a statement of the achievement of Dr. George Harrison Shull. He has contributed much toward the production of food and has made a very important contribution to the Nation and perhaps the world in his creation and propagation of hybrid corn.

He may be one of the unsung heroes of the Nation. He deserves a high place in the history of food production.

It is a statement worth reading and was prepared by an able and talented student in the field of seed propagation, my friend, Gordon Morrison, of the Burgess Seed & Plant Co., of Galesburg, Mich.:

The prophetic slogan, "Food will win the war and write the peace," is spoken with confidence by military and agricultural authorities. We all appreciate the paramount importance of assured abundance of good food. We take pride in the demonstrated capacity of American agriculture, augmented by millions of family food gardens, to provide food for civilian needs, for war needs, for the needs of lend-lease participants, and for the use of millions of famished people presently being released from starvation diets imposed by their erstwhile Axis oppressors.

It is a tribute to the American vegetable and field seed industries and to the American food industries that we have been enabled to meet our own civilian and military needs for food and still be able to ship literally thousands of tons of seeds and millions of tons of food to lend-lease participants.

Nation-wide corn production is responsible in a large measure for our favorable food situation. We all know that corn in abundance is basic to the production of beef, pork, poultry, eggs, and dairy products to say nothing of the growing importance of corn and by-products in the chemurgic industries.

I reproduce herewith from the February 4, 1944, issue of Seed World, a trade magazine published at 211 West Wacker Drive, Chicago, a short article entitled "McCall Reads the Corn Record":

"Never until the last 2 years has the United States grown more than 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn in each of 2 successive years, and never before on as small an acreage," M. A. McCall of the United States Department of Agriculture pointed out recently. This result from the planting of hybrid corn, he cited as an example of returns from using intensive methods in crop improvement. "This experience," he said, "is almost certain to stimulate even wider use of intensive methods with other crops."

"In 1942, an unsually good corn year, hybrid corn, occupied 41,600,000 acres or more than 46 percent of our total corn acreage," he said, "and we produced the largest crop in our history, 3,175,000,000 bushels. In 1943, in many respects an unfavorable year for corn, hybrid corn occupied 49,960,000 acres or 52 percent of our corn acreage, and we produced 3,085,000,000 bushels, the second largest crop of record. The 1942 crop was grown on 89,000,000 acres and the 1943 crop on 94,000,000 acres. The 1920 crop, the third largest at 3,070,000,000 bushels, was grown on 101,000,000 acres.

"Never before have we grown more than 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn 2 years in succession and never before on as small an acreage. On the basis of hybrid corn acreage and yields during the last 6 years, and the average yields during 1923-32 (the last normal 10-year period before hybrid corn came in), it can be estimated that hybrid corn added 629,000,000 bushels of corn to our total crop in 1942, and 669,000,000 bushels in 1943. This is equivalent to adding each year almost one-fourth of a normal crop of corn in years before hybrid corn came into use."

I take this opportunity to call to your attention the individual whose ingenuity has been most largely instrumental basically for the phenomenal improvement in quality and yields of corn throughout the corn-growing industry during the last 15 years, and particularly during these war years.

I refer to Dr. George Harrison Shull who, upon his seventieth anniversary, was eulogized in the April 7 issue of Seed World as the "grand old man of hybrid corn." It seems appropriate to accord hereby general recognition to this great benefactor of mankind whose genius has made possible more bountiful food supplies for all of us.

George Harrison Shull was born in 1874 on a hard-scrabble share-cropping farm near the village of North Hampton in Ohio. The father was a Dunkard minister who farmed all week and preached on Sundays. The father and mother and six sons and a daughter had all they could do to scrape a living out of the farm under a system of rental which required hoeing one row for the landlord for each one they hoed for themselves. The father was a good farmer who paid careful attention to the selection of his own seed corn as he and his six boys husked and cribbed their hard-won crops.

Although the Shull children got their early education the hard way, mostly by study at home, this family of six sons and a daughter has contributed notably during the last 40 years to the advancement of American arts and sciences.

After a period as a youthful country school teacher, George Harrison Shull worked his way through Antioch College, where, during his college career, he was occupied variously as janitor, engineer of the steam-heating plant and waterworks, and as college plumber.

At 27 years of age, George H. Shull entered the University of Chicago, where he became a doctor of philosophy in time to accept, in 1904, a post on the first staff of investigators employed for research in the principles of plant breeding at the Cold Spring Harbor genetics laboratory and field station of the newly organized Carnegie Institution of Washington.

The Carnegie Institution of Washington was established to encourage investigation, research, and discovery in fields not normally covered by other agencies and for the application of newly discovered knowledge to the improvement of mankind. How well the Carnegie Institution planned and how well their first genetic investigator or plant-heredity investigator wrought is illustrated by my brief review of the productive corn researches of Dr. George H. Shull. The results of these researches proved a revelation to other investigators of 35 years ago. Practical seedsmen and corn growers were slow to appreciate and to apply Shull's technique. However, during the last 15 years the use of Shull's technique gained headway in field practice and has resulted in the tremendous improvements in yields and quality of corn that could not have been achieved otherwise.

Dr. Shull's problem in 1904 was to devise and organize fundamental biological research projects with plants, unhampered by consideration of economic consequences and with a conscious avoidance of duplication of work that was being done elsewhere. His corn research of 1904 to 1916 was an outgrowth of a project in pure science, mainly with Evening Primroses, designed to determine the basic principles of the origin and inheritance of new characters, a line of research inspired by the recent rediscovery of Mendel's Principles of Inheritance. However, a plant scientist of Shull's farm background could never treat any botanical research as merely an abstract and theoretical problem. He was, therefore, immediately aware of the practical value of hybrid vigor when it became manifest most strikingly through greatly increased yields of corn in his experiments which were designed primarily to determine the effects of cross-breeding as compared with self-fertilization or inbreeding on fluctuating variability.

In recognizing hybrid vigor, as it was displayed to him in his corn-breeding cultures following crosses between his highly inbred related lines, and in devising a practical method or agricultural technique for obtaining and utilizing hybrid vigor to the utmost through the use of hybridized seed corn, Shull demonstrated with striking clarity how research in pure science may lead to results of tremendous practical value.

The procedure which Shull devised for the practical production of hybrid corn and which he presented in 1909 before the American Breeders Association is in all essentials the basis of methods now used in producing seed of crossed corn for planting upward of 50,000,000 acres of field corn and sweet corn annually in the United States, including almost all of the Iowa corn acreage. The superiority and dependability of hybrid corn is demonstrated most markedly under adverse growing conditions. The trends in corn growing indicate that hybrid corn may soon replace ordinary corn almost completely for planting our annual acreage of upward of 90,000,000 acres. We have reason to believe that general use of hybridized corn seed may enable a somewhat reduced national acreage to produce an annual crop upward of 1,000,000,000 bushel in excess of the best national yields we enjoyed before we had hybrid corn.

Dr. George Harrison Shull and his wife now live in contented retirement at 60 Jefferson Road, Princeton, N. J., gratified that their six children, although scattered north, east, south, and west and even in the Southwest Pacific, are making their own vital contributions to the stirring events of these crucial times. Retirement because of age from his post of 27 years as professor of botany and genetics at Princeton has brought to a close a career of almost 40 years devoted to research in plant genetics because of concomitant withdrawal of funds which had provided running expenses for his projects in pure science. He is very regretful that so much valuable research material accumulated during these years of active research must be lost through failure to find the funds necessary for their continuation.

While hybrid corn now adds scores of millions, if not hundreds of millions, of dollars annually to corn growers' incomes, Dr. Shull has not profited a penny through devising the agricultural technique which is basic to hybrid-born production. He derives much comfort from the fact that his hybrid-corn research has come to be recognized as a classic example of work in pure science which has led directly to economic results of tremendous importance and which has proved of incalculable value in these war years and which may exert even more benign influence in the coming years of world recovery and reconstruction.

Report of the International Labor Organization Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABE MURDOCK

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] and broadcast over the Blue Network of the National Broadcasting Co. on Saturday evening, May 13, 1944, from Washington, D. C.

This address constitutes a report on the activities and the resolutions adopted at the International Labor Organization's conference held at Philadelphia for the past 3 weeks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am here tonight to give a brief report on the great session of the International Labor Organization, which completed its work at Philadelphia last night after 3½ weeks of hard work on the problems of war and peace.

While I was there as one of the two United States Government representatives, I got some experience in making talks like this, because the Office of War Information asked me to deliver commentaries on the conference developments on the overseas radio channels. We made three reports a week during the whole of the conference, which were broadcast in many foreign lands, in the O. W. I.'s effort to tell the world what we were doing in Philadelphia to advance the cause of social and economic improvement over the world.

Official delegates representing employers and workers as well as governments were present from 41 nations. They included all the great powers except Russia. The presence of Australians, Indians, South and Central Americans, and the representatives of the European governments-in-exile, made it a very colorful and exciting event.

Miss Frances Perkins, our Secretary of Labor, was the other United States Government delegate, and she did a remarkable job of leadership. She and I introduced the resolution which was embodied in one of the major acts of the conference—the recommendation to the United Nations that full employment and social advancement, the recognition of every person's right to a job and to security—be made the primary aim of post-war policy, through international action as well as national and local action.

Before I discuss the specific accomplishments of the conference through the declaration of Philadelphia and the recommendations and resolutions which we drafted during the first 3 weeks and adopted in the last few days, I think I should say something about the significance of the meeting. Wartime disruptions of transport had made it impossible to hold an I. L. O. conference since before Pearl Harbor. Only the active support of the United Nations made possible the visits of the delegates from many foreign lands, and many made great sacrifices to get to Philadelphia from their homes.

But the meeting was held, and we all met together and interchanged ideas and opinions. It is one of the beginnings of wisdom and tolerance and peace, to meet the other fellow and find out that, although we may differ on many points, he has aims and aspirations just like those of your own people. It has been heartening to note that Government leaders in wartime have met more and more often across national borders to plan our common cause and to work out methods of war and principles of peace. The International Labor Organization brought to Philadelphia the representatives of workers' organizations and of employers, in addition to Government representatives, and this fact, in my opinion, tripled the usefulness of our meeting.

The great documents which were produced by this conference may in future years compare in importance with the other great charters, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, which came from this same city of brotherly love, if the nations and the people of the world cooperate now as Americans cooperated in the early days of our Republic.

The declaration of Philadelphia is a declaration of war against want. It is a short document, and it lays the groundwork to carry out the promise of the Atlantic Charter's "four freedoms."

The declaration restates in simple language the need of man for a better world, along the lines familiar to everyone who is concerned with social and economic advancement. These aims, such as social security, child welfare, legislation to improve working conditions, and the like, have been the primary concern of the I. L. O. since it was established 25 years ago.

The declaration, however, goes into new territory, and calls on the nations of the world to put into effect, as far as possible, the principle of full employment.

It also enlarges the field of problems of international concern, by recognizing the interdependence of nations and peoples, and by stating the interest of all working people in economic and financial matters. It gives the representatives of all nations, including their workers and employers, through the machinery of the I. L. O., an opportunity to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of this fundamental objective, which I quote from the document:

"All human beings, irrespective of race, creed, or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity."

It goes on to say that the attainment of these conditions must constitute the central aim—and I emphasize "the"—of national and international policy; and that all national and international policies and measures, in particular those of an economic and financial character, "should be judged in this light and accepted only insofar as they may be held to promote and not to hinder the achievement of this fundamental objective."

The declaration then sets forth that the I. L. O. should promote programs among the nations of the world which will achieve full employment, raise living standards, place workers where they can do the best job and get the most satisfaction, provide just wage policies and collective bargaining, extend social security measures, protect the lives and health of workers, provide for child welfare and materity protection, and equalize educational and vocational opportunity.

The declaration then cites the necessity of international action in other fields and pledges cooperation to the United Nations and to any international organizations set up to expand production and consumption, stabilize world prices of primary products, and to promote a high and steady volume of international trade.

Other recommendations and resolutions spell out in considerable detail the principles and policies needed to achieve the ambitious goals we have set for ourselves.

I have time here only for a brief survey of these goals. One of the most important of them is in the resolution on social provisions in the peace settlements. This document takes the lead in our effort to advance social justice in the post-war world. It embodies the strong stand taken by the United States delegation for immediate affirmative action, nationally and internationally, whenever practicable.

This proposal urges nations to subscribe to a set of principles, which are set forth in the form of a treaty. Here are the seven main points:

1. Opportunity for useful and regular employment to all persons who want work, at fair wages or returns and under reasonable conditions, with provision for protection of health and against injury in all occupations.

2. Raising standards of living to provide adequate nutrition, housing, medical care, and education.

3. Establishment of minimum standards of employment to prevent exploitation of workers, whether employed or self-employed, whose opportunities for high-wage employment are limited.

4. Provision for child welfare.

5. Provision for a regular flow of income to all those whose employment is interrupted by sickness or injury, by old age or by lack of employment opportunity.

6. The effective recognition of the right of freedom of association and of collective bargaining.

7. Provision of facilities for training and transfer of labor.

The post-war economic program of international and national problems, embodied in another resolution adopted by the Conference, includes the dynamic proposal introduced by the United States employer representatives for encouragement of enterprise, stimulation of production and technical progress, discouragement of monopolistic practices, and the development of incentives to encourage private investment in constructive peacetime business activities. The importance of well planned public works program, properly timed to help maintain standards of living, is emphasized in this plan, which was pushed also by the United States Government and worker groups.

One recommendation brings together what amounts to a code of social justice for the hundreds of millions of people in the dependent territories of the world, with emphasis upon measures to prevent the exploitation of workers, especially women and children. Among other things, this proposes to increase to 15 years the minimum age at which children may be employed in industrial jobs in these territories, and suggests that the nations controlling them should provide special aid to the workers' cooperative organizations among these peoples.

The Social Security recommendation is a forward-looking set of proposals which go beyond what we have been able to do, so far, in our own rich country. It demonstrates that even here we must go further to attain the full protection against the privations of old age, ill health, and unemployment, which any well-ordered country should provide for all its people.

The average American citizen who is listening to this speech will probably ask, at this point, "How is this I. L. O. program going to affect me? What does all this mean, in terms of action?"

My answer is, that we of the I. L. O. have charted a first small step toward the building of a post-war world in which men, women, and children will be happier and healthier. We have outlined a program which we are taking to the statesmen and politicians of the nations, and more important, to the plain people, too. We are saying to them, "If these things are put into the peace settlements, into your state and national laws, your people will be better off. There will be fewer opportunities for another Hitler to arise and plague the earth if you do these things."

The governments voting for these recommendations and resolution have undertaken moral commitments for which they will be held to account in every country where people realize the significance of these votes in Philadelphia.

We are also recognizing in the I. L. O. economic and employment programs the fact that no one nation can close its boundaries and live unto itself in peace and prosperity. International trade, better access to the world's raw materials, are necessary to get what we need to improve our standards of life and living.

A third point is that the democratic way is the way of peace and progress. We at Philadelphia passed no laws, nor did we issue decrees. We exchanged ideas, made compromises, and worked out a statement of our common cause. Now that statement is going to the governments and the peoples, with no threat of impairment of national interests or sovereignty. Our recommendations can be put into effect and enforced only through the processes of education and democracy. Public opinion is our mightiest weapon.

The declaration of Philadelphia and the recommendations and resolutions are couched in fine, brave words, and, as was the case with that great Declaration of 1776, they will require bold action, an the political battle fronts of peace, to be translated into deeds.

Most of the men and women I met in Philadephia are veteran crusaders in the cause of improving the lot of mankind. Nearly every one of them rose to eminence in his own country by fighting for social improvement. Tonight most of them are on their way home, to their 41 countries, to carry on the job of forward-looking education, to show their own people how they, and their neighbors, will benefit from this program.

I am confident the job can be done, for I believe it's what we are fighting for, in this most gigantic and costly of wars. Our boys are fighting and dying for a better world, a secure and peaceful world, based on cooperation, not conflict. The Philadelphia conference of the International Labor Organization demonstrated again that men of good will can work together despite varying interests, against those common enemies—want and fear. I am proud to have been able to take part, and I stand ready now to help carry out that program as the greatest contribution I can make to my own country's future welfare—the restoration of the damages of war and the well-being of the young people who must carry on when we leave off.

Address by Senator Tunnell to Delaware Democratic State Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, our colleague the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TUNNELL] delivered an effective and enlightening address before the Democratic State convention at Dover, Del., yesterday afternoon. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As the time for the Presidential election approaches, it becomes more and more apparent that the average person is thinking less of partisan politics than ever before. This may or may not be for the best interest of the Nation. For more than 11 years the Presidency for the first time in American history has been held by the same man. There is nothing in the Federal law or the Federal Constitution which prescribes the number of terms for which the same man can be elected to the Presidency. However, in the early days of the Republic those who held the Presidential office were of the opinion that during ordinary times there was no reason for the election of the same man for more than 8 years. However, the founders of the Republic left the door open so that in periods of great stress or emergency the Nation could use a President for its Chief Executive, regardless of the number of terms he might have served. By no other means would the Nation be put in position of being able to choose its best citizen for President during an emergency.

Americans generally recognize that a great work has been done by the present Administration, both in domestic matters and as to our foreign relations. There is a spirit of fairness which permeates public men, regardless of party, with reference to their government in time of war. As I scanned the news account of the Republican State convention in Dover on April 20th, I found no recognition that anything had been done by the Democratic national administration which deserved the slightest commendation. There was no gratitude for aiding the Nation in its recovery from a state of economic confusion and bankruptcy to one of prosperity. There was no recognition of the tremendous strides that have been made toward winning the war. There was no recognition of any intelligent management of the war by President Roosevelt. This may be good politics. I don't think it appeals to the spirit of fairness of the American people.

In 1940, the American people sensed the approach of a second world war, and by a majority of approximately 5,000,000 votes elected for a third term Franklin Delano Roosevelt, as President of the United States. During the present administration, American territory and American ships have been attacked by the Axis Powers, and war was declared by them on this Nation. The United States did not attack the Axis Powers. They attacked the United States. Prior to December 7, 1941, there was a great division of opinion in America as to whether the Nation should prepare for war, or should it depend upon its isolation to protect it from harm in case of foreign complications. Many conscientious persons believed that the same arguments which applied when Washington gave his farewell address applied at this time. They believed that the Atlantic Ocean on the east, the Pacific Ocean on the west, the Gulf of Mexico, and a friendly neighbor on the south, together with a friendly border on the north, made it unnecessary for the United States either to take any interest in European affairs or to become involved in European wars. However, methods of warfare have changed rapidly within the last century. Guns are more powerful. Ships have greater tonnage. The military airplane has appeared in the air, and the submarine has made its appearance in the sea. The very elements of air and water which in 1797 were a protection against foreign encroachment have become means of communication through which the airplane and the submarine could attack American territory.

Instead of being isolated as were our ancestors, the territory of the United States is now within easy reach of European military weapons. This is a condition which our ancestors could not foresee or foretell. Another development in international affairs brought about partially by increased military facilities has been the attempt of one or two nations to dominate the economic and military world. While these struggles originated in Europe, their objectives included North and South America. Even in the days of the musket and bayonet, European wars spread to the western continent. For 200 years Port Royal passed alternately from French to English hands, and then back from English to French hands, depending on the fortunes of war between those two countries. A few foresighted statesmen in America foresaw that the United States would eventually be involved in the second world war. Our commercial, industrial, and Government interests compelled us to take note of world events and world struggles. Granted that it would be well if we could avoid becoming involved, such could not be and can never be in the future.

America is a world power, and as such has world responsibilities. It must always be a party to the settlement of world disputes. President Roosevelt was one of those statesmen who foresaw the coming struggle. Henry Cabot Lodge and his isolation associates had by their defeat of the League of Nations made certain that there would be a World War No. 2. Those who had shared the isolation view were particularly active in the year 1941 before the United States was attacked by the Axis Powers and Japan. The President had warned congressional leaders of the approaching storm. His advice had in the main been ignored, and every appropriation for the purpose of strengthening our defense was contested or criticized, on the ground that such appropriations were unnecessary.

At any rate, we are now in the war. We are now in the greatest war that the world has ever known. Three men have been responsible for our defense in World War No. 2. There have been the conferences at Quebec, at Casablanca, at Teheran, at Moscow, to say nothing of numerous conferences by subordinates. Our defense in the world struggle as it now shapes itself has been planned by Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin. This planning has been masterful. There are none who can intelligently criticize the strategy of this war, nor question the leadership that has been responsible for that strategy. Instead of an insignificant Navy, we now have the greatest Navy in the world's history. Instead of an insignificant Army, we have perhaps the largest Army ready for combat ever assembled. Notwithstanding predictions as to food shortages, notwithstanding dire predictions as to every sort of catastrophe, the United Nations are proceeding toward victory. For partisan reasons, there are those who now say, "Let us change our United States leadership in this fight."

I saw a statement by a noted writer a few days ago arguing that a Presidential term should be 6 years, that it takes 2 years for a President to learn his surroundings. How many American lives might be lost while a new President is mastering his job? Some of them never do learn. It is a curious circumstance that during this great emergency from 1932 to the present, there have been few outstanding opposition political leaders developed in America. The reason for this has been that the best thought of America of both parties has agreed in the main with the administration. Again, our Nation has been passing through a period of unparalleled prosperity. When people are prosperous, they think little of Government. A vast number of people in America vote against something, rather than for somebody.

However, the people are becoming aroused in America today. They are interested because everything that they have is dependent on the success or failure of this war effort. The people are interested to have their best officers, their best soldiers, their best sailors, their best President in this world struggle. The result has been that America has resorted to what is known as selective service in order to place its young, most vigorous men in its fighting forces. There is a great demand in some sections of the country to induct men of all occupations into the branch of the work for which they are best suited. These people desire that a shipbuilder shall be inducted into the shipbuilding business, a farmer into agriculture, a tradesman into trade. In other words a planned and complete economy would place each man and woman where he or she could be of the greatest service to the Nation. The selective service may not be permitted to go that far. However, so far as the armed service is concerned, we now have forced induction. If we have forced induction for the private, the noncommissioned officer, and for the commissioned officer, why should there not be a forced induction for the Commander in Chief? Why not draft Franklin Delano Roosevelt? Where does this demand for the induction of Franklin Delano Roosevelt come from? It is not coming from the great industrial leaders. They have made too much money. They are dissatisfied. It is not coming from the great manufacturing interests. They have made too much money. They are dissatisfied. It is coming from the average man in every community of the United States. The average man and woman in every election district in the Nation is calling for Franklin Roosevelt.

I don't think there is a section or a community of any size in which the sentiment of the people is other than that the President of the United States should be retained, should be drafted for a continuation and a successful conclusion of the present war, if the war has not been decided before the Presidential election. The demand is coming from the rural school district, it is coming from the lowly home, both rural and urban. It is coming from our flyers over Germany. It is coming from our sailors sailing the seven seas. It is coming from our soldiers in the jungles of Burma, on the sands of Africa, on the beaches in Italy, and in the fox holes of the Pacific. Truly, the demand is coming from "Greenland's icy mountain to India's coral strand." It is coming from the best thinkers of the Nation, those whose sons and daughters are exposed in this conflict, those who would hesitate to say to the world that we are dissatisfied with our Commander in Chief for political reasons, in spite of the fact that he has been so successful in the war management.

It would take too long to point out to you by figures and dates, the increase in the Army, in the Navy, and in every form of military equipment. Nobody denies this, and the demand to which I refer comes from both Republicans and Democrats. In the recent Republican primary in Pennsylvania, we are told that 6,000 Republicans wrote in the name of Franklin Roosevelt as their choice for the Presidency. This was a Republican primary. This was a demand from the people, his political opponents, a demand from those who are anxious to see this war won. Those who oppose a reelection of the President do not state that they oppose him in order to sooner win the war. However, many things are said with a view to creating dissatisfaction in America. A few days ago I read an article which was published in the Sunday Star, a Washington newspaper, in which a United States Senator is quoted as having said: "The American people know their boys are dying not only to give the British Empire a new lease on life, but another opportunity to expand its imperialism."

He continued, "They know that we are depleting our precious national resources not only to help Russia survive, but to help Russia to become the colossus of Europe." Continuing he said, "They know that besides the precious contribution of human life and suffering, that we are incurring a financial debt that will be paid in American sacrifice all the days of our life."

This man voted to declare war against the Axis Powers, and then goes out and tells the people that the war is being fought to give the British Empire a new lease on life and to expand its imperialism; to help Russia to become the colossus of Europe; and he calls attention to the fact that the war is creating a financial debt. Could any party prevent the creation of a financial debt during this war? Are these tactics entirely fair? Are they patriotic? These statements must be discouraging to the mother of the boy in service if she believes the statements of the Senator. This war must be won. This war is being won. This war will be won, unless we are defeated by those who approach the line of sedition by attempting to convince the American people that this war is not in their interest, but in the interest of foreign powers. Is this sort of politics entirely fair? Is it patriotic? But not only must the war be won. There must not be a repetition of this war.

There must be some form of international organization to protect the next generation against a repetition of such World Wars as No. 1 and No. 2. Do the American people believe that our political opponents who sacrificed all hope of preventing World War No. 2 for political reasons would ever be responsible for any form of international organization for such purpose? They killed the League of Nations. They did not favor any other form of international organization with teeth in it. However, the opponents of the President in both his own party and that of the opposition say there is to be no issue of foreign relations in this campaign, and then have one of their senatorial leaders to speak and make public a statement attacking the very motive which actuates our Nation in defending itself from an attack by a foreign foe. Is this quite fair or patriotic?

Senator BARKLEY some time ago enumerated 34 different policies or enactments of the present administration. Practically none of these policies are being attacked openly by the opponents of the President within or without his party. Some of these are, first, a sound banking system; next, Federal guaranty of bank deposits; Home Owners' Loan Corporation; Farm Security Administration; rural electrification; soil-conservation program; farm mortgage acts; crop insurance and parity payments; public works carried forward in every section of the Nation providing income in critical periods; road building; National Youth Administration; old-age and retirement insurance; unemployment insurance; vocational training to the crippled and the blind; Federal aid to starving and undernourished persons; slum clearance; private home building and comfortable quarters for war workers; legislation abolishing child labor; minimum-wage and maximum-hour legislation; Securities and Exchange Commission; reciprocal trade agreements; the good-neighbor policy toward the nations of the Western Hemisphere; increased compensation to our service men and women. These are some of the accomplisments of the administration of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Which ones of these great humanitarian and economic precautions will be removed? We defy our opponents to specify what they will abolish of the great program. Oh, we are told that the domestic affairs of the Nation are in a mess. Those acts show how much of a mess our affairs are in.

The Nation is in the best position morally, spiritually, economically, and politically that it has ever been in its history. Let us take the income from agriculture last year. It amounted to nearly $20,000,000,000. Labor: We are told that there will be by July 1 of this year 53,400,000 persons employed, and no unemployment of consequence. How about business prosperity in America? Well, we can best illustrate that by stating that the income of this great country of ours in 1943 was $148,000,000,000. During the last year of the Hoover administration the total income of the Nation was less than forty billions, or, in other words, there has been an increase of 250 percent. This administration took the country when it was in dire distress. We now see it in its most prosperous period of history. Those who criticize the present administration dare not openly attack these broad business and humanitarian policies. And yet they are the very policies which our opponents must attack if they attack the present administration. Oh, they tell us that this administration has been too political. It has appointed too many of its adherents to political jobs. If this administartion has made any mistakes—and I think it has—its most serious one has been the appointment of too many of its political opponents where their disloyalty would discredit the administration. And I refer particularly to the organization of the O. P. A. in Delaware, where approximately $200,000 in salaries was being paid to those who were not in sympathy with either the O. P. A. or the administration, through which their jobs had come. They attempted to discredit the whole O. P. A. for political reasons.

Our opponents tell us their issues are to be: (1) The preservation of free enterprise; (2) the abatement of bureaucracy; (3) the halt of paternalism; (4) the creation of post-war jobs through private industry; (5) the maintenance of labor's social gains; (6) the protection of our national interest. What do they mean by free enterprise? They mean certain advantages to special interests to prey upon the average man and woman of America. President Hoover was a great advocate of free enterprise. The only enterprise that thrived during his administration was the sale of apples on street corners. They tell us that they would abate bureaucracy. Do you know what a bureaucrat is? We hear a lot about him. A bureaucrat is a Democrat appointed to a position with the Federal Government in time of war. We are told that our opponents would cut 2,000,000 men and women from the pay roll. If they cut 2,000,000 men and women from the pay roll, they would hire 3,000,000 more in their places.

To say that they would discharge 2,000,000 men and women is equivalent to saying they would paralyze the war efforts of America. They say they will halt paternalism. Just what is meant by paternalism? We don't know, except that certain special interests are no longer able to control the Presidency of the United States, the Supreme Court, or Congress. These people don't object to paternalism. They simply object to the parents. Our opponents don't control them. They tell us they are in favor of post-war jobs through private industry. How far did they create jobs from private industry from 1929 to 1933? Where was private industry when Hoover's administration was sunk into the slough of economic despair? What was the matter with private industry then? Why didn't it furnish the jobs? Where was old Dr. Hoover when labor of the Nation was economically sick and helpless? They tell us that one of the aims of our opponents is the maintenance of labor's social gains. Labor must have made some social gains. They are going to preserve them. Why did our opponents fight so hard against the laws providing for social gains to labor? Why are they today fighting labor on every front? They tell us that they are going to protect our national interest. How and in what respect is our national interest to be protected? Who is to be the judge of that protection? Were they protecting the national interest when the soldiers-vote legislation was before Congress? We saw there 22 Northern Republicans combined with certain Southern Democrats to put through Congress of the United States a bill which they knew would not permit our soldier boys to vote.

The President called it a fraud. This was a very mild name for that piece of hypocracy. The Senator from Mississippi sponsoring this bill told the Senate that he was interested in preserving white supremacy, and for this reason opposed the Federal ballot. Senator HOLMAN, from Oregon, representing the Northern view, admitted that the opposition of the northern Republicans to a Federal ballot was because of the probability that these boys would vote for Franklin D. Roosevelt. He stated that if the President would announce that he would not be a candidate at the coming Presidential election, the opposition to a Federal ballot would disappear, and the bill could be passed in 30 minutes. We had the peculiar spectacle of 22 northern Republicans joining with 15 southern Democrats who were voting for white supremacy.

There was probably reason to fear that the boys in the service might favor President Roosevelt. Our opponents might also consider the possibility of the fathers and mothers, wives and sweethearts, brothers, sisters, and other relatives of the boys in the service voting for President Roosevelt. Perhaps they have some plan in mind to prevent the families of our boys in the service from voting. They did not disfranchise the relatives of the boys in service. They have succeeded in preventing our servicemen from having the vote. Representatives of both the Army and the Navy came before the Senate committee and told us that the chances of the delivery of the State ballots by soldiers from 48 States were very remote. Many of these States have hundreds of different kinds of ballots, depending upon the particular section or voting district. It was well known by those who opposed the Federal ballot that they were at that time removing the chance of thousands, and perhaps millions, of servicemen from having the opportunity to vote. Our opponents do not want the servicemen to vote, and they tell the reason why they do not.

H. V. Kaltenborn, the noted commentator, told of visiting the amputation ward of a veteran's hospital filled with maimed veterans of the Italian campaign. Mr. Kaltenborn asked these men how many of them had made up their minds to vote for Willkie. Not a man stirred or spoke. He then asked them how many had made up their minds to vote for Dewey. There was the same stoney silence. He then asked how many had decided to vote for President Roosevelt. The commentator states that the air was filled with the hands and the stumps of arms. Mr. Kaltenborn states that these boys have lost their arms and legs through the war and their opportunity to vote through Congress.

This administration has stood for those policies which benefit the average man and woman. It has stood for an increase in teachers' pay. The administration favored Federal aid for teachers throughout the Nation. It believes that illiteracy is a weakness for the whole Nation and not alone for the State in which the illiterate lives. I heard a prominent opposition United States Senator say when told that the teachers' salaries in the State of Ohio were too low that they could board with their parents. This is the sort of reasoning, and this is the sort of opposition that is being advanced in Washington to anything to benefit the average man and woman.

Another great class of Americans who have been recognized by this administration as never before is the Negro. During this administration there have been employed by the Federal Government more than 400,000 Negroes. The only Negro Congressman in the United States is a Democrat. The Democratic Party has put Negroes in the Legislatures Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, California, West Virginia, and Missouri. It has placed two Negro judge in the municipal court in New York City. They have placed a Negro alderman in New York City, and one in St. Louis. The Negro has been given recognition by the Democratic Party, and he has his greatest opportunity in history.

We sometimes hear that labor has taken over the Government. I don't think that labor has taken over the Government. I do say that those who are employed, together with their families, are entitled to representation in the Government which they did not have before the Roosevelt administration. Let us ponder the great proportion of the American people represented by labor and their families. They would amount to at least 75,000,000 of people. The prosperity of this great number means the prosperity of the Nation. Their poverty means poverty and distress for the Nation.

Now the great test of our Government during the period of this administration is the fact that it has accomplished the great improvement in America's conditions with no scandals, no starvation, no unemployment, and no crooked elections. Let us compare the domestic policy of 1942 with the domestic policy of 1932. Let us compare the period of Franklin Roosevelt with any other period in American history. Let us compare the hopelessness and despair of America in 1933 with the confidence and prosperity in 1943. Let us compare the experience and proven executive ability of Franklin Roosevelt with any possible candidate of the Republican Party in the present campaign. History will credit the period from 1933 to 1945 as the greatest period in America's development. Democracy then had its greatest growth and development. What will the period from 1945 to 1949 be? The answer depends upon the management to which that period will be entrusted.

Commencement Address by Hon. Francis Maloney, of Connecticut, at Catholic University of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a commencement address which I delivered this morning at the Catholic University of America.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Commencement at a great university is an inspiring event. Colored as it is by the age-old traditions of academic life, it symbolizes each year the enduring continuity of scholarship. To those within the university circle, it must always be an occasion for the inner satisfactions of accomplishment. Long hours of research, and many days and weeks of lecture and study, reach at this time a fitting climax, as the work of the scholastic year is crystalized in the awarding of honors and degrees.

To those, like myself, who are invited from outside to join in these ceremonies, commencement gives another kind of inspiration. To us it means, most of all, that men and women of America have been called together once again to celebrate the priceless opportunities of higher education. When we see theologians and philosophers, men of letters and of science, doctors, lawyers, and priests, assembled with their students in the dignified splendor of academic robes, we are impressed by more than the grand pageantry of the event. We are moved by the fundamental demonstration that books and learning continue to live, and that the advantages of university training are being extended to an ever-increasing number of America's children.

It is natural, too, that I should be especially affected by the commencement at this center of Catholic education in America. I need not dwell upon the church's sponsorship of education through all the ages, nor upon the basic compatibility of religion and science, of which the flourishing of this university is itself convincng proof. None but the blind and ignorant would dare to dispute these matters. Nor need I emphasize that this foregathering of scholars in the Nation's Capital is an essentially American occasion.

The growth and development of this university during the past half century, with its increasing influence and authority as an educational force throughout the United States, has been a splendid example of the sublime consistency of deep religious devotion and high ideals of patriotism. It is not for me to recite the chronology of the Catholic University's participation in the educational development of our country, or to attempt an authentic summary of its ramified contributions to the uplifting of the Nation's intellectual outlook. But I am able to state my profound conviction that the educational activities of the church, as directed in large part by this truly national university, have done much to give to the American people that broader vision, that more generous tolerance, and that more complete understanding of spiritual values, which in this hour of extreme test have been recognized as bulwarks of national strength.

If this were a less stringent hour, if we were meeting together under the serene skies of a peaceful world, it would be appropriate to note the kinship of this university in the new world with the venerable institutions of Europe. But with Europe looming as the decisive battleground in a terrible war, detached views of historic associations are difficult. I am told, for instance, that this university was conceived as a modern replica of the great University of Paris. Under other circumstances it would be profitable to relate the expansion of this Catholic University in the western hemisphere to the preeminence of the University of Paris as the center of culture in the Middle Ages.

Certainly this university, to an extent greater than most institutions in the United States, has made significant contributions to the development of a truly pan-American culture. If the new world is the hope of the whole world, and if upon that hope is based the prospect of avoiding another Dark Age in the world's history, then indeed the mission of this university today is not unlike that of the great centers of learning in earlier centuries.

But the University of Paris and its sister universities of Europe are in the hands of our enemies—the enemies of peace and enlightenment. The immediate mission of the universities of the new world is in the hands of their stalwart sons, who at this moment stand in the legions of deliverance on the very shores of Europe. Theirs is the task to free Europe, and by that great victory to reestablish among nations the binding ties of scholarship.

Thus the time will come when the universities of America shall again extend the hand of friendship and confraternity to sister universities of the old world; when once more the stream of knowledge shall flow among all peoples. This, certainly, is one aspect of the high purpose of our battle.

It has always been true that scholarship, uncolored by the oblique purposes of world politics, has ignored nationalistic boundaries. The free intercourse of students of all nations in search of the truth is an elevating manifestation of the brotherhood of men.

Let us hope that when this war is ended the universities all over the world shall emerge as beacons of a new enlightenment, and that scholarship shall once more become a unifying influence for peace.

This world mission of universities in peace does not suggest impotence in war. Nor does it exclude the universities from sharing in a resurgence of patriotism when the country is in danger. I have said that scholarship ignores national boundaries; but I do not mean that American scholarship, or the scholarship of any free people, avoids national responsibility. On the contrary, where the cause is just, where national interest coincides with what is right, the scholars of a nation are among the first to take up its defense.

In this country academic freedom has always been an essential ingredient of the liberty we cherish. We have been proud of our university scholars because they have been the products of unregimented thought. We have been confident of their leadership in an hour of national danger, because they have equipped themselves with the unerring instincts of intellectual honesty.

Freedom is cherished in the heart, but it thrives in a man's mind. A free nation is a strong nation because its people give intellectual assent to the principles of freedom. That is why in every great fight for freedom the scholars of the Nation are among the staunchest of its warriors.

It is to be remembered that the first attack of nazi-ism was aimed at the universities of Germany. The destruction of academic freedom; indeed, the liquidation of scholars who would not surrender their intellectual integrity was considered by those who had seized the Reich as an initial step in their evil strategy of aggression. If they could throttle truth in their own country, so they thought, they would present to the world an overwhelming spectacle of unity by force.

Were they not also fearful lest, if a spark of liberty remain unextinguished in Germany, it might one day burst forth into a consuming fire of revolution? Did they not destroy the freedom of their universities because they dared not risk the resentment that might smoulder within those free precincts, as the mad rush of nazi-ism gained momentum?

It will be said that German science still heeds the command of Hitler; that we fight an enemy who still relies upon the potent resources of trained minds. We may be asked, does not that imply the surrender of the universities in Germany?

Such questions confuse the utilization of trained technicians with the intellectual leadership that springs wholeheartedly from the breasts of unfettered men of learning. Of course our enemies have their experts—men whose hearts are darkened and whose minds are warped by the inexorable pressure of regimentation. But note this—none of the German universities was prepared to sponsor the doctrines of nazi-ism until its free scholars had been destroyed and it had been reduced to utter servility. No great university figure in all of Germany has emerged under Hitler as an inspiring leader of his country.

Consider in contrast the historic example of an eminent university scholar and priest who once stood embattled for freedom. Thirty years ago Cardinal Mercier was indeed the "Voice of Belgium." Consider how he led his countrymen in their hour of need. Writing from ruined Louvain on Christmas in 1914 he pointed to the destruction of that center of learning by the invaders and said, "All this accumulation of intellectual, of historic, and of artistic riches, the fruit of the labors of five centuries—all is reduced to dust."

But amid such desolation he rose up as the national as well as the moral and intellectual leader of his people. Listen to these words of the Holy Cardinal:

"Yet when, on the 2d of August, a mighty foreign power, confident in its own strength and defiant of the faith of treaties, dared to threaten us in our independence, then did all Belgians, without difference of party, or of condition, or of origin, rise up as one man, close-ranged about their own King, and their own government, and cry to the invader: 'Thou shalt not go through.'

"At once, instantly, we were conscious of our own patriotism. For down within us all is something deeper than personal interests, than personal kinships, than party feeling, and this is the need and will to devote ourselves to that more general interest which Rome termed the public thing, 'Res publica.' And this profound will within us is patriotism."

Many here today remember the tall, saintly Cardinal of Belgium when, shortly after the last war, he visited America. Many will recall the acclaim he received throughout the land as the personification of a valiant people. He was honored here by many universities, including this one—and he was honored not only as a churchman and a celebrated authority on philosophy, but also as a great patriot.

As our men gaze across the English Channel at the fields of Flanders today, I am sure they are fortified by the eternal blessings of the valiant soul of Cardinal Mercier.

The spirit of Cardinal Mercier lives in Belgium today and it lives among us. We, too, have our great patriots among men of learning. Our universities are not silenced—nor are they withdrawn from the fight. They fortify us not only by the precision of scientific method, but also by the intellectual leadership that comes from the reasoned conviction that our cause is just and our destiny noble.

There are many examples of this inspiring leadership. There are many spokesmen for America among the scholars of the day. If I single out one, it is because in a special way he has dramatized the moral and intellectual leadership of the learned men of America. By his actions and in his messages he has given glowing testimony of the inexhaustible courage that springs from love of country.

The world was electrified when the archbishop of New York, as military vicar of the armed forces of the United States, set out upon his flight across the seas to lift up the hearts of our fighting sons on several continents. Here was the unprecedented example of a priest and scholar of great dignity and authority giving by his personal presence in the war zones the moral and intellectual approval of a just cause.

It is appropriate, therefore, that to the assembled scholars of this university, with which he is identified, I should repeat Archbishop Spellman's moving dedication of all of us to "the road to victory," over which at this very moment men of America are moving relentlessly forward.

"As Americans," Archbishop Spellman says, "we proclaim the common necessity of the defense of our beloved country. We shall never see her enslaved. We shall never see the sacred heritage of liberty torn from her, the democratic forms of government shorn from her. And the best way to preserve our country strong and free, the fundamental basis of all victory, is the upbuilding of the citizen as an individual, as a man who knows God and keeps God's Commandments. This is the best and essential contribution that each of us can make to the winning of the war, the reestablishment of peace, and the gaining of true liberties for all peoples."

These words illuminate a high purpose. Better than my own they carry the message I would give to those who are honored here today.

Our country needs, the world needs, more than ever before, men and women who recognize that truth and knowledge are the gifts of God and therefore should be dedicated to His service. In America we want scholars who dignify their learning by giving to it an elevating character of spirituality.

To the scholars of 1944, who pass from the portals of this university today into a world at war, let me give a word of reassurance. You shall not be lost in the turmoils that surround you. If your peacetime plans must be deferred, you have the rare privilege of devoting your specialized knowledge to the cause of your country, and you have the even higher role of demonstrating by your work and your way of life, the true patriotism which Archbishop Spellman has so eloquently defined.

When peace with victory comes, perhaps sooner than we dare hope in this critical hour, you will find that even greater opportunities for your careers will be opened up to you—and you will be better prepared for those careers because of the part you have played in winning the war.

Let us all join in honoring also today those absent sons of this university who could not be here because they already have answered their country's call. In a profound sense this commencement of 1944 is also theirs. They honor their university because they fight for freedom. Theirs is the distinguished degree of courage, of bravery, and of sacrifice. Our hearts are with them. Our hopes are in them—may God bless them—and keep them.

One Hundred and Thirtieth Anniversary of Norwegian Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address honoring the Norwegian citizens of the United States upon this, the one hundred and thirtieth anniversary of the adoption of the Norwegian Constitution, this being an address which I delivered in Washington today.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On this 17th day of May the one hundred and thirtieth anniversary of the Norwegian Constitution, I rise to pay tribute to the enterprising, courageous Norwegian people throughout the world and especially so to the Norwegian pioneers and citizens of my own State of North Dakota.

The State of North Dakota owes a great deal to its Norwegian citizens. They and their families came to North Dakota for the purpose of establishing homes and giving their children a better chance at life than they themselves had had. It was their fundamental belief that education was the door to opportunity and so we find that among the Scandinavian people their first concern was the establishment of schools and churches. It is to them that North Dakota is particularly indebted for their high educational standards.

Closely associated with the Scandinavian faith in education was their almost religious belief in the necessity for active participation by the people themselves in their Government. I am sure that you will all agree with me that in no State in the Union do the people themselves take a more active and direct interest in the political affairs of their local, State, and National Government than do the people of North Dakota. As one evidence of this, contrast the proportion of people participating in elections in North Dakota with some of the other States.

The people of occupied but unconquered Norway are today celebrating their one hundred and thirtieth annual Independence Day. Thousands of Norwegians throughout the United States, Canada, and many other countries of the world will join in observing this significant anniversary of the establishment of democratic government. Each year, in spite of difficulties, the Norwegian people have managed to observe their Independence Day. Again this year they will find some way to celebrate the 17th of May.

The 17th of May is Norway's Fourth of July, a day for the patriotic observance of the nation's traditional freedom and independence. It was on May 17, 1814, that representatives of the Norwegian people at Eidsvold, Norway, approved a democratic constitution, modeled, to some extent, after the American Constitution.

Prior to 1814 Norway was united with Denmark as a separate kingdom. But after brief hostilities with Sweden, Frederick VI, the Danish King, by the Treaty of Kiel, concluded on January 14, renounced sovereign rights over Norway, ceding them to the King of Sweden. The Norwegian people objected. They held that Frederick was entitled to renounce claim to the Norwegian throne, but they denied his right to cede an unconquered country. The Norwegian view was that sovereignty now rested with the people. Therefore, Norwegians demanded the summoning of a constitutional assembly, based on a general election. The residing Governor, Crown Prince Christian Frederick of Denmark, was forced to yield to public pressure, and on April 10, 1814, the elected representatives met at Eidsvold. Six weeks later they adopted Norway's Constitution, the constitutional law of May 17, 1814.

From that day Norway enjoyed the privileges of democracy, and even now the Norwegian Government, with its headquarters in London, has continued to function in full adherence to the constitution of 1814.

The Norwegian Parliament, comprising elected representatives of the people, still manages to meet. By a unanimous vote it has instructed the executive branch of their Government to carry on the struggle for freedom even though it is necessary to establish temporary headquarters abroad. This mandate has been carried out. Thanks to the foresight of the elected representatives of the Norwegian people, the Norwegian Government is in a unique position, although in exile, to function on a strictly legal basis. This fact has been emphasized by Ambassador Wilhelm Morgenstierne: "There is an unbroken line connecting the Government with the constitutional past—and I might add with the constitutional future of Norway."

It is the boast of the Norwegian Government that during 4 years of exile it has never undertaken an important decision without ascertaining the sentiment of the people at home. Inquiries are directed to the home front, and replies are received. Just how this is accomplished obviously cannot now be told. However, the courageous stand taken by groups and individuals in Norway is indicative of the rock-bound spirit and the limitless courage of these people.

Moreover, all actions and policies of the Norwegian Government in exile are constantly being referred to the people in Norway for their approval Thus, in radio addresses beamed to the people of Norway Prime Minister Johan Nygaardsvold has repeatedly given assurance that it is not the plan of his government to perpetuate itself in office. The spirit of the constitution must not be violated.

In a typical statement to the home front he said:

"This government has taken it for granted that the Norwegian people will, in a constitutional and democratic way, decide which lines of progress are to be followed and who is to exercise the administrative authority * * * It will be up to the Norwegian people to decide what things are to be done and who is to do the leading."

Rolvoag, famous novelist; Martha Ostenso, novelist; Knute Rockne, football coach; Bernt Balchen, famous aviator flew with Byrd, greatest flier in world; Governor Nestos; Knute Nelson, Congressman from Minnesota.

Globe-Circling Senator—Review of Book Written by Senator Mead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OWEN BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, we have heard the saying, "O that mine enemy would write a book." Our very good friend and colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], has written a book entitled "Tell the Folks Back Home," and a most interesting review of it by Mr. Frank S. Adams appeared in the New York Times of last Sunday. As a possible contribution to a more proper understanding of the fruits of our journey last summer around the globe, I ask that the review be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the review was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GLOBE-CIRCLING SENATOR

(By Frank S. Adams)

Senator JAMES M. MEAD, of New York, was one of the five globe-girdling Senators whose remarks caused a furor when they returned from their inspection of global battlefronts last autumn. They were scolded by many sections of the press, chided by President Roosevelt, spanked by Winston Churchill. Now the Senator from New York has written a breezy, brash, entertaining book in which he doesn't back down on a single one of the points in dispute between the committee and its critics.

Loyal New Dealer though he is, Senator MEAD still deplores the lack of a strong, coordinated American military, diplomatic, and economic policy in the warring areas. He is still annoyed that the British sometimes get the credit for American lend-lease purchases; still eager for us to get post-war rights to the air bases we have built on British soil; still apprehensive that we are draining our own oil resources to fight the war, while the British fields in the middle east are conserved for the future.

India made Senator MEAD angrier than anything else he saw on his 45,000-mile trip. He was shocked that, at a time when thousands of starving people lay on the sidewalks of Calcutta, the British authorities were still devoting precious space in freight cars for race horses en route to the Calcutta Gold Cup. He was angry that Reuters, the British news agency, should spread reports that heavy reverse lend-lease shipments of food to American forces were accentuating the shortage.

And yet, with the same poltical astuteness that marked his climb from railroad switchman to the United States Senate, Senator MEAD has balanced enough laudatory remarks about the President, about the British, and about the workings of lend-lease to make his book palatable to many to whom his criticism would be so many red rags. It is sentimental, occasionally acrimonious, but never dull.

In London he conceded that the King made as good an impression on the Senators as he hoped they made on the monarch. He was astonished when Churchill used a quill pen to sign Senator "HAPPY" CHANDLER'S short-snorter bill. The British Prime Minister talked freely to the touring Senators about the possibility of dual citizenship for Britons and Americans after the war.

In north Africa he was astonished by the magnitude of American supply installations—and found a fierce undercover battle going on for post-war advantages. He found the French anxious to take over American facilities and the British trying to assume control of Port Lyautey on the plea that it divided their operations between Agadir and Gibraltar. We answered that by taking over Agadir.

Through the steaming hot Middle East and across India he continued to be astounded by the number of homesick Americans he encountered, all participating in a miracle of supply. And everywhere he went Senator MEAD and his colleagues grew angrier about the oil situation, and particularly at the fact that no American official had even been assigned to take the question up with the British.

After a brief round trip over "the hump" to see China, and the first non-stop flight in a land plane from Ceylon, 3,200 miles across the Indian Ocean to Australia, Senator MEAD and his fellow-travelers found something to be glad about. They liked the Australians and decided that lend-lease has served to create a liking there for American jeeps, trucks, and planes that will open up a lasting market after the war for our mechanical products.

General MacArthur struck the Senator as a dynamic, theatrical personality. He told the tourists some ghastly stories about Japanese atrocities, faithfully recorded here. Continuing on into the South Pacific, Senator MEAD had enthusiastic things to say about Admiral Halsey and hi flag secretary, former Gov. Harold E. Stassen, of Minnesota. Indeed, he was enthusiastic about most of the things he saw—but the meat of his book is in the comparatively few things with which he found fault.

Lethal Trends of Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I present for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article from the Reader's Digest by Representative HATTON W. SUMNERS of Texas, which should be read at this time by every person in America. It is a graphic description of our centralized bureaucracy and how it operates, and a prophetic warning of things to come unless lethal trends of Government are corrected. This article should be a challenge to all Americans who love their country and who want to see the Government of our fathers endure. It is as follows:

We all believe in democracy—democracy operated through representative government. Why is it, then, that in a land where everybody proclaims his devotion to it, representative government is withering before our eyes?

The bureaucrat is blamed for this. But he is not the cause. He is the effect. The seat of the trouble lies far deeper.

Our whole political system is based on the principle of local self-government. But two forces have been destroying this principle. One is the demand of the people for the Federal Government to intervene in problems of every community and every class. The other is the ever-growing practice of passing all these problems on to the Government in Washington. The last war gave this a big push. The post-war dislocation hurried it. The great depression raised it to avalanche proportions. The present war is completing the job. Every town and State, every trade association and trade union, every class and group and desperate minority brings its problems to Washington. And Washington is gladly accepting that responsibility.

But Congress is made up solely of mere human beings. And nature has not endowed any group of human beings with the sweep and grasp of intelligence necessary to handle the multitude of Federal and local problems dumped upon Washington.

Not being able to handle the impossible burden itself, Congress of necessity creates bureaus and passes on the overload to the bureaucrats. By bureaucrats I do not mean those Government employees once called civil servants because they were employed to serve the Government and execute the laws of Congress. I refer to the bureau chief and his squadrons of counselors and economists and specialists. I am not criticizing them but the system. They issue what are called directives, which actually have the force of law. One bureaucrat in the Securities and Exchange Commission said recently: "We do make the law. This order supersedes any laws opposed to it." Actually the bulk of what in effect are our general laws are now being made not by Congress but by bureaucracies.

This is not a new thing. It was under way 30 years ago when I entered Congress. I made a speech in the House warning of it in 1923 and again in 1932. I am not discussing the concentration of Federal power which has been made in order to fight the war. The present picture is merely the natural development of our policies over several decades. It is a procedure as old as tyranny. But it cannot exist in a democracy, because where it exists government inescapably ceases to be a democracy.

The essence of democracy is that laws shall be enacted by representatives of the people, and that all sides have a hearing. But laws enacted by bureaucrats are fashioned behind closed doors. The real author is not known to the people. He is appointed, not elected. Generally the first the public knows of his directives is when they are proclaimed. The law, once thus announced, is subject to frequent and sometimes capricious amendment. The bureau enacts it, enforces it, and sits as judge in interpreting it. Most of these imperial bureaus are provided with tribunals equipped as courts and recognize a multitudinous bar which practices before them.

It is not easy to get a law passed by Congress. But the bureaucrat can toss off a directive while you wait. The very facility with which he legislates encourages the multiplicity of laws. The fact that he does not have to face a constituency makes him irresponsible to the people in the performance of this, the highest function of sovereignty.

The promoters of centralization are more and more resorting to the exercise of another unlimited power against which no constitutional barrier will ever stand—the control of the purse strings. By making the units of State government financially dependent on the Federal Government, that Government is acquiring the power to control the units of State government. When this is fully consummated, the sovereignty of the State governments will be liquidated.

This job will have been done with money sent by Washington in the form of loans and gifts to States, towns, school districts, individual citizens. This money has served to attach all these interests directly to the central government and make them subject to its power.

But we are approaching the day of reckoning. Up to now Washington has been borrowing money and scattering it among the States. I do not refer to war activities but to ordinary current Government activities. The Federal Government, long before the preparation for this war, was mortgaging the taxpaying ability of future generations to pay current expenses. The taxes to service these vast Federal operations and pay the interest on the debt must come out of the same pockets from which the States and cities must collect their funds. The Federal Government has first call on these funds. We are, therefore, moving rapidly toward a condition where there will not be enough left to run the States.

In weakening the States we weaken the whole fabric of free government. The inescapable price of free government is that we exercise it. The most destructive force in the world is nonuse. If we do not use our powers of self-government in the States we will awake one day to find that self-government has passed irrevocably out of our hands.

Government is exercised best in the local community. There the problems are perceived with greater clarity because they are close to the people and on a scale within their grasp. The self-reliance of the individual, town, and State is being destroyed as they are being relieved of the necessity of governing themselves. When people stop thinking for themselves there is always someone willing to step forward and do their thinking for them.

What shall we do about it? change bureaucrats? consolidate bureaus? abolish bureaus and turn the whole intolerable load back to Congress? None of these makeshifts touches the real problem. It is folly to talk about abolishing bureaus as long as we continue to pile on the central Government the problem of every State and town and social group in the Nation. The men who are trying to drive us toward government by bureaucracy understand this. The chief adviser of the National Resources Planning Board, recently abolished by Congress, prophesies crisply:

"Congress will surrender to the administration the power to tax. * * * Congress will appropriate huge sums of money; will surrender its power of directing when and how the money will be spent.

"Other extraordinary powers, such as to effect great social reforms, will be delegated to the administration, which will retain most, if not all, of its wartime powers."

This is precisely the bureaucratic control we will have if we persist in makin Washington the guide, philosopher, big brother, supervisor, and master of every activity within our borders. The remedy—and the only remedy—is to send all these non-Federal functions back where they belong—to the States and the local communities, where they can be handled upon a scale within the comprehension of the limited mind of man.

Strangely, those in Washington who fight for this new bureaucratic central control call themselves progressives and those who oppose them are branded as reactionaries. Such is the power of labels. We are grasping at ancient evils, and call them progress.

This disease has been most devastating in Germany. In imperial Germany men already talked of the tyranny of bureaucracy. The republican government which succeeded the Kaiser greatly expanded it. It reached its full flower under Hitler. Indeed, national socialism may be described as government by bureaucracy. If we think Hitler's system is better than ours we should have the honesty to say so instead of copying while we denounce it.

The States must resume the status of responsible sovereign agencies of general government or democracy cannot live in America.

Something About Jefferson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial published by the Spencer (W. Va.) Times-Record, the title of which is "Something About Jefferson," and relates to a speech made by the Honorable James A. Farley at the annual Jefferson Day dinner of the National Democratic Club in New York City.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOMETHING ABOUT JEFFERSON

James A. Farley, formerly head of the Democratic National Committee, had little difficulty in getting himself reelected Democratic State chairman of New York recently. There had been rumors that certain New Deal interests in the Empire State were seeking to supplant him on the theory that he is opposed to the fourth term and much of the New Deal ideology. The substance of these rumors, if any, evaporated in the spring sunshine and Mr. Farley had no difficulty in being reelected.

That genial Jim still regards Jefferson as the patron saint of the Democratic Party, or at least his own political mentor, is evidenced from an address which he delivered at the annual Jefferson Day dinner of the National Democratic Club in New York City. In part Mr. Farley stated:

"Jefferson believed that it was better for humanity to progress slowly, to learn from its own mistakes, than to take from the average man the liberty to make decisions for himself. He saw that while a dictator might for a short time provide great benefits and bounties for the people, ultimately the interests of a dictator and the interests of the people were deadly enemies. He would rather make progress slowly and be sure that it ended in security than to seek the illusion of security through the dictation of any one person or any small group.

"Moreover, he believed in local government. He believed that an infinite number of services should be reserved for the communties and the States. He believed that a proper distribution of power between the States and the Nation and between the States and their subdivisions was essential not only to liberty but to efficient government."

Here are some sound if homely truths which many of the left-wing Democratic leaders might do well to take to heart if they are still to regard the sage of Monticello as the patron saint of their party. Because in spite of some opinions to the contrary, Jefferson's views on individual freedom are as applicable today as they were when enunciated. In the waging of a mighty war to preserve our traditions of individual liberty against totalitarianism we are apt to forget some of them. As Mr. Farley pointed out "in fighting that war it is well to keep in mind that if freedom fails here it cannot be secured anywhere in the world."

Abolition of Poll Taxes by Constitutional Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the direct and efficient road to poll-tax reform is by way of constitutional amendment. Yesterday morning the New York Times published an editorial pointing out that public sentiment in the country with respect to the continued existence of poll taxes as a qualification for voting is such that the country would probably speedily ratify a constitutional amendment. That has been my opinion for several years, and on January 7, 1943, I introduced a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment to eliminate the poll-tax qualification. This amendment, under consideration in the Senate Judiciary Committee, failed of a favorable report early this year by a tie vote, 9 to 9. It may be that another opportunity will be presented to consider the joint resolution. I ask unanimous consent that the New York Times editorial and the joint resolution as introduced by me be printed at length in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial and joint resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of May 16, 1944]

FOR A POLL-TAX AMENDMENT

The fight against the poll tax has come to grief again on the question of cloture—that is, of limiting debate in order to reach an early vote. A majority of the Senators would probably have voted against the poll tax if the measure had been presented to them, but less than a majority yesterday were willing to vote for cloture. The argument is simple. A Senator may regard with distaste amounting to abhorrence the prospect of a Senate minority holding up legislation indefinitely in order to gain its own ends in the midst of a dreadful war. At the same time he may wish to retain his own right to talk a proposal to death when he, too, may be both in a minority and, as he thinks, on the side of the angels. Cloture is a real problem, which as yet there has not been sufficient legislative wisdom to solve.

The poll tax itself remains as much an evil as before. It is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, in that it trespasses on what we moderns mean by a "republican form of government." It carries States' rights further than those rights ought to go, in that it affects the election of Federal officials who make or carry out laws for the whole Nation. New York State has a just cause for complaint if eight other States choose Presidential electors, Senators, or Representatives in Congress by an undemocratic process.

Yet it now appears that the number of Senators who are narrowly and selfishly interested in a limited franchise in their States, plus the number of Senators who are honestly convinced that the poll tax cannot be constitutionally repealed by congressional act, is sufficient to defeat such a repeal, either now or in the foreseeable future. We believe that it would be wise for the repeal forces to abandon their present measure and substitute a constitutional amendment. We believe there is enough popular support of poll-tax repeal, on its merits, to secure the assent of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress and three-fourths of the States—and this is all that is required for a constitutional amendment. The sooner this proposal is brought forward the better.

Senate Joint Resolution 2

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to voting qualifications

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any tax or on account of any property qualification.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

President Roosevelt and the Fourth Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Mr. Roosevelt Must Run," appearing in the Chicago Sun of May 12, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

MR. ROOSEVELT MUST RUN

Millions of Americans who care little for political parties as such recognize with every passing day the Nation's continuing need for the kind of leadership Franklin Delano Roosevelt has given it. We think it time, therefore, that the people make clear their insistence that Mr. Roosevelt accept renomination and reelection.

The Sun knows nothing about Mr. Roosevelt's intentions. We can guess that if he consulted only his own convenience he would be happy to lay down the onerous burden of his high office at the end of his present term. But what one man may wish is a triviality when measured against the crisis that confronts civilization.

Whether Mr. Roosevelt wants to be President again or not, the people must make their own decision. They know now that he is the greatest man in his party. They know now that Mr. Willkie's defeat has eliminated any possibility of the Republican Party nominating a man of even comparable stature. They know now that Mr. Roosevelt should be reelected.

The invasion of Europe is about to begin. We are committed to the greatest undertaking the American people, in alliance with other liberty-loving peoples, has ever assumed. Would it not be national folly to shatter the continuity of leadership that has brought us to the verge of a glorious victory?

If somehow the issue of war leadership could be eliminated from the election—if, that is, total victory over all our enemies could be achieved by then—still the Nation could not permit Mr. Roosevelt's retirement. For we must march on beyond military victory to win the peace.

Throughout the war he has not spared himself to build, patiently and untiringly, the foundations of that permanent world cooperation which is indispensable to lasting peace. To throw away his experience and his insight, the friendship and confidence he has slowly built up among our allies, the priceless store of his preparation and planning for a better world; to put the world on notice that the United Nations may not stay united, and that in any case this country lacks faith in its own cause—this would betray the very purposes for which 11,000,000 men have taken up arms.

There is still another compelling reason for Mr. Roosevelt's reelection. He it is who offers the best prospect of leading America toward new pinnacles of welfare, justice, and democratic achievement at home. His liberalism, his faith in plain people, his determination that the powers of society shall be directed to alleviating the ills of society—these are the best assurance in an unsure age that this democracy can solve the exacting problems of adjustment to a new era of peace, freedom, and prosperity.

In a democracy no man is indispensable. But a democracy which fails to make use of its best leadership wrongs itself.

We have differed with Mr. Roosevelt in the past and expect to differ with him in the future. He has made mistakes. Yet he sums up the common aspirations of the American people. His shortcomings pale beside his strengths.

His retirement would delight our enemies, giving them the hope of a compromise peace or a breach in the United Nations coalition. His reelection will weaken Axis resistance and insure the total destruction of fascism.

His retirement would dismay and confuse our allies, drive them either to turn in upon themselves or take refuge in power politics as a hedge against the possible collapse of collective security. His reelection will insure the foundation of a peace structure within which men of good will can work for freedom from fear.

His retirement would raise for millions of civilians and soldiers the specter of another return to the subnormalcy of unemployment, poverty, and insecurity; would unsettle the country with dread of reaction; would aggravate the sources of domestic strife. His reelection will insure post-war reconstruction based on the ideal of a square deal for every man.

America demands the reelection of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

"Arch Seditionist" Is Dead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "'Arch Seditionist' Is Dead, a Little Man from Kansas," by Paul Mallon, publisher of the Omaha (Nebr.) World-Herald, of May 9, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"ARCH SEDITIONIST" IS DEAD, A LITTLE MAN FROM KANSAS

(By Paul Mallon)

WASHINGTON.—The "arch seditionist" is dead—the 84-year-old man from a small town in Kansas, whom the mighty Justice Department and its F. B. I. thought of sufficient importance to indict for sedition with jailed Nazis and some other men and women agitators, and haul them all together into court here in one big trial.

He died in a rooming house with 40 cents in his pocket in the midst of his trial. He had told the judge he was a pauper and could not afford an attorney for his defense, so one had to be furnished to him free by the court.

The papers say his sedition consisted of running a little printed sheet in Wichita which some dignified by the name of magazine, others by the term "newspaper." He called it Publicity, a title which does not seem to disclose the nature or intent of his threat to this Republic.

His accusers reveal this with greater clarity, saying one of his contributions to our enemies was the coining of the word "Jewocratic." The word certainly means he was against the Jews, all right, as are a lot of small people with small minds, bigoted people who somehow think a religion makes all its people alike in pattern.

He was not discriminating enough to be against bad Jews or anti-American Jews, and for good Jews and patriotic American Jews who stand for the best that is in this country. That was his sedition, as far as the papers disclose it on his death. He could not see the realities of good and bad, which is largely a matter of ignorance rather than malice.

Moreover, he was a hateful little man on this subject, and, according to what the papers say about him, fell for much of the similarly hateful Hitler propaganda. But if he did anything about it except to write it in his limited way, this has not been brought out.

I wonder how many people in Wichita paid any attention to him, or even knew who he was. I wonder what William Allen White, who was supposed to know everyone in Kansas, would say about him. My bet is his comment would be:

"Oh, he is some old fool out here that no one ever listened to."

At any rate, I wonder if he ever influenced many people with his foolishness, or if you ever heard of his sheet called a newspaper.

Apparently, he wrote his material all himself, pecking away at it in the long night hours in his cheap room, his landlady says, even while his trial was going on. His theory must have been that this is a democracy and, as such, it includes the right to be wrong, or to be anything—even a bigot. Freedom of religion, as Stalin cleverly has pointed out, includes the right to be against all religion.

One day this war will be over and we will look back at all its factors with a clearer vision, less strained by emotion. I wonder if then anyone will be proud enough to tell his grandchildren how the Republic was saved from the 80-year-old pauper, whose only real recognition in the publicity he always strove for, was his death. He never hit the front page before.

Well, anyway, he is now assured of a better judgment.

Politics and Racism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, 2d

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Anniston Star, of Anniston, Ala. I am not in complete accord with everything in the editorial, but I approve of much of it. It was written by Col. Harry M. Ayers, editor and publisher of the Star. Colonel Ayers resided for some years in China with his father, who was a missionary in that country. The editorial is worthy of thought and of preservation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLITICS AND RACISM: AN APPEAL TO REASON

Some time before the recent senatorial contest in this State got under way the Anniston Star addressed a friendly letter to State Senator James A. Simpson in which we urged the rejection of the question of racism as an issue in the campaign, believing that an appeal to racial prejudice from the political rostrum would be injurious to the white and colored peoples of the State alike and that it would have also a deleterious effect on the war effort. Responsible and high-minded as he had proved himself to be, we believed that this appeal would meet with sympathetic consideration on the part of the Birmingham candidate, and the tenor of his reply confirmed our belief in this connection.

But out of sheer desperation, we like to believe, that issue was projected and the people of the State were subjected to a flood of propaganda by means of scandal sheets, public harangues, whispering campaigns, etc., the equal of which we never before had witnessed. However, now that the sane people of Georgia, Alabama, and Florida have in turn rebuked this sort of misbehavior as it was invoked by Eugene Talmadge against Ellis Arnall, by the Simpsonites against LISTER HILL, and by his four opponents in the race against CLAUDE PEPPER, it is to be hoped that racism will never show its urgly face in this way again.

And we make this statement as one who for a lifetime has been inured to the mores of the South, as one who was born and bred in Dixie. We make it because we ourselves have been the victim of racial prejudice and reviled in a foreign land. We make it because we believe in the Golden Rule and that law of noblesse oblige that imposes on the better advantaged race here in the South and throughout the United States an obligation to strive toward the uplift and not the suppression of our weaker brother of another chromatic type.

The Negro is the only race on American soil that did not come here of his own volition. He was brought here against his will, millions of his kind having died during the period of enforced enslavement. But now that he is here we want him to stay in peace and happiness, because we like him for his many innate virtues; because we entertain for him a sense of gratitude for having taken care of our women folk and children during the dark days of the War between the States, and because we recognize in him potentialities that will make a great contribution to the cultural and economic advancement of our common country once he is given equality of opportunity for self-advancement.

But it will be an exceedingly slow process if the Negro is forced to pull himself up the ladder of civilization by his own bootstraps. He must have, and is entitled to, the help of the white people of the country; and we do ourselves a disservice so long as we deny him education, better housing facilities, adequate medical care, and fair treatment before the law. In addressing the Associated Press annual meeting in New York a few days ago Col. John R. Allison said that he asked Maj. Gen. Orde Charles Wingate during their heroic exploits behind the Japanese lines in Burma if the colored troops at their disposal would fight, to which Wingate is said to have replied: "If they are not good fighters, it is because we are not good leaders."

And the same truism that applies in military life will apply equally well in civil life: the educated, sound thinking people of the South must furnish the leadership to lift the Negro out of the morass of ignorance, poverty and disease that make for criminality and economic liability. David L. Cohn, a highly intelligent Mississippian, recently stated in the Atlantic, one of our best monthly magazines: "Here each white is deeply affected by the Negro, just as each Negro is deeply affected by the white. The one is a problem for the other. If there has never been a free Negro in the South, it is also true that there has never been a free white man in the South since the Civil War * * * because the southerner's whole society and way of life are conditioned by the presence of the Negro * * * The southern Negro suffers mental aberrations because he lives among whites upon terms which they lay down, while the white suffers other aberrations because he lives among masses of Negroes."

Education is the best home remedy we know of to rid ourselves of those aberrations. There are today some 893,290 Negroes in Alabama, and if we could give each of them the value of a Tuskegee Institute training, thus more than doubling their earning capacity, the economic fructification to the State would be tremendous. Moreover, it has been stated often without refutation that no graduate of Tuskegee has ever been convicted of an offense against a white woman or of any other major crime. On the other hand, they have become uniformly good citizens and taxpayers, thereby lifting a burden from the shoulders of the white people where they reside. And this paper believes that citizens of that type should be allowed to vote, be they white or black. Indeed, this paper has come to the conclusion that the time has arrived for all southern States to abolish the poll tax and substitute therefor an educational test as precedent to the exercise of the franchise. But we are unequivocally opposed to force bills and believe the Congress should allow us to work out our own social and economic problems in our own way.

Neither is this paper favorable to efforts that are being made from the outside to abrogate segregation laws that have been established here in the South. For we believe those laws make for the betterment of both races, although we do believe Negroes to be entitled to better accommodations on common carriers. We also should like to see the white people of this section join with the Negroes in an effort to make Hobson City, the exclusive Negro municipality on our southern border, a model place of residence. For it is a laboratory in which they well could prove their capacity for intelligent self-government. A fine new school building recently has been erected there, but the place badly needs engineering and steps toward beautification.

Without segregation, there would be a tendency toward amalgamation, and that is something which races of differing types have fought against from the earliest eolithic period, which produced the so-called Heidelberg and Piltdown man, to the present time, according to Henry Fairfield Osborn and other authorities who are quoted in Dr. Jerome Dowd's scholarly work, "The Negro in American Life." Moreover, Westermarck in his three-volume "History of Human Marriage" points out that amalgamation is conducive to racial infertility and that even among the lower species and aboriginal tribes sexual intercourse of whites with blacks, especially on the part of the female, is decidedly repugnant. And if you must have biblical authority, consult Ezra or St. Paul, or consider the family row that ensued when Moses slipped over the line. Hence, it is to be desired that each race maintain its own integrity and develop itself to its highest possibilities.

But this does not mean that there cannot safely be an interchange of cultures and traditions. And to bring that about is the responsibility of the whole Nation. The South did not bring the Negro to this continent, but it has been the South that has had to shoulder the major part of the burden of his civilization. And insofar as education is concerned, the South's problem has been aggravated in the last few years by Supreme Court decisions that make mandatory equality of educational opportunity and equal pay for white and colored teachers. It was one of those decisions that prevented an 8-month school term here in Alabama under the Dixon administration, and it also was northern influence that defeated the Hill-Thomas Federal-aid bill that would have eased the burden of a dual school system in this region.

All of these problems can be worked out in time, however, and peaceful relations maintained, if the demagogues, both white and black, will but cease their agitation. Men of good will and of foresight everywhere want to see the backward races advance, and nothing is more true than Booker T. Washington's statement that the only way to keep the Negro in a ditch is to stay in there with him. And it also was Washington who cautioned his people against social equality with the whites, but who urged them instead to improve their own racial integrity.

C. I. O. Political Action Committee

REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL STEWART

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, within the last few months many pages have been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the press of the Nation relative to the political activities of the C. I. O. political action committee. Many editorials and news articles have been printed giving the C. I. O. political action committee credit for a number of political scores and a number of political casualties. The biggest issue confronting the American people today is whether or not they shall elect a Representative to Congress typical of their views or allow labor agitators to veer them from the principles for which their sons and daughters are so nobly fighting.

Because my vote on all occasions has voiced the sentiment of the people I represent I have been marked for defeat by labor leaders, labor agitators, and labor racketeers. Two years ago the same issues were in vogue in the Third Congressional District of Oklahoma. The same men will oppose each other in the coming primary on July the 11th. From my point of view the cause which augments all these strikes was the passage of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935. The National Labor Relations Act was voted upon in the House of Representatives on June 9, 1935, and my opponent whom I defeated in the primary of 1942, was then Congressman from the district I now have the honor of representing. No doubt, Mr. Cartwright voted for the passage of the National Labor Relations Act. I say, no doubt, he voted for the passage of this law, because according to the record he was in attendance of Congress on that very day and did not voice his opposition to its passage, for Congressman TABER asked for the yeas and nays on a motion to recommit and only 20 Members arose in support of his motion. Surely, had Mr. Cartwright been one of those 20 members he would have made some kind of record of his opposition.

I am further convinced that Mr. Cartwright supported the National Labor Relations Act because Charles Hathaway, President of the Oklahoma State Federation of Labor, on the 8th day of June 1942, issued an open letter of endorsement of then Congressman Cartwright and asked for contributions from the members of the union to defeat me. Hathaway who is not a resident of our district in his letter said:

> It is my desire to consolidate labor's strength against Stewart. Seldom is a Congressman 100 percent for labor, but Congressman Cartwright's record is outstandingly good.

Upon the passage of the Smith-Connally bill the National Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor in their Weekly News Service of June 8, 1943, listed me among 237 other Members of Congress to be purged in the coming election, and published this threat and warning to the world:

> Regardless of whether it is killed or adopted we shall endeavor to vote out of office any Member of Congress who supports it. Into this effort, the American Federation of Labor will pour every resource at its command.
> In compliance with this mandate, we publish herewith the names of 238 Members of the House of Representatives who voted for the adoption of this vicious antilabor bill.
> STEWART, Oklahoma, and 237 other Members of Congress.

Every resource at the command of A. F. of L. taking into account the tribute imposed upon the workers of this country in the way of a tax before they could work for their Government is staggering, and no doubt, along with the C. I. O. political action committee will endeavor to make good their threat.

The die is cast. The question is, Shall the labor organizations elect a Member of Congress for a district or shall the people arise in their might and accept organized labor leader's challenge and elect their own Congressman?

Mr. Cartwright was appointed a major in the United States Army from civilian life on the 4th of January 1943 without 1 day of basic training, and has enjoyed the salary of that rank up to this good hour with an income-tax exemption of $3,300 per year for him and his family, while I and my family are allowed only $1,200; and add to this the fact that he has not lost one single day in receiving pay from the Federal Government for almost 18 years. We began receiving our salary on January 3, 1943, and at this time a candidate for a second term, while he served eight terms, totaling 16 years.

SOLDIERS WITH 2 YEARS' FOREIGN SERVICE SHOULD RECEIVE A FURLOUGH HOME

Mention has been scant regarding our soldiers, sailors, and marines who have lived in fox holes on the firing line for 2 years without having received a furlough to visit their families. It goes without saying that most of our sons are in the ranks, having completed rigid basic training, as is very necessary in coping with the enemy; few, if any, were appointed from civil life with the rank of a major the very first day they entered the Army.

Mr. Speaker, we urge that every consideration in keeping with the successful prosecution of the war be given our armed forces who have put in two years fighting in foreign territory an opportunity to receive a furlough. It is indeed a contrast when just a few days ago 21 strikes were on in the production of critical war materials for the boys on a 24-hour shift undergoing bombings and spending 30 days and nights in fox holes and the jungles, risking their all that those on the home front might continue to enjoy the blessings of liberty.

A few days ago Mr. S. R. Creswell, Route No. 1, Madill, Okla., passed on to me a letter from his son Howard, who is a private in the Infantry in the Southwest Pacific, which reflects a story of real service to his country, with recognized citations for his outstanding bravery in two major campaigns. Naturally Howard is anxious to receive a furlough and return home for a brief visit with his loved ones He is of a good family. I am well acquainted with his sister, Mrs. Virginia Freeman, and she and her husband are doing everything they can in keeping the home fires burning to the successful end of this terrible conflict.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I ask unanimous consent to include a letter from Pvt. Howard Creswell to his father, as follows:

APRIL 12, 1944.

DEAR DADDY: Have been pretty busy of late. So thought would try and write you while I had time. Has been about 2 weeks since I heard from you. Glad you received the coat but I guess it is too warm to wear it now.

Yesterday, Easter Sunday, we received our ribbons for the Guadalcanal and Vella Lavella campaigns with two stars for the two major campaigns. Also received a good-conduct ribbon. So you can see I have been a good boy. Was A. W. O. L. for 1 day in New Zealand and got 1 week's restriction for it.

You keep asking about when I am to get a furlough home. Virginia even writes that I must not want to come home. I am afraid you people back there will have to write the Congressman from our district and find out the score about why we are not getting a furlough after 2 years overseas. Also thank him for the generosity shown toward us in the mustering-out bill. Do they think they can afford to pay us a hundred more than a soldier who stays in the States where he has a barracks to live in, also hot water and sheets, something I haven't seen now in almost 2 years. If they would come out here, live with these malaria mosquitoes, go through about 500 bombings, spend about 30 days in a fox hole with mud and water up to their waistline, see your buddies get bumped off, have the smell of dead men all around you for said time, without a change of clothes, spend same amount of nights in jungles which are months long each night sweating some slant eye out to come in your hole with you, I think they would change their mind about us being worth only a hundred more than some soldier who has had to stay in the States and fight the strikers or zoot suiters. Well I guess I had better go to chow. Should have hash tonight.

Love,

HOWARD.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most amusing things that has happened in all my campaigns in running for public office is the newspaper advertisement of my opponent charging me with breaking my pledge in franking out a speech I made on the floor of the House on March 29, 1944. The ad in this respect says, "Why break his pledge against free mail to frank a speech to us?" It is really funny. After I had been sworn in as Congressman from the Third District of Oklahoma, and Mr. Cartwright had been appointed a major from civil life, he flooded the district with a speech he made together with 12 other Members of Congress, entitled "Till We Meet Again," yet campaigning with his frank while a major in the Army with a free frank, to say nothing of the many times he used his frank during the campaign of 1942. Another thing that is of interest—the speech he is complaining about being franked out—was printed in my own print shop, the Antlers American, and not printed in the Government Printing Office.

The Way Out—Public Confidence in Government Must Be Reestablished

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me at the Vermont State Republican Convention, Montpelier, Vt., May 17, 1944:

Mr. Chairman, I have read that in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth and man in His image and said, "Let him have dominion over the fish of the sea and the fowl of the air and the cattle of the fields, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth, in the air, on the sea, or under it."

The New Deal administration mistakenly assumed that God was directing a mandate to it.

Under color of a delegated power and by the unlawful and un-American use of authority it never has rightfully had, the Roosevelt administration has stretched its tentacles of federalization around and over a vast domain of vanishing States. Stretched but a little more and further, the power of the Federal Government over every phase of our national, local, and individual functions will be complete.

If the law as laid down by the Attorney General in the Montgomery Ward case is the law of the land—which God forbid—then no business, no home, no liberty is safe. It cannot be that we are so surely under a dictatorship that we cannot escape its penalties by united action to conserve and save our rights The situation is desperate.

War is being used as a cloak to cover totalitarianism. God save the state our forefathers founded.

Some labor leaders recognize the fact that the life or death of labor unions is a depth bomb in this Ward business.

What is sauce for the goose may well be that for the gander some day.

There is dynamite enough in this affair to blow labor unions into eternity, if necessary.

The New Deal is more dynamic than fascism, more revolutionary than communism, more undependable than the wind. It has build up new instruments of public power which in the hands of the political puppets of its selected economic autocracy have provided shackles for the liberties of the people for use against all of us, labor as well as capital.

The assertion that the seizure was made under "an aggregate of delegated powers" should give the people pause. This false assertion of the assimilation of vaguely defined powers as an authority is a dangerous doctrine unless constitutional government has been abandoned. Where does the authority of the President end as a dictator in a democratic republic? If he can seize a man's business and forcibly evict the operating head under his aggregate of powers, and without regard to specific legislation enacted by Congress to deal with such situations, what protection has any citizen against wanton abuse of power? It is no answer to say that Sewell Avery was a recalcitrant representative of big business, nor is there any comfort in the thought that the administration, for reasons best known to itself, has refrained from the use of strong-arm tactics in dealing with similar recalcitrance from such men as John L. Lewis and James C. Petrillo. Political and other considerations may shield the mass of the people from these exercises of asserted power today, but if the assertions are permitted to go unchallenged and unclarified, there can be no effective guaranty of such protection in the future for any of us any time.

Why cannot the people realize where they are? Let's wipe the cobwebs out of our eyes as Americans, first, and as patriots always. We must save ourselves to save our country. The time is at hand.

As Mark Sullivan suggests, and forcefully:

"Mr. Biddle's assertion about the 'aggregate' of the President's powers in wartime and the whole of his statements and actions justify a remarkable interpretation. It would mean that upon the outbreak of war the President would have unlimited powers; that he would not need to rely upon any grant of power from Congress; that as respects conduct of the war, Congress might as well suspend functioning. And conduct of the war may be construed by a President or an Attorney General to include anything the President judges it to include. In effect, upon outbreak of war, the constitutional safeguards of the person and property of citizens would be suspended.

There is a contrary doctrine. It is rooted firmly in one of the great key cases of American law and Government—the decision of the Supreme Court in the Milligan case. During the Civil War, Milligan, a civilian, was seized by the Army, tried by an Army court, and sentenced to death. Thereupon Milligan appealed to the civil courts, ultimately to the Supreme Court, which said that under the circumstances of the Milligan case, the Army did not have the power it had exercised, and that even Congress had no power to confer such authority on the Army. The Court said:

" 'The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people equally in war and in peace; and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented * * * than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine would lead directly to anarchy or despotism.' "

It is not a question of preventing a dictatorship. It is one of getting rid of it now. We must choose between reformation and revolution before the canker of national socialism has become inveterate, before its venom has reached and spread so far into and over so much of the body politic as to be beyond eradication, control, or cure.

We can do too little, too late, and have. Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid—not of the party—but of themselves and their country, to save both.

The misuse of troops in the Montgomery Ward seizure was a discreditable, humiliating, and unnecessary spectacle, one to be long remembered by Americans who believe in equal justice under law. It should let the people know where they and their liberties stand in chancery now, and prevent any opportunity for such an action in the future.

I am for labor and its rights. I am not ready to permit any minority group to run this Government by a promise of votes. That spells the end of Americanism whether capital or labor undertakes to do it.

Liberties are lost by day as well as in a night. Mark well your ballot—while you have the right to vote.

No idea is more deeply rooted in the minds of the American people than the belief that nothing can deprive us of our long-established freedoms, yet, despite that fact and to disabuse the notion, I tell you that nothing but an explosion of public resentment and resistance to further extension and centralization of the Federal Government can raise a sufficient barrier to prevent the complete establishment of national socialism and the disappearance of the States as political entities and their complete federalization and strangulation. These are tragic days in the history of our country. Too many people will learn it too late.

We are today at the crossroads, stuck in the New Deal mire of playing class against class for votes. Free enterprise and loss of liberty mark the parting of the ways. We are losing or have lost both.

What is free enterprise? Free enterprise, my friends, means a lot of little things and is a mighty big thing to all of us. It comprehends our right to live our own lives, run our own jobs, manage our own businesses in our own way without needless Government interference It assures us our right to criticize the Government, bawl out the umpire, make a speech on the public square, travel where and when we choose, work or not as we please. It offers opportunity to everybody, rewards thrift, pays for hard work, initiates ingenuity, thrives on competition, encourages invention, stimulates research, promotes progress, maintains our standard of living. It offers each of us every chance to save and to invest and to build and to grow. Any man who has faith in his idea may take a risk to develop it. That is the way our railroads started as did our motor car industry, our oil and steel, our aviation, and our scientific, mechanized farming, our radio, and a hundred other similar advantages which have made life worth living. It is what made small shops and factories into big ones, started more small ones, made it possible for us to out-produce every other country in the world, hands down, when we had to fight.

That was free enterprise which some folks would like to obliterate and are obliterating as they undertake to change our American way of doing things, as they try to rebuild our whole country on a different thesis and under a new and different system. If those backing the New Deal program (try to rechristen it as they may) had their way, no individual would own his store, his farm, his business. He would be regimented. He would be told how to run his business, his farm, his family, and would belong to the State.

So, Mr. Chairman, I agree with those who contend that it is time for a change in a national administration whose policies would destroy and are destroying free enterprise and individual initiative. I subscribe to the doctrine that no one individual or any group of men is indispensable to our national welfare, the prosecution of the war, or the solution of world problems which shall follow the war Do not be misled.

The New Deal, which under any other name would smell as sweet, has been too long in power. It has grown arrogant. Its policies of unlimited spending and unlimited bureaucracy have practically destroyed republican-democratic government here. The constant encroachment of its policies on individual freedom and private enterprise, as recently exemplified, is a greater threat to the perpetuity of the progress of this Republic than is even the war itself, which is being fought to maintain both.

As Senator CAPPER well said the other day:

"The President has now abandoned the New Deal label. There is no longer anyone to claim this doorstep baby, except HENRY WALLACE. The life-term candidate clings to no lasting principles of government or truth. He changes with the shifting winds of public opinion. He is ready to alter his window dressing from day to day with the shifts of public taste—from the left to the right.

"Today he is seeking to restyle himself as a great conservative. He is shoving Baruch and Jesse Jones, Clayton and Crowley, to the foreground, hoping they will make the public forget Henry Wallace, Milo Perkins, Tugwell, 'Harry the Hop,' 'Henry the Morg,' and 'Sammy the Rose.'

"Someone is being sold down the river.

"The President has repeatedly expanded and enlarged upon the powers delegated to him. Congress now fears to trust him any longer, and therein the representatives of the people reflect the fears of their constituents.

"It is essential to have in the White House at all times a President whom the Congress can trust. It is imperative now. It is impossible to get a wholly new Congress at one election. Therefore, we must either elect another President, abandon our system of government with its divided responsibility, or face a break-down in our national administration."

Never was "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth" stated more clearly.

It is almost a crime the way this administration has hypnotized the American public to its ultimate destruction. It is only the truth which will make them free.

In 1937 "Tommy the Cork" told an interviewer: "The revolution is here. All we can hope to do is to canalize it. Our whole conception of private property is going to be changed."

That was in 1937, and right from the throne. We were blind, deaf, and dumb then as now.

What confronts us today is not the question of whether we are to lose our liberties but whether they have been lost irretrievably. While we still have a vestige of freedom of speech, of press, of assembly, and worship, on the other hand, freedom of enterprise, of labor, and of the smallest concerns of our daily lives are gone with the wind. We should face facts in a fighting mood. Our future is challenged. It is not partisan politics; it is self-preservation which is involved.

Never since the day of its birth as the saviour of the country did the Republican Party have so great an opportunity offered or so tremendous a burden of responsibility to bear as today. It is for the Republican Party to take over and to save a country burdened with a $300,000,000,000 debt, on which the interest alone is almost unpayable. What a job.

Three hundred billion dollars is an awful lot of money. It is a figure so astronomical as to be almost beyond our comprehension. Do you realize that, reduced to one-dollar bills and laid side by side and end to end, $300,000,000,000 would go 317,187 miles, or 13⅓ times around the globe in a highway running 20 feet wide?

If—to get back on the gold standard—we use in our experiment five-dollar gold pieces and pile them on top of one another until we have stacked up $300,000,000,000 worth, we will have made a monument of gold which will soar into the heavens 291,000,000 feet, or 55,113 miles. That is substantially one-fourth of the distance to the moon.

Again using dollar bills, end to end and side by side, we could cover 768,709 acres. That is an area in acres larger than the State of Rhode Island, the District of Columbia, Grand Isle County, and a considerable portion of Essex County, Vt., all combined.

Somebody will have to pick up these dollars sometime to put them or their equivalent back into the Treasury of the United States to keep us solvent.

What can the New Deal find of which to boast in such a sorry spectacle? Is there any reason to doubt that the American people if and when they come to their senses will relieve themselves of the incubus of such incompetence, wastefulness, and bureaucracy as found in the present administration of our internal economic affairs?

The problem which confronts the people, and most especially the Republican Party, is not how to prevent the coming of centralized federalization, for it has arrived. Our problem is how shall we get rid of it.

This administration has interfered in the affairs of the States and cities, taken part in the management of industry and finance and agriculture, assumed the role of a great banker and investor, borrowed millions and spent them on all kinds of projects through which it has undertaken to paralyze opposition and to command public support. It is now back of the theory for global planning, regeneration, and dominion to be consummated under the authority of a powerfully centralized government in which the executive will be a czar. The road to it is wide and plainly blue printed.

The sooner the American people realize the fact, the sooner they will arm themselves to put an end to a type of American socialism which now masquerades under the disguise of pseudo-democracy. The people do not realize that their lives, the affairs of industry, the local concerns of the States are prescribed and ordered and supervised out of Washington. They do not seem to understand that the industrial system is supported by raging floods of purchasing power through the medium of the constantly increasing national debt. Nothing short of a totalitarian government, somebody has said, supported by the weapons of ruthless coercion and the will to use them can bring us out unless we realize what we are up against. We shall be presently up against the final crisis; namely, the necessity of taking the last few steps of the last mile to Federal socialism, the ending of the prologue, the running up of the curtain, or else the inescapable revolution and convulsion. It is time for Republicans to wake up.

The framers of our Government knew all about regimentation, planned economy, colonizations, and other features and governmental schemes, the futility and folly and failure of them as repeatedly demonstrated in the days that had gone. They knew the story of kings and despots, of tyrants and bureaucrats—the beginnings and endings thereof—and definitely and positively would have none of them.

It is only by subversion, the ignoring of the limitations which these men prescribed in the Constitution which they made, the assumption and usurpation of unwarranted power and authority, that it has been possible for the administration autocratically to tell the wage earner what he may earn, how long he may work; the farmer what and how much he may produce on his own farm; the merchant at what price he may sell his goods; the manufacturer what addition he may make to his plant, how much he may produce; to control the flow of capital and savings; to enter into business in competition with private citizens.

State lines have been obliterated, the prerogatives of Congress have been usurped. The right to impose taxes in his discretion has been granted the Secretary of Agriculture. The authority to fix the value of money has been transferred to the President, a power so great over the lives of men it has never been enjoyed save by complete despots. And this is America. It is time to wake up, for the liberty of a people, as Edmund Burke said, has many times been lost in a night. He who loses it loses all. Human rights and property rights are inseparable.

Where does it all lead?

Jefferson said, "Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread." That day is here.

I cannot believe that the American people will stand for a policy which undertakes to saddle this Republic permanently with policies and programs so un-American in conception and unconstitutional in fact and in law which can but spell its end.

The people of America see a world in shambles, business destroyed, broken homes by the millions; tens of millions of men and women sick in body and in mind; other millions whose careers have been interfered with; everywhere the peacetime pursuits of more than a billion people transformed into war pursuits, and a total war bill of nearly half a trillion dollars. They see hatred, vengeance, ruthless ambition, lust for power and more power, and cruel force as the world's arbiters.

They are confused, bewildered, almost helpless. Yet there is a way out for them as there was out of the desperation and hopelessness of their forbears. I think they can pay the price and the bill for today's war with the aid of science, invention, and engineering, and posterity, provided the Republican Party does not let the forces now seeking to do it place the blight of state socialism on the spirit of the masses.

Public confidence in Government must be reestablished. The use of extraordinary war powers, such as were utilized in the Montgomery Ward case without authority, must be limited to winning the war and not playing politics. Social objectives, political ambitions, and attempts to appease special interests must be exorcised and abandoned.

Our capitalistic system which frees enterprise and protects individual initiative and ingenuity, under the supervision of the guiding genius of those who direct the destiny of the Republican Party can show them the way out. That is its responsibility, its duty, and its destiny.

The Republican Party has been the party of action and progress and achievement, from the days of its founding, for more than half a century of our national life. The call and the need for its leadership is stronger today than ever before. The political party which has put into effect the principles and the policies which saved national unity, freed a race, resumed specie payments, established the national credit, fixed the gold standard, restored prosperity; in short, which always when it has been brought to a realizing sense of the responsibility resting upon it, has responded to the call and proven equal to the emergency, will once more respond, will continue to keep the faith, will provide the solution of our problems, and, true to its record, will lead this country out of the slough of despond into the sunshine of complete recovery and prosperity, contentment, and a lasting peace.

The Roosevelt Resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted at a meeting of the executive committee of the New York County Democratic Organization:

Whereas, it is the sense of this committee that the reelection of President Franklin D. Roosevelt is essential to the most efficient prosecution of the war and to the preservation of the social and economic benefits which the country has derived from his administration, and

Whereas, the democracy of New York County subscribes to the liberal and humanitarian values which his administration has upheld, and

Whereas, the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt continues to exemplify these qualities of liberalism, humanity, and progress at home and assures the unimpaired prestige and moral weight of the Nation abroad; now, therefore, be it Resolved, That the New York County committee urges Franklin D. Roosevelt to accept renomination at the grateful hands of his party for the Presidency of the United States.

Eliminate Threat to War Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, while I am happy to advise this Congress that the executive board of the foremen's union has agreed to call off the Detroit strike, involving some 65,000 war workers, I believe it is time for us to act to make certain that there will be no repetition of this disgraceful and unwarranted walk-out.

In this connection I have today introduced legislation to amend the War Labor Disputes Act by prohibiting the unionization of supervisory employees for the purpose of collective bargaining, and I urge that it be given immediate consideration.

By no stretch of the imagination, Mr. Speaker, can this be considered anti-labor legislation. This bill will actually save collective bargaining, which is certain to be destroyed if both management and labor are permitted to sit on the same side of the bargaining table.

The Detroit strike clearly demonstrates the need of congressional action. It definitely proves that the unionization of supervisory employees will continue to be a definite threat to production in our war industries.

Here, on the eve of the greatest military venture in the history of this Nation, 65,000 workers in our most vital war plants were forced to leave their jobs by a few labor racketeers because they were demanding recognition of a union comprising approximately 3,300 foremen in the factories of the city of Detroit.

It was one of the most abominable things I have ever heard of. Precious lives of our soldiers and sailors have been jeopardized by a few inflated labor leaders, greedily reaching for more dues, and determined to rule or ruin America. In all earnestness I say that the men responsible for this strike should be tried for treason. Certainly they are not above the level of other saboteurs who have paid the penalty for their efforts to cripple our war production.

That they have sabotaged our war effort is definitely shown in a statement made today by Gen. H. H. Arnold that the strike for which they were responsible has cost our fighting forces at least 251 long-range Mustang fighter planes.

This disgraceful strike was continued for several days in spite of the fervent pleas of both the Secretary of the Navy and the Under Secretary of War for the men to return to their jobs. Both of these officials issued statements showing their grave concern over the crippling of the production of airplane motors and other matériel of war. In one of his statements the Under Secretary of War, I am told, went so far as to say:

> Our forces are bombing German war plants, but they do not have to do that to ours.

The bill which I have introduced today, Mr. Speaker, should have been written into the original War Labor Disputes Act. I know of no one in Government who believes that supervisory employees should belong to unions for the purpose of collective bargaining. In spite of rulings to that effect by the National Labor Relations Board there has been a continued agitation in the war industries of Michigan and the Nation for the organization of foremen for that purpose. This agitation constitutes a continuing threat to our production and it also raises the possibility that management may have to take time off from its war production job from time to time, to deal with the problem both in plant cities and before the National Labor Relations Board.

During hearings on the various manpower bills before the Committee on Military Affairs a year ago, the opinion of the N. L. R. B. was brought to the attention of the members. It was pointed out that the Board majority ruled that supervisory employees should not bargain collectively.

Chairman Harry A. Millis made the point in the opinion that the Wagner Act requires a decision in each case regarding the appropriate unit for employees. He said:

> To engraft upon the act an amendment which denies to a substantial segment of employees as a class the protection vouchsafed thereunto all employees, is not within the permissible bounds of administrative discretion. It is administrative legislation.

Under this reasoning legislation is needed to clarify the entire question. This bill will do it.

Under this bill there is nothing to prevent foremen from joining any organization they wish to join. The only provision would be that management would not be required to bargain collectively with any organization.

Secretary of Labor Perkins, under my questioning during the manpower hearings, stated that foremen are a part of management and said:

> I have never thought it very wise or proper to have foremen organized in the trade-union group, because the foremen really are representatives of the employers and the employers must have a representative at the operating level.

Supervisory employees voluntarily elect to become a part of management when they assume their positions as foremen. In this position, they, as a part of management, represent the owners of the business. In becoming foremen they assume something of a fiduciary position and they take on additional responsibilities, which include an obligation to act for and on behalf of the owners of business.

A parallel might be drawn with the doctor who voluntarily enters his profession and then is restricted from doing certain things, such as discussing the ailments of his patients.

It is logical to assume that if foremen organize for the purpose of collective bargaining, even though the organization itself may be an independent one, they eventually will be taken into one of the larger labor unions. Some may join one of the national organizations and some may join others. This could contribute only to confusion and interruption of production.

In addition, when they belong to a union, the leaders of that union are in reality their superiors. This certainly would be true in every case where a company had a closed shop or maintenance of membership agreement for the reason that dismissal from the union would mean that a man could no longer earn a living. This divided allegiance would be a serious obstacle to full war production.

Witnesses before the Military Affairs Committee a year ago submitted agreements reached between manufacturers and unions. In one instance an agreement between the coal operators and John L. Lewis, who at that time was seeking to organize foremen and supervisory employees, was read into the record. In each of these agreements supervisory employees and other representatives of management have been excluded from affiliation with the unions by mutual consent because these men actually represent management and there is no place for them in the union.

On page 6 of the hearings on H. R. 2239, H. R. 1742, H. R. 1728, and H. R. 992, dealing with the full utilization of manpower, Mr. John D. Battle, executive secretary of the National Coal Association, said:

> This is not a fight against unionism as such at all. Collective bargaining has been going on in this industry for more than 50 years. But supervisory forces and other representatives of management have been excluded from affiliation with the unions by mutual consent of the operating management and the union management. Because these men actually represent management, there has been no place for them in the union.

Former Senator Edward R. Burke, president of the Southern Coal Producers Association, said:

> There is a third reason why I wanted to come and give you my brief statement, and that is that there is a section of the bill which deals directly with one of the most important problems, as I see it, confronting industry and the economic welfare of this country that exists today * * * That is the attempt of organized labor to take within its ranks supervisory officials; to reach over to the other side of the table and drag over or pull over or persuade to come over to the side where union labor sits a very vital part of management.
> As has already been said by Mr. Battle, the understanding and agreement between the operators of the coal industry and the United Mine Workers of America have always been that each had its own separate field. Throughout the years there has been in the constitution of the International Union of the United Mine Workers a provision that men connected with management were not eligible for membership in the union.

Now, how could anyone think that that provision was written into the constitution of the United Mine Workers and carried there throughout the years because the Mine Workers wanted to unduly restrict their membership or wanted to shut off a profitable source of income? There must have been another reason, and there was another reason, and it was this: That the union leaders, Mr. Lewis and his associates, as they thought about this matter calmly through the years, realized that collective bargaining could be a real success in this country only if the people representing opposing interests sat on opposite sides of the table, and carried on collective bargaining; that by mixing the two groups, by taking a substantial part of management over on labor's side, very soon there was going to be serious interference with collective bargaining.

Mr. C. E. Wilson, president of the General Motors Corporation, appearing for the General Motors Corporation and the Automobile Manufacturers Association, said—page 65:

Management has inescapable responsibilities, which cannot be delegated to others. Such responsibilities are generally recognized and accepted, and the following provisions clearly defining such management responsibilities are included in all collective bargaining agreements which the General Motors Corporation has with unions. Similar provisions are incorporated in collective bargaining agreements of other corporations in the automobile industry. To quote from the General Motors agreement:

"The right to hire; promote; discharge, or discipline for cause; and to maintain discipline and efficiency of employees is the sole responsibility of the corporation except that union members shall not be discriminated against as such. In addition, the products to be manufactured, the location of plants, the schedule of production, the methods, processes, and means of manufacturing are solely and exclusively the responsibility of the corporation."

Mr. Speaker, the bill I have introduced today is timely legislation. It is needed legislation. It should be given immediate consideration. It will prevent a few labor racketeers from destroying collective bargaining. As I stated in the beginning, we cannot have both management and labor on the same side of the bargaining table, and certainly we cannot permit another disruption in our war production as the result of racketeering agitation to organize supervisory employees.

It Looks More Like Dewey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Times-Herald of May 16, 1944:

IT LOOKS MORE LIKE DEWEY

Nothing is certain in this world, but one of the higher probabilities just now is that Gov. Thomas E. Dewey of New York will be the 1944 Republican candidate for President.

Governor Dewey's backers, looking around the political landscape, see a lot of scenery that pleases them.

The total number of delegates at the Republican convention will be 1,059. Mr. Dewey now has 268 elected delegates definitely pledged to support him. Actually, according to a survey published yesterday, 779 convention votes are in the bag in one way or another for Dewey. It takes only 530 votes to nominate.

This figure of 779 does not include California's hefty block of 50 votes, most of which the Dewey crowd expects to go for its man, or the 30 to 40 votes for Lt. Comdr. Harold E. Stassen which are expected to swing to Dewey after a formal gesture at putting Stassen up for nomination. Stassen's backers are reported more concerned about building him up for a nomination in 1948 than about making a serious fight for him in 1944.

Gov. John W. Bricker of Ohio, too, has been losing strength recently, after a fairly impressive showing at the start of this race for the Republican nomination. Ohio's neighboring State of West Virginia was expected to come through with 19 delegates pledged to Bricker, but when the smoke rolled away Dewey was found to have won 16 of West Virginia's 19. Dewey's backers are now optimistic about getting a good-sized part of the Texas delegation—maybe 25 out of the total of 33—whereas Texas was once expected to be solid for Bricker.

All in all, the Dewey nomination seems to be rolling along. Though there will no doubt be many a time bomb planted in our Governor's path and more than one hopeful dark horse straining at its tether, Dewey's nomination may come on the first ballot.

If Dewey does get the nomination, what then? He will still be Governor of New York, with 2 more years of his term to run. The term expires December 31, 1946.

DEWEY RESIGN GOVERNORSHIP?

It is to be expected that considerable clamor will be raised by Democratic opponents of Mr. Dewey for him to resign. There will probably be a good deal of talk about trying to eat his cake and have it too, if he doesn't quit the New York Governorship shortly after being nominated to run for the Presidency.

We can see no reason why Mr. Dewey should pay attention to such clamor. We can see plenty of reasons why he should go on being Governor of New York until the 1944 Presidential election is decided—and for some time after, if he is elected President.

If he keeps the governorship and loses the Presidential election, New York will continue to have a good Governor. If Dewey is elected President and has meantime held onto the governorship, he can wind up his affairs as Governor in an orderly and deliberate way, since the inauguration does not take place till January 20, more than 2 months after the November 7 election.

During the campaign, Dewey as Governor will be in position to head off various New Deal monkeyshines which may be cooked up with a view to cheating the Republicans out of a November 7 victory in New York State. The O'Connell machine in Albany, for example, is widely believed to have added about 13,000 votes to Lehman's plurality in Albany County in the close 1938 election for Governor. With Dewey officially in Albany during the 1944 campaign, the O'Connell machine and like-minded new dealers in other New York areas would have no such leeway for political larceny as they had in 1938.

There are several precedents for this suggested Dewey refusal to resign as Governor if nominated for President.

Theodore Roosevelt, nominated for Vice President in 1900 and elected, kept the governorship of New York till his term expired on January 1, 1901. Before him Grover Cleveland, nominated for and elected President in 1884, went on being Governor of New York—and conscientiously so—till his term expired on January 6, 1885. And the White House incumbent, Franklin D. Roosevelt, did the same thing. He was elected President in 1932 while Governor of New York; he had not resigned as Governor in order to campaign for the Presidency, and he served out his term as Governor to the beginning of 1933.

It seems to be lucky as well as wise for a Governor of New York to keep the governorship when nominated for President, until he is elected to the bigger job. We hope Mr. Dewey will see fit to do just that.

Address by Rev. William J. Kelley at Lynn, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include therein an educational and instructive address delivered by the Rev. William J. Kelley, chairman of the New York State Labor Relations Commission, on the subject of the Social Encyclicals of Pope Leo XIII, at the final banquet of the season of the St. Mary's Labor School in St. Mary's School Hall at Lynn, Mass., Wednesday, May 10, 1944.

TRIBUTE TO CARDINAL O'CONNELL

Ecclesiastical protocol prompts me to express my personal and my priestly sympathy to the people of the archdiocese of Boston, both clergy and laity, on the loss of their great prelate, His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell. During these recent days genuine and gracious virtues have been penned and voiced for this beloved churchman and citizen of Boston. Of the many interests of the beloved prelate, I single out one deserving of your personal and your collective meditation. That interest was his abiding concern for the good and welfare of the working classes. Permit me to refresh your minds. Upon my last appearance here, October 14, 1943, it was my privilege to declare some instances of this concern of his eminence for the workers. We cited first, his cooperation with Cardinal Gibbons when that prelate championed and advocated the rights of man to join the free trade-unions. He aided this able advocate of the workingmen in presenting the issues of the famous Knights of Labor when it was offered to the Vatican. He was in those days, Monsignor O'Connell, head of the North American College. The second instance that we cited in October, was the famous 1912 pastoral letter of his eminence in which he most eloquently pleaded for a charitable forbearance in industrial strife and in which he yearns to extend the kindly interest of religion and the church to the association of the workingmen. Since the October occasion, my studies provided me with another instance of this genuine interest that the beloved prelate had for the workers, I refer specifically to the period when he was bishop of Portland, Maine, and established the Workingmen's Club of Maine. I quote:

"Looking out on the civil and social life of the Catholics here, Portland, Maine, I discerned that other needs than merely religion existed. The dock laborers stood in the cold of long winter nights without a roof to cover them or a fire to warm them, unless indeed, the roof and fire that led to bad company and vice.

"Today (September 1906) facing the wharves at the very place before intemperance lured them, stands a finished club house all equipped with every form of innocent amusement and where every form of food and drink, except those which destroy the body and soul, is at their disposal. That workingmen's club has transformed that district. It will do much to transform whole sections of Portland."

I join the priests and the people of Boston in their prayer. God grant eternal rest to this great prelate, to their beloved shepherd, to this fearless friend of the workingman.

THE ENCYCLICAL

Definition of an encyclical—it is a circular or open letter, one intended by the writer not for any particular individual, but for society. Usually, the encyclical letter is written in view of a particular circumstance that affects the welfare of society.

Chronology and reference to Leo's Encyclicals on Religio-Socio-Economic Interests.

1878: Encyclical entitled, "Quod Apostolici Muneris"—In the first year of his pontificate, Leo denounced Socialism, Communism, and Nihilism.

1879: Encyclical titled, "Aeterni Patris"—That is the study of scholastic philosophy. In this document, Leo referred to the problems of the working people and to the bitter strife of the day.

1882: Leo established a committee in Rome to study the labor question.

1884: Encyclical titled, "Humanum Genus"—Leo spoke here favorably of the guild which had aimed at protecting the worldly interests of working pepole.

1887: Annoncement that Leo had decided to issue an incyclical on labor.

1891: Encyclical titled, "Rerum Novarum"—the condition or the working clasess—Encyclical of May 15, 1891.

MONUMENTAL MAY MESSAGE

The month of May has brought many things of a pleasant nature to society. I single out one the memorable month of May and point to a most practical, profitable, papal pronouncement. The month of May 1891, brought a monumental message and that, from the pen of the then watchman of christendom, Leo XIII, of illustrious memory. The message was styled then and is styled today an encyclical. An encyclical is a circular or open letter, one intended not for any particular individual, but for a large group of people. It is a letter written in view of a particular circumstance—a circumstance which affects the welfare of society.

At the close of the nineteenth century and at the start of his Pontificate, this watchman of christendom was worried. Materialistic forces were awakening. Inventions starting rapidly possibilities appeared rapidly. Humanity seemed restless, demanding freer expression in laws, more liberty of thought, greater intellectual freedom. The worry of the Pontiff revolved about the people's parting with traditional Christian concepts and actions. The question that presented itself was: Should he call attention to the pernicious philosophy that was about? Coupling conviction and courage, Leo wielded his brilliant and facile pen. He admonished society to stop; to take account of itself. The voice of the watchman called out as follows: That the moral aberrations and the political desires of the day emanated from a false philosophy which ignored any authority over individual reason. He warned against the philosophy that would eliminate the supernatural order from the domain of the intellect; of private and social life. He cried out with all his vigor against the dethroning of supernaturalism and the enthroning of materialism, nationalism, and individualism.

The western world, in its desperate search for guidance and conscious of the gigantic tasks before it today, cannot ignore or be indifferent to the religio-socio-economic pronouncements that Leo made in '91. Too long have they been neglected and too few know them. This modern world has too long been a slave to the idea propounded by writers that the science of ethics and the principle of morality must be divorced from the science of economics; that law has no dependency upon ethics; that religion and religious teachers must live in a hermetically sealed compartment from which they dare not emerge to bring the light of religion and morality to bear upon the madness of a materialistic economic system. Leo, in '91 summoned economic enterprise to the courtroom of morality, there to be judged and there to establish right order.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND—OLD-ORDER CAPITALISM

To evaluate the content material of the encylical, we should refresh our minds with the following thoughts: When this document was written, two basic philosophies regarding the construction of the religio-socio-economic order were abroad. One, old-order capitalism. Two, Marxian-Socialism. As to the first—where did it get its origin? It originated from the religious revolution of the sixteenth century, the commercial revolution of the seventeenth century and the industrial revolution of the nineteenth century, and its philosophy was materialistic to the core. No one voiced the spirit of the day of old-order capitalism more vigorously than Adam Smith. He reduced to writing the convictions of the leaders and the scholars of old-order capitalism, and we note that this old man and these alleged scholars surveyed the current economic phenomena and drew conclusions calling their conclusions the fixed laws of economics. Now, let's look at some of these laws.

Said this school of old-order capitalism, man is one of the useful tools in the production of wealth. Therefore, his activities are subject to the law of supply and demand. The next fixed law—all men are urged on by self-interest. Just so long as no outside force interferes, the combination of economic laws will provide material prosperity and the resultant well-being for the worker. Any interference by the organized state with the operation of these economic laws is bound to end in disaster. Such was the social philosophy in vogue when Leo took up his pen. History testifies as to the results of such a philosophy. Some of the results I recall to your minds: First, low wages fixed in a labor market dominated by the ruthless application of the law of supply and demand; the second result was inhuman working conditions; and the third result, labor unions were proscribed as a criminal conspiracy. We have noted the philosophy of old-order capitalism, stated some of its results, and now we would like to indicate its influence. Old-order capitalism wrapped its tentacles around the British Parliament in the nineteenth century. It affected American legislation until late—very late—in the nineteenth century. For documentation of this declaration one only needs to analyze American court decisions up to 1930.

MARXIANISM

We pass from old-order capitalism to the great paradox of economic history. Old-order capitalism gave legitimate birth to the system which is today its most relentless enemy—Marxian socialism. Karl Marx, in his survey of the world under old-order capitalism, was quick to see how the operations of the old system were leading gradually to the concentration of wealth in an ever-diminishing number of hands. This he attributed to the system by which all the agencies of this production were privately owned. From this came his prediction that in the course of time the wealth of a nation being owned by an infinitesimally small number exploiting the so-called economic laws the masses of the proletariat. The same proletariat by sheer force of numbers would exterminate capitalism and the system of private property upon which it rested. Common ownership would take its place. Pursuing his prediction, Marx developed his celebrated materialistic concept of history. In that concept he saw all human events, all social and political changes, determined by the interplay of economic forces. The social system—one of ceaseless warfare between the two classes—the capitalist employer and the proletariat employee. Marxian philosophy was as fundamentally materialistic as the capitalistic system he sought to destroy, and historically a direct descendant of it.

Leo recognized the inherent dangers of old-order capitalism on the one hand, and Marxianism on the other. As early as 1887 Cardinal Marmillod announced that Leo had decided to issue a world-wide letter on labor. Three men aided in the preparation of this magna charter for workers. From Leo's many manuscripts and his pronouncements on labor (an outline of which is made part of this address), Cardinal Zigliara drafted this document. It was philosophical in its approach to the topics. Leo's two secretaries, Boccali and Volpini, revised the draft along more practical lines. The manuscript again found its way back to the desk of Zigliara for further philosophical preciseness. After a few more changes Leo himself added the final touches and the world received a monumental message on May 15, 1891. The message—the major premise of the papal announcement was to point out the false teachings of both old-order capitalism and Marxian socialism on the subject of private property.

THE REASONING FOR LEO'S CONDEMNATION

Leo condemned the materialistic premise on which both old-order capitalism and Marxian socialism rests. The pontiff points out that man has a higher destiny than that of merely furthering production of economic goods and therefore it is basically false in any scheme for man's social betterment to regard him solely as an economic tool; said Leo, human labor is not a commodity. The final end of man is God the Creator, not economic production. Every practice, every rule, every corollary of economic science must be squared with eternal science. That was Leo's conviction and because Marxianism denied man's supernatural character and because Pagan capitalism ignored it, Leo censured them.

POSITIVE POINTS OF THE ENCYCLICAL—PRIVATE PROPERTY

With the destruction of the ancient guilds, workingmen had been given over, isolated, and defenseless to the callousness of the employer and became the victims of a philosophy of unrestrained free competition popularly called economic liberalism. Leo enunciates in his document the traditional teaching of the Catholic Church regarding property. Private property is a natural right. Man is older than the state and holds the right of providing for his body before the state was formed. The right to own property and to provide for oneself is a natural right which no state can destroy against the owner's consent. The encyclical deplores the abuse which some people have made of their right of private property; but, says Leo, the abuse of a right never destroys the existence of a right. Hence, we understand why Leo rejects socialism as a plan of living—because it would abolish private property. Yet this right of property carries with it a social obligation. Man may not exercise his natural right to harm society, but Leo offers some very telling points when he would have the economic order so rearranged that there is a complete distribution of possession of private property in the hands of all.

Under the socialist plan the workingman would be the first to suffer—and here is the reasoning: A man labors to earn money by which he can carry on his existence and provide for the future, but if a man cannot keep what he earns for tomorrow, he will have no interest, no initiative, for work. Therefore, man in the socialist scheme would have no interest in work because he and his family are the property of the state. Socialism is condemned because it not only destroys initiative but it deprives man of protection.

WAGES

The second major encyclical teaching is that which pertains to wages. The encyclicals are uncompromising in their statement that those who toil should receive a living wage. In this concept of the living wage there is contemplated a return to a just reorganization of the entire economic sphere—so that heads of families who are charged with the obligation to support those dependent upon them will receive a living wage large enough to support them and their families in reasonable comfort. We must see to it that a living wage is paid to the heads of families and then family stability will not be disturbed.

If the laborer has the right to a living wage, so industry has the right to be protected against abuses which would undermine it and which would prevent business from paying a just living wage to employees. All America knows the abuses—the strangulation of small business, the violent cutting of prices so as to choke off competition. Let it be remembered that while complying with God's manifest law of giving labor a living wage, we must also give industry safeguards which make industry's compliance with that law possible in the economic order.

THE DUTY OF THE STATE

The State, in a democratic society, exists to promote the good and welfare of all its citizens and to protect individuals and groups of individuals from one another. The multitude of those who labor have their God-given right to that kind of an economic existence which will not endanger their eternal destiny. Since man has this right, a corresponding duty rests upon society or the State to protect that right and here. Leo grows very specific:

"Whenever the general interest of any particular class suffers or is threatened with evils which can in no other way be met, public authority must step in to meet them."

It is not the purpose of the State to submerge or subjugate the individual or the family. The encyclical looks to the employers to put into practice moral teachings in relation to their employees. The encyclical recognizes that conditions may arise in which the State must lend its assistance to the employer in his good intention to give his employee a just, living wage. What type of assistance is this which is indicated? The State entering into the domain of private enterprise? No. Rather, the desire is for the State to correct the abuses of existing society passing legislation thereby removing the difficulties that an employer encounters who gives his employes a just, living wage. The encyclical does not ask merely for justice between employers and employees. It advocates understanding, friendship, and copartnership stressing the point that both are mutually interdependent—industry and labor. In the quest for economic justice, the encyclical is not unmindful of the difficulties but points out the way to remove the difficulties. My purpose in this discourse to you tonight has been to give you an indication of the encyclical's direction of thought and positive constructive recommendations. The talk has been deliberately designed to awaken your interest in Leo's document. For yours it is to determine the future course of reform in the American social scene. It is up to you to make Leo's recommendation a reality, namely, that all in a given industry should be united together in occupational groups.

CONCLUSION AND CHALLENGE

Catholic men of Massachusetts, Leo, the Pope of the workingman, has long since gone to God; William, the Prelate of Boston, the genuine friend of the worker, has recently gone to God. How pleasing and proud these two churchmen and friends would be if they saw a reawakening and a reassessing of the encyclical doctrines by the Catholic employers and the Catholic employees of the great Archdiocese of Boston. I leave you now with a challenge, the challenge comes from the pen of the beloved Pontiff Pius XII, now happily reigning:

"What a proud vaunt it will be for the American people, by nature inclined to grandiose undertakings and to liberality, if they untie the knotty and difficult social question by following the sure paths illumined by the light of the Gospel and thus lay the basis of a happier age."

Men of Massachusetts, there is a challenge to you. It deserves to be taken on. What say you?

Price-Control Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following recommendations of the board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce:

The board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, at its meeting on May 27, 1944, adopted the following recommendations of the special committee upon price control legislation:

1. That the extension of price control legislation be limited to the period ending June 30, 1945.

Statement: Because of the drastic controls involved, it is desirable that Congress limit the extension of authority to 1 year only, thus retaining the unrestricted right to end legislation or modify it in a comparatively short period.

2. That hearing and special court procedure be so modified as to permit reasonable access to the courts on the part of protestants or aggrieved parties.

Statement: The special court procedure provided in the present Price Control Act, goes almost the whole way in preventing access to courts by aggrieved individuals. Your committee believes it not only fair and just but essential to our form of government, that even in these wartimes, individuals should be permitted reasonable protection through the courts of our land.

(a) That the time limit of 60 days in the filing of protests be removed.

Statement: The regulations of the Administrator are published only in the Federal Register, and this is considered as constructive notice to everyone. A person affected by a regulation should not be deprived of his right to protest against the regulation unless he has actual notice of the regulation and a reasonable time within which to prepare his protest and assemble evidence in support thereof. Under the Price Control Act a regulation may be set aside only if it "is not in accordance with law or is arbitrary or capricious." There seems no justification for putting a time limit on protests which challenge the validity of a regulation. There is no time limit preventing citizens from attacking the validity of any statute passed by Congress, and there seems to be no reason for giving a greater sanctity to the regulations of an administrator than is given to a statute passed by Congress.

(b) Protests shall not be dismissed because of the absence of direct damage to the person filing such protest.

Statement: The necessity of proving that a person suffers direct damage as now required is an undue burden and, in the opinion of your committee, not essential to effective operation of the act.

(c) The regularly constituted courts shall have jurisdiction with respect to all matters pertaining to the price-control program, except the power to enjoin or restrain the price regulation.

Statement: It is a serious and questionable proceedure, at best, to depart from the regularly constituted court procedures in connection with any legislation. While the interests of war may justify some limitation on injunctive and restraining actions, it is not a desirable or healthful situation to otherwise restrict the normal operations of our courts.

Your committee would favor elimination of any special court provisions were it not for the fact that the act has already been in operation a considerable length of time, and much confusion might result from varying and conflicting actions by the many courts throughout the Nation with respect to injunctions and restraining orders.

(d) The Price Control Act should be amended to provide that where a citizen is prosecuted in any court for violating a regulation he should have the right to set up as a defense to the prosecution the invalidity of the regulation.

Statement: Under the act as it now reads, a citizen charged with the violation of a regulation of which he may have had no knowledge whatsoever is absolutely debarred from setting up in his defense the invalidity of the regulation. A citizen charged with the violation of any State or Federal law has the right to challenge the validity of that law or statute before the court in which he is being prosecuted. It is contrary to the basic principles of American justice that a citizen who is being charged with a crime should be deprived of the right to set up in his defense the invalidity of a regulation by an administrative agent of the Government for the violation of which he is being prosecuted. The Supreme Court has held, in the case of Yackes v. The United States of America, that the only protection which a citizen has against an invalid regulation is to challenge the validity of the regulation before the special court set up by the act, and this right to challenge is denied a citizen unless his protest is first filed with the administrator within 60 days from the time the regulation was issued and published in the Federal Register.

(e) The procedure with regard to filing protests before the Administrator should be amended to provide that after the petitioner has filed his protest with the Administrator, the Administrator shall advise the petitioner of the evidence upon which the Administrator will rely, and the petitioner then be given the opportunity of filing additional evidence to meet the evidence upon which the Administrator proposed to rely.

Statement: As the act now reads, a petitioner must set forth his evidence in his protest before he even knows what data the Administrator relied upon in promulgating the regulation in question. As stated by Justice Roberts: "It is hardly necessary to dilate upon the burden thus placed upon a protestant or the extent to which he is compelled to fill the record with what he may think relevant, only to find that he has been shooting at straws." A protestant is certainly entitled to know the evidence that he must meet. He is already at a serious disadvantage in being obliged to make his protest before an administrator who has already prejudged the case by having issued a regulation in a form objectionable to the protestant. Since the only evidence that the protestant can rely upon is that introduced with his protest before the Administrator, the protestant is certainly entitled to a fair opportunity to meet all the issues of fact.

(f) The procedure for filing complaints before the Emergency Court of Appeals should be amended to provide that the Administrator shall be required to incorporate in his transcript all of the evidence submitted by the protestant, and all of the evidence upon which the Administrator relied in issuing his regulation.

Statement: Under the procedure now established where a protestant has had his protest denied by the Administrator and files a complaint before the Emergency Court of Appeals, the Administrator is required to file a transcript of such portion of the proceedings as he considers are material to the complaint. The Administrator's statement of considerations without anything more, constitutes proof in the case. The Administrator is not obliged to include in the transcript any evidence that he does not desire to include, and is only required by the act to submit "a summary statement of the basic facts which justify the regulation." The protestant has no right to introduce any further evidence. His case is decided "on the record." Thus the Administrator has the right to make up the record in such way as he feels will best justify his regulation. The complainant has the burden to establish to the satisfaction of the court that the regulation "is not in accordance with law, or is arbitrary or capricious." The complainant must demonstrate beyond doubt, before the court is authorized to set aside the regulation, that the considerations or conclusions of the Administrator (which are generally based on a mass of economic opinion consisting of studies made by his own subordinates) cannot support the Administrator's judgment that what he has done by way of regulation or price schedule tends to prevent post-war collapse of values, or to prevent dissipation of defense appropriations through excessive prices, or to prevent impairment of the standard of living of persons dependent on life insurance, or to prevent hardship to schools—to enumerate but a few of the stated purposes of the act. As stated by Justice Roberts: "The Court review is a solemn farce, in which the Emergency Court of Appeals and this Court (United States Supreme Court), on certiorari, must go through a series of motions which look like judicial review, but in fact are nothing but a catalog of reasons why, under the scheme of the act, the courts are unable to say that the Administrator has exceeded the discretion vested in him."

(g) The act should be amended to provide that where the Emergency Court of Appeals issues a permanent injunction, the injunction shall immediately become effective and shall remain effective unless the decision of the Emergency Court of Appeals is subsequently reversed.

Statement: As the act now reads, the Emergency Court of Appeals may not issue a temporary injunction or restraining order (as can our courts of law in practically every other situation), but can issue a permanent injunction, but such permanent injunction does not become effective for 30 days, and if in the interim the Government appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States, the permanent injunction does not become effective until after the Supreme Court of the United States has acted. If the Court of Appeals, in deciding one of these cases, decides that a permanent injunction should be issued, then there is no reason why that injunction should not become effective immediately and remain effective unless stayed in the usual manner provided by law applicable to litigation generally.

(h) The act should be amended to provide that in the event the Administrator does not issue his decision upon a protest within 30 days from the date of the filing of the protest, or within 15 days after the protestant has filed all of the evidence which he is permitted to file, whichever is the latter date, then the regulation shall be suspended until such time as the decision is rendered by the Administrator.

Statement: Businesses may be ruined and whole industries badly crippled by undue delay in decisions and protests. Your committee believes that the burden should be upon the Administrator to act with reasonable promptness.

(i) The Price Control Act should be amended to eliminate the provisions whereby in the event of the violation of a regulation or price schedule, the person who buys the commodity may bring an action to collect $50 or treble the amount by which the price exceeded the schedule, whichever would be greater, plus attorney's fees and costs.

Statement: Your committee believes it an unwholesome policy to provide by law for the rewarding of individuals for their participation in an unlawful transaction. It is reported that there have already been instances of individuals who have made a business of detecting minor or inadvertent violations and collecting $50 in each instance. In some cases these rewards have been collected where the individual did not originally uncover the violation.

3. That trade associations, general farm organizations and other interested groups of persons shall have standing to challenge price-control orders, even though they may not be directly affected in a precuniary manner.

The special court procedure wherein it is often necessary to make protests and pleadings in Washington, imposes a burden upon individuals of limited means who cannot possibly go to our Nation's Capital to present their claims. Therefore, it is our recommendation that farm and trade associations be permitted to appear in their behalf.

4. That where industry committees are asked to advise with the Administrator, the members of such committees shall be truly representative of the major segments of the industry involved, on as broad a geographical basis as possible.

Industry committees are appointed by the Administrator and in many cases are not truly representative of the industry and the various parts of the country involved, or properly qualified to speak in their behalf.

Tribute to Col. Irving A. Lindberg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, a distinguished citizen of Iowa, Colonel Irving A. Lindberg, has served some 30 years as high commissioner of the United States and general collector of customs in Nicaragua. Owing to a change in the international debt situation, that service has terminated, or is about to terminate, and President Somoza has issued a very enlightening and interesting comment on Colonel Lindberg's services. There has also appeared in the newspaper La Naticia, published in Managua, Nicaragua, an editorial dealing with Colonel Lindberg's 30 years of service. I ask unanimous consent that the statement and the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT MADE BY PRESIDENT GENERAL ANASTACIO SOMOZA TO A CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE APRIL 15, 1944

The American administration of the Collectorship-General of Customs created as a guarantee for the total cancelation of the Ethelburga debt (sterling loan) could be discontinued at any moment; but we must acknowledge the wonderful work of the actual Collector, Irving A. Lindberg, whose honest, clean, and diligent task has made him worthy of the state's recognition. Col. Irving A. Lindberg is a national institution. I consider him identified with the destinies of Nicaragua, for which he has a sentimental and sincere feeling. We owe to this magnificent public functionary the reorganization of the customhouse system upon a firm basis, and we shall keep him in that post as an example of justice and in recognition of the good management of the interests entrusted to his experience and illustriousness.

[Translation of an editorial in La Noticia, Managua, Nicaragua, May 2, 1944]

COLONEL LINDBERG HAS GIVEN 30 YEARS OF GOOD SERVICES TO NICARAGUA

Thirty years have passed since Col. Irving A. Lindberg entered the Customs Service of the Republic of Nicaragua and was later appointed High Commissioner by the American Government. Colonel Lindberg's profession was banking accounting and railway engineering, and on 3 consecutive days he was offered three positions as administrator of customs, assistant general manager of the National Bank of Nicaragua, and assistant general manager of the Pacific Railway of Nicaragua.

He accepted the customs service, as he had come to Nicaragua to help install an accounting system for the Government of Nicaragua, and for 3 months studied the tribunal of accounts, the customs, and administration of internal revenues. He secured leave of absence for a year from the American Government where he was an efficiency expert for a time in the White House in Washington, but remained in Nicaragua and he has served in all capacities in the customs as guard, checker, warehousekeeper, customs appraiser, bookkeeper, cashier, and administrator of customs, as well as on many commissions for the Government of Nicaragua and abroad.

The tasks of men engaged in such missions as Colonel Lindberg's require for successful prosecution more than professional competence. Their duties must be performed with tact and understanding. The inevitable clashes rising from differing practices and conceptions cannot be adjusted by arbitrary means if good feeling is to be maintained. The umpire must exercise tolerance as well as firmness; he must be explanatory as well as right; he must see two sides of a shield when those with whom he is in controversy see only one. His is a taxing job. Colonel Lindberg has performed it well, to the credit of himself and his country, and to the satisfaction of Nicaraguans.

Problem of European Ethnical Frontiers in Peace Planning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Constantine Brown, appearing in the Washington Star of Sunday, May 14, entitled "War-Breeding Triangle Rises To Plague Peace Planners."

This is an exceedingly interesting and timely discussion of an important subject.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR-BREEDING TRIANGLE RISES TO PLAGUE PEACE PLANNERS—STRATEGIC-BORDERS PROGRAM IN EUROPE RUNS INTO AGE-OLD PROBLEM OF RIGHTS OF HUMANS TO GOVERN SELVES AS THEY MAY DESIRE

(By Constantine Brown)

There are at least two dozen sets of committees and commissions in Washington feverishly studying various political, economic, and military plans for post-war Europe. Thousands of officials—either permanent civil servants or outsiders—are members of these committees. Voluminous blueprints are being drafted to create a new world in which wars would be as out of date as is hunting with the bow and arrow or with the falcon.

The inspiration for these plans comes, of course, from the top policy framers in Washington and London. The directives are given by these trained diplomats who represent an odd combination of Metternich political philosophy with the most modern "a bottle of milk for every individual in the world" slogan of our most advanced political men.

Hours are being spent contemplating detailed maps of Europe—the focus of war infection for as many centuries as history is known. New terrtiorial lines are being drawn along strategic lines. Russia, which is just emerging as the foremost military power in the European continent, insists that all danger to her security must henceforth be removed and our diplomats are busy drafting boundaries which would give the Soviets the required security. The courses of the rivers and the strategic importance of the river banks are being carefully examined. The location of the marshes is being studied. The peaks and the character of the mountains which are to form the future boundaries of Europe form the subject of long dissertations on the part of the official specialists. A new Europe is being redrafted on strategic rather than human lines.

However, these excellent officers of the many commissions and committees appear to overlook one important element—the human being. They seem to forget that these valleys and mountains are inhabited by peoples who have their own ideas of how they want to live and be ruled.

WANT INDEPENDENCE

A quick glance at the map of Europe will show the problem in its naked truth. If one draws a line from, say, Tornio in Finland to the Adriatic, another line from the same spot to the Black Sea, and unite the two with a transversal line from the Adriatic to the Black Sea a triangle will be formed. In this triangle live about 100,000,000 persons who have national aspirations and who speak different languages and belong to different creeds and races. But they have one thing in common—an irreducible desire to be independent and to rule themselves according to their own standards.

For several hundred years most of the European wars have started from this area. Either the Slavs in the east attempted to subjugate the triangle, or the Germans from the west tried to deprive them of their freedom, or the barbarians from the south—the Turks in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries also were described as such—conquered them and endeavored to keep them as a part of their empires.

They all succeeded for a while. But so long as the "triangle" nations—Finland, the Baltic provinces, Poland, Bohemia, Hungary, Rumania, Serbia, Bulgaria, and Greece—were kept in servitude by any of their more powerful neighbors there was no peace in Europe. Either these strongly nationalistic states rebelled against their conquerors or other nations, thinking in strategic and military terms fought each other for them.

The wars between Turkey and Russia which lasted more than a century were waged by the Russian rulers, officially at least, for the liberation of the Christians in the Balkans from the yoke of the infidel. But actually they were prompted by Russia's desire to obtain better strategic frontiers. The first partition of Poland was the idea of the Prussian King, Frederick the Great. It started with the establishment of a cordon sanitaire—an expression frequently heard from Moscow now to prevent an epidemic of plague, which had broken out in Poland, from spreading into Prussia.

Troops were sent there for that purpose. Eventually, when it appeared to Frederick that he could not get away with the conquest under that flimsy pretext, he urged his powerful neighbors; Austria and Russia, to divide the spoils and the first partition of that independent but badly ruled kingdom occurred. For several centuries there were attempts by the powers east and west of the triangle to obtain a permanent foothold in this vitally strategic area of Europe but never have the people themselves been conquered.

In the peace intervals when the great powers were preparing for bigger and better wars of conquest, the nationals of the nations of the triangle were staging rebellions and revolutions which were always ruthlessly suppressed. The physical demonstrations were crushed but the nationalist feeling has always remained alive.

SOURCE OF PRESENT WAR

Even the present war broke out in the triangle when Hitler decided he could with impunity extinguish the national life of Poland. The organized resistance of the Poles was crushed in less than a month, but Hitler's action brought the whole world against him. The world, including the far-away United States, is paying dearly today for Hitler's attempt to extend the strategic boundaries of the Reich to the east.

President Wilson recognized the importance of the triangle's fight for life in 1917 when he issued his proposals for the settlement of a peaceful world on ethnical frontiers rather than on strategic boundaries. Whatever mistakes our World War President may have made in handling the international situation, he certainly put his finger on the only possible solution of the European problem when he forced the recognition of ethnical boundaries and created a new set of states on the principle of nationalities. It is safe to say that had the present war not been precipitated by the short-sighted policy of the European leaders, these new states eventually would have overcome their growing pains and would have become viable independent states.

They themselves recognized that there must be an economic unity among them and endeavored to organize an economic union such as the Danubian Confederation. But the jockeying for power on the part of France, Italy, and Germany prevented such an accomplishment by diplomatic action. These three powers agreed to the organization of such a confederation provided, however, that they individually had political control over it. As far back as the summer of 1931 this plan came close to fruition. It was killed at the eleventh hour when the friction over the confederation between the Rome and Paris governments threatened the peace of Europe. These two governments—until the war Russia still was politically ostracized—had agreed on zones of political and economic influence in the triangle, but could not agree to a constructive organization of the smaller states in Central and Eastern Europe.

History apparently teaches lessons which diplomats refuse to learn.

BALTIC STATES CITED

Today the attention of the British and American planners is concentrated once more on the remaking of the map of Europe on the basis of strategic rather than ethnical frontiers. There is, of course, an apparent difference between the old peacemakers of the last few centuries and those of today. Instead of discussing outright annexations they speak about the right of the people themselves to determine their future. Officially it sounds well.

But looking back only 4 years, it is, in fact, nothing more than playing the old game with different tools. The Baltic states, created under the pressure of President Wilson, were annexed to Russia under the guise of a popular plebiscite after most of the reactionaries—that is to say, the leaders who insisted on the independence of their republics—had been exiled to Siberia or the White Sea.

It would be a grave mistake for the policy framers of the United States to be emotional in discussing the future of Europe. By definition a diplomat should be deprived of any sentiment or emotion. As much as we may like or dislike the Poles, the Russians, or the Balts, and the rest of the people of Europe, the business of our policy framers is to avoid the recurrence of another war within the next or the third generation.

Establishing new frontiers in Europe in accordance with the strategic needs of some of the members of the United Nations would serve no good purpose but would prepare that strife-ridden continent for a sad series of rebellions and eventually wars. While the possession of strategically situated islands in the Pacific may discourage any potential enemy from another aggression, history has amply demonstrated that the remapping of Europe on the basis of strategic needs—regardless of what pompous names these changes are being blessed with by diplomats—is conducive to new conflicts and war.

In the past we were merely spectators to the tragedy of Europe. Today, however, as has been shown, the lives and the wealth of the American people are being sacrificed in the European nations' struggle for power. And a resettlement of Europe on any other basis than ethnical is bound to draw the United States into still another blood bath.

Appointment of James Forrestal As Secretary of the Navy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Choice of Forrestal Held One of the Best," written by David Lawrence and appearing in the Washington Evening Star of May 13, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHOICE OF FORRESTAL HELD ONE OF THE BEST—WASHINGTON OFFICIALDOM IS SEEN NEEDING BIT OF REJUVENATION

(By David Lawrence)

President Roosevelt did much more than reward James Forrestal when he appointed him Secretary of the Navy. He really recognized the importance of putting younger men at the helm. For what official Washington needs nowadays is a bit of rejuvenation. Too many old men whose ideas are sound enough in their way but who are not equal to the tremendous problems that lie ahead are in key positions.

War is a young man's game. And so are the dilemmas of reconstruction. Most people are inclined to think that official Washington with its many desk jobs presents an easy time with lots of social leisure. As a matter of fact, 9 out of 10 men who occupy important jobs in Washington work 10 or 12 hours a day and then carry their business home in brief cases. The stories of those who drop by the wayside due to ill health are numerous, though they do not often get into the newspapers because many of these officials are not prominent enough to warrant attention.

But the whole war period has taken a toll of officials in high and low places. The war cabinet, which means not only the heads of peacetime departments but the heads of agencies dealing with war operations—civilian and military—are carrying burdens the like of which nobody in Government has ever known before. For while the World War was just as intense, it was not as lengthy. The strain on public officials who have now been hard at work since September 1939 is something new in American public life.

FEW PERIODS OF REST

Periods of rest and relaxation are occasional. Every now and then some official is authorized to take a vacation due to the physician's orders, but actually most of them work on until they are compelled to drop out.

The same is true of the legislators nowadays. Members of Congress find the war strain more severe than ever. Not only are they belabored by the usual problems of legislation but they are asked to run errands here for their constituents in connection with the war. Every Member of Congress finds the going harder than usual. Then on top of it all, the entire House of Representatives and one-third of the Senate must go before the people in a national campaign this year.

In many respects it is unfortunate that there has to be an election at this time. The Constitution, of course, provides for it and there is not the slightest intention of avoiding an election, as so many hostile critics have suspected and charged. It is one thing to say that an election will not be held and it is another to argue that it ought not to be held. There is no way that an election can be deferred because the Constitution provides for it. But neither the Canadian nor the British Governments have found it necessary to hold elections in the midst of war.

Under the Canadian and British parliamentary system, an election can be withheld. Thus if the parliamentary system was in vogue in America, an election could be postponed till peace is declared, when a new President would be elected instead of retaining one tired out from the labors of the war period.

RESPECTED BY LEADERS

The appointment of James Forrestal to be Secretary of the Navy brought a wave of satisfaction throughout official Washington. This was not merely because Mr. Forrestal is a competent official who deserves the promotion, but because he is a young man and the very type who ought to be given weighty responsibilities these days.

Mr. Forrestal has not only the respect of the people inside the Navy Department with whom he has worked intimately—both naval officers and civilian officials—but he has the respect and confidence of Members of Congress. This is most important because the Secretary of the Navy has much to do with Congress in getting appropriations and with keeping Congress informed on various changes in naval policy as the appropriations are put into use.

Mr. Forrestal will bring to the Cabinet table sound business judgment. He is neither an anti-new dealer nor a new dealer. He is what might be called a true liberal. He knows that neither people nor governments can remain static and that certain reforms are long overdue, but he has always insisted that because reforms are necessarily painful at times they should all the more be administered by those sympathetic to the problems of the citizenry. The Forrestal appointment is one of the best ever made by President Roosevelt.

The Treaty-Making Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial and several articles from the Washington Post of May 16 and 17, 1944:

[From the Washington Post of May 17, 1944]

PEACE MACHINERY

We hope that every Member of Congress will take time to read Representative SOL BLOOM's pamphlet on the treaty-making power. It is by no means a denunciation of the Senate for that body's occasional abuse of its power to shape policy in the international field. Rather it is a thoughtful analysis of the background of the two-thirds rule in treaty making and of the reasons why the House was originally excluded from the process.

Two facts should be borne in mind, says Mr. BLOOM, in trying to understand why the founding fathers in this instance departed from the sound rule that questions of policy be decided by majority votes. First, the framers had been accustomed to a system of treaty making by Congress. Both before and after the adoption of the Articles of Confederation the negotiation of treaties had been handled directly by Congress. So the founding fathers supposed that the Senate would be intimately associated with the President in the negotiation of treaties in addition to passing final judgment upon them. No doubt that was an important reason why the larger House was given no part in these proceedings.

"The second fact to be remembered," says Mr. BLOOM, "is that the union could not have been formed without giving to the States equal suffrage in the Senate." The small States feared that their interests would be sacrificed if they didn't have an equal voice with the large States and the chance of defeating treaties which they might consider obnoxious. The New England States were concerned lest their fishing rights be bargained away by treaty. The Southern States were determined to keep the Mississippi open to navigation. In order to reassure the small States that their interests outside their own borders would be safeguarded, the convention accepted the compromise that now plagues a great and powerful Nation.

The important point which Mr. BLOOM makes is that the conditions which led to the adoption of the treaty-ratifying provisions have long since disappeared. Today the treaty-making power is important only in safeguarding and promoting our national interests. Indeed, the relations between ourselves and many of our allies in this war are as close as was the relationship between the several States when the Constitution was adopted. For the sake of preserving those relations in good order it is now imperative that we take away the power of a minority to control the making of treaties.

At best the two-thirds rule was a makeshift departure from sound principle. That it has stood so long while other features of the Constitution have been brought into line with democratic practices can be explained only by the comparative lack of interest of the American people in foreign affairs until recent years and by the growth of executive agreements as a means of effectuating foreign policies. Each day that now brings us closer to the peace table once more is a plea for a return to the sound policy that the founding fathers sacrificed to expediency.

STANDPAT SENATE

(By Merlo Pusey)

BLOOM'S FIGHT ON TWO-THIRDS RULE

Chairman BLOOM of the House Foreign Affairs Committee has launched an open campaign to democratize our treaty-making machinery. He will wait no longer for the hide-bound Senate to reform itself. That appears to be sound judgment. If our peacemaking system is to be modernized, apparently the House, the States, and the people will have to do it.

Members of the House have been reluctant in the past to demand a share in the treaty-making power. They have hoped in vain that the Senate would see the light and itself take the lead to wipe out the arrangement which makes it possible for a handful of recalcitrants to hamstring international policies approved by the majority. But months have passed and the Senate Judiciary Committee has not so much as scheduled hearings on the Gillette resolutions for modification of the two-thirds rule.

Obviously, then, the standpat Senate must be prodded. What prods shall be used? Chairman BLOOM has given us a good example of what the House can do. The House is deprived of a share in policy making in a field that now promises to be our major national concern in the years just ahead. It has good cause to cry to high heaven against the discriminatory vestige in the Constitution which makes this possible.

Following up the devastating logic of Representative BLOOM's 14 points, the House can pass a resolution proposing amendment of the Constitution so as to make treaties effective when approved by majority votes in both branches of Congress. Members of the House can also unite in demanding planks in the platforms of the two major parties pledging modernization of our treaty-ratifying system. Then of course they could carry their campaign to the people.

The States also can make their influence felt. For example, the Democratic State Convention in North Carolina recently adopted a plank calling for a constitutional amendment to redistribute the power of approving treaties between the House and Senate. Still more direct action can be taken by State Legislatures. They can petition the Senate to act. They can even set the machinery for amendment of the Constitution in motion and bypass the standpat Senate.

The founding fathers did not give Congress sole power to start the process of bringing the Constitution into line with the current demands of the Nation. On application by the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States Congress is required to call a convention for proposing amendments. That right has not been used in the past, but there is no reason why it should not be used now if the obstinate Senate resists the popular demand for modernization of our peace system.

It is no answer to these demands to say that the present system had served us fairly well until Senator Lodge went on the rampage following the First World War. The Department of State once made an estimate that of 969 treaties submitted between 1789 and 1934, 682 were accepted by the Senate, 173 were amended, and 15 rejected. That would seem to be a fair record, except for the Wilson-Lodge fiasco for which the two men appear to be about equally responsible.

The significant point is, however, that the treaty-making function has now become infinitely more important than it was throughout the century and a quarter before World War No. 1. Today our relations with the rest of the world are so close that treaty making is of a piece with legislation. There is no reato consider it as a function apart. As a matter of fact, it is impossible to draw a line between the intermeshed affairs of the United States and the United Nations and say that what is on one side is domestic and what is on the other side is international.

The inescapable fact is that domestic and international interests meet in many comprehensive national policies, and those policies ought to be the product of a meeting of minds on the part of the President, the Senate, and the House. It is not only undemocratic but also dangerously unrealistic to set aside a segment of the policy-making function and say that within this area a minority may cast the deciding vote. The House, the States, and the people have a good cause, and the Senate will not be able to stand against them if they marshal their resources wisely.

PUBLIC FAVORS TREATY ACTION BY MAJORITY CONGRESS VOTE

(By George Gallup, Director, American Institute of Public Opinion)

PRINCETON, N. J., May 16.—When the North Carolina Democratic State convention recently adopted a plank in its platform calling for a constitutional amendment to allow for ratification of treaties by a majority vote of both branches of Congress, it was reflecting a belief of an increasing majority of Americans.

The number of voters who think the best method of ratifying United States treaties is by approval of a majority in both the House and Senate—instead of by the present two-thirds majority of the Senate alone—is today 60 percent, as compared to 54 percent in a similar poll published last October.

The issue was put to a cross-section of voters throughout the Nation as follows:

"When the war is over, it will be necessary for the Allies to decide on peace terms for the Axis. Which one of these three ways would you, personally, favor as the best way to have peace treaties approved after the war?"

The three alternatives from which those interviewed chose follow, with a tabulation of their replies:

	October	Today
	Percent	Percent
Approval only by the President	7	7
Approval by President and a majority of whole Congress	54	60
Approval by President and two-thirds of Senate	25	19
Don't know	14	14

In view of the fact that this issue is one which involves a question not widely discussed or debated by the man on the street, it is of interest to compare the vote of informed persons—those who can prove their knowledge of present ratification requirements—with the views of all voters, both informed and uninformed.

When this comparison is made, the views of the informed group coincide with the views of all people, with majorities in both groups viewing approval of treaties by a simple majority in both branches of Congress as the best method.

The chief difference between informed opinion and the opinion of all voters is that fewer among the informed group are without opinions and more favor retention of the Senate two-thirds ratification rule than is the case with all voters.

Here is a table showing the vote of the informed group:

Informed voters:	Percent
Approval only by President	4
Approval by President and a majority of whole Congress	61
Approval by President and two-thirds of Senate	33
No opinion	2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the S. K. F.—Svenska Kullagerfabriken—means the Swedish Ball Bearing Corporation. It is primarily a Swedish concern that manufactures ball bearings. It also has interests in an American plant manufacturing ball bearings at Philadelphia.

The other day I made some statements to the effect that economic sanctions should be brought to bear against the American plant so that it would, in turn, induce its Swedish counterpart to stop shipping ball bearings to Hitler.

The head of the American plant is William L. Batt, who is also vice chairman of the War Production Board, a gentleman who has made personal sacrifices in this war. Any criticism I made is not aimed at him.

Mr. Batt is voting trustee of 95 percent of the stock of the American company. A good deal of this stock is owned by the Swedish company. Heretofore royalties and dividends have been paid out of the funds of the American company to the Swedish company. Anything that bolsters up the Swedish plant to that extent strengthens it in its aid to Hitler.

The American company is operated by American operators, management, and employees. However, the Swedish company should be compelled to limit shipments of its aircraft bearings to Germany. If this Swedish concern continues to ship these ball bearings, then it doesn't make sense to me to have our airmen, at great peril to limb and life, bomb and blast German ball-bearing companies like those at Schweinfurt. What the Nazis lose because of such bombings is compensated for by the ball bearings from the Swedish company.

I want the American company to bring every possible pressure to bear on the Swedish company to stop the nefarious practices of feeding the Nazi war machine. This may hurt and wound the sensibilities of Sweden, but the life of our boys come first.

I understand that the Treasury Department through its Foreign Funds Control Division, have now precluded the sending of royalties and dividends by the American company to the Swedish company and its principals.

The Swedish company has unfulfilled orders for ball bearings purchased by Latin American entities. These orders have been transferred for fulfillment to the American company. The Foreign Economic Administrator must grant export permits to permit export of American products to Latin American companies. One of the economic sanctions to be leveled against the Swedish firm is to have the Foreign Economic Administrator refuse these permits, so that the American concern couldn't carry out the commitments of the Swedish outfit.

We must use every weapon at our command in this global war. It is a struggle for our own existence. We should not stand idly by and see nullified our air raids over Schweinfurt and other ball-bearing works controlled by the Nazis. We must get tough if the Swedish concern continues to give aid and comfort to the Nazis.

We must get tough with the American S. K. F. so that it in turn will coerce and compel the Swedish concern to do the right thing.

If all else fails, the alien property custodian should seize the Philadelphia plant. It would operate without friction and without difficulty. The Philadelphia plant has rendered yoeman service in our own war effort. It has been praised by the Army and Navy officials and all the armed forces. It is not without qualms that I would advise seizure as the last resort. But this war is not ping-pong.

We have representatives in Sweden now buying up Swedish ball bearings that would otherwise go to Germany. The English tried this. They bought S. K. F. ball bearings in vast quantities which the Swedish company gladly provided. But what did it do? It used the money in part to build and expand its own plant and thus expanded the facilities to help the Nazis in greater degree. If we buy these Swedish ball bearings from S. K. F. we should see that the proceeds of such purchases are not used, directly or indirectly, to expand the plant or equipment of the S. K. F. and thereby augment the opportunity of the S. K. F. to supply more ball bearings to the Nazis. This latter remedy may be difficult. It may be impossible to earmark these proceeds. In any event efforts must be made to put pressure upon Sweden to prevent this plant's expansion.

It is interesting to note that Russia is cooperating with Great Britain and the United States in diplomatic efforts to have Sweden cut off ball-bearing shipments to Germany. The Soviet Government is contemplating likewise the enforcement of economic sanctions. Russia means business in this matter, and will not tolerate any "shenanigans" by the Swedish company.

However, we must be ready to do the following:

First. Stop all monetary movements between the American branch of the parent company by the Treasury's Foreign Funds Control Section.

Second. There must be a seizure of the plant in Philadelphia if it is proved there is a preponderance of German ownership.

Third. We must blacklist the Swedish S. K. F. in every way.

Fourth. We must crack down with a whole series of economic sanctions not only by the United States but by Great Britain and Russia.

Fifth. In our preclusive buying of Swedish ball bearings, we must be sure that the proceeds are not used directly or indirectly to bolster up the Swedish plant so as to insure increased production.

Sixth. If all else fails, the Alien Property Custodian must seize the Philadelphia plant.

This should be the last measure.

We must see to it, however, that there should be no interruption in the ball-bearing production at the Philadelphia plant for use in our armed forces.

Remember, in this war for democratic existence, there can be no neutrals. There can be no neutrality between right and wrong. Sweden in this war is reaping rich benefits. She did the same with reference to the last war. She plays both ends toward the middle. We cannot permit Sweden to remain neutral and benefit Nazi Germany as she is doing.

I repeat my admiration for William L. Batt. What I say here is in no wise in derogation of his integrity of purpose, patriotism, and of the fine work he is doing for the War Production Board.

Sewell Avery Versus the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I inserted in the RECORD the second of a series of articles, which are appearing in the Chicago Sun under the title of "Sewell Avery versus the People." Today, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting the second of the series of articles, which appeared in the May 16, 1944, issue, entitled "Wards Before W. L. B. in More Labor Fights Than Any Other Firm."

The article follows:

WARD'S BEFORE W. L. B. IN MORE LABOR FIGHTS THAN ANY OTHER FIRM

(Second of a series)

WASHINGTON, May 15.—Sewell Lee Avery, chairman of the board of Montgomery Ward & Co., is the one outstanding American industrialist who has rejected the "no strike—no lockout" agreement by which labor and management in the United States have sought to cooperate to win the war of production.

Not content with flouting his agreement, Avery and his legal talent have perfected a new antilabor formula, the effect of which has been to lead the National War Labor Board down an endless maze of legal technicalities.

This Avery formula makes a 1,500-word legal brief an antilabor weapon that has supplanted in large part the spy system the company was forced to discontinue under a National Labor Relations Board order of October 29, 1938. The order was subsequently upheld on January 30, 1940, by a Federal circuit court decision.

While the company loudly proclaims that it has not fought and is not fighting unionism, Avery and Ward's have been before the National War Labor Board 235 times since the Board was created shortly after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor.

At a hearing in one of these cases on November 4, 1942, John A. Barr, labor relations manager for Ward's, said of the national "no strike—no lockout" agreement:

"It's in the record, but for your convenience I repeat * * * that Ward's does not recognize any authority which is based upon that so-called understanding, as it was not a party to the understanding and has not directly or indirectly accepted or ratified it."

In sharp contrast to Ward's position is the W. L. B. record of handling 6,500 cases of management-labor controversy. In these cases, more than 5,000 American companies and corporations have accepted its rulings in the interest of getting ahead with the war.

While many of the 235 Ward cases before the W. L. B. have been instances in which the company went before the Board without compulsion to ask approval of voluntary salary adjustments, the company nevertheless has been involved before the Board in more actual labor disputes—22 in all—than any other corporation in the United States.

This record was achieved despite the fact that a number of companies have pay rolls dwarfing Avery's which covers 70,000 employees in 48 States.

Avery's attorneys have fought unions with every legal device. Their attack has been centered since the start of the war against the maintenance-of-membership clause, which hundreds of other companies have accepted without protest to insure harmonious relations with their union employees for the war period. Ward's contends that the maintenance-of-membership clause constitutes a closed shop.

Few industrialists line up with Avery in his last-ditch fight against that clause. Robert Black, president of the White Motor Co., and an industry member of the W. L. B., took Avery's attorneys to task at the hearing on November 4, 1942. Black challenged Barr's contention that the maintenance-of-membership provision recommended by W. L. B. amounted to a closed shop.

Slack pointed out that a worker under maintenance of membership could design from a union at any time within 15 days after a contract had been signed, that there was no coercion on employees to belong to the union, and that the only requirement was that the worker make his own decision as to whether he wished to belong to the union for duration of the contract.

Despite this, Avery has waged an embittered struggle against the union security clause in the eight Ward cases in which the W. L. B. has issued directives. In five of these his lawyers are seeking to enjoin the W. L. B. in the courts of the District of Columbia from enforcing its directive.

It was this pattern of resistance at every turn that forced President Roosevelt to step in on April 26 and seize Ward's Chicago properties, after Avery's refusal to extend the union's contract for 30 days until a collective bargaining election could be held.

When that seizure occurred the company also was refusing to accept or comply with W. L. B. orders involving labor disputes in Ward plants and facilities in Oakland, Calif., Portland, Oreg., Denver, Detroit, Jamaica, N. Y., and in the plant of the Hummer Manufacturing Co., at Springfield, Ill.

Ward's has fought unions not only on the union security issue but on the additional issues of seniority, arbitration, wages, dues check-off, and grievance machinery. When the issues in dispute have come before the W. L. B. for public hearing Ward's has used every legal device of delay and obstruction. They have even played one labor agency of the Government against another after having previously fought both.

At a hearing in the Chicago case on December 16, 1943, Barr actually opposed the directive of the W. L. B. on the ground that the directive would impinge on the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board—an agency whose decisions Ward's, on four different occasions, had fought as high as Federal circuit courts of appeal.

In the same hearing, Barr complained bitterly that Ward's was being deprived of "its day in court."

"Ward's further objects to the Board's summary method of procedure because it operates to deprive Ward's of due process of law," he said.

Barr also fought the W. L. B. directive (to extend union contract for 30 days) on grounds that the Board "is without jurisdiction," that the company objected "to the Board's method of procedure," and on the assertion that the order "would compel arbitration of disputes in violation of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States." With the customary efficiency of well-paid corporation lawyers, Ward counsel have blandly contested the jurisdiction given the W. L. B. to settle labor-management disputes by two acts of Congress—the Stabilization Act of 1942 and the Connally-Smith Act of 1943.

The effectiveness of these tactics is demonstrated by the fact that Local 20 of the United Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Employees of America (C. I. O.), which last week won the bargaining election at Ward's Chicago plant and established that it represents a majority of employees there, still faces Avery's resistance in its efforts to negotiate a new contract.

While Avery has fought this union tooth and nail for 2 years, the union has maintained contracts with such firms as Macy's, Gimbel's, Bloomingdale's, Stearns & Hearn's in New York, and the Fair, Boston Store and Marshall Field & Co., in Chicago. Some of these contracts include maintenance-of-membership clauses and others include a flat closed-shop provision.

While the rest of America has rolled up its sleeves and plowed ahead with the war effort, Sewell Avery and Montgomery Ward have concentrated their efforts on one battle—the legal battle to defend its self-asserted right to conduct labor relations as they were conducted at the turn of the century.

In his fight against union security in the Chicago plants Avery contended that he was immune from Presidential enforcement of W. L. B. orders because those plants were engaged in nonwar business. While taking national display advertisements in metropolitan newspapers to maintain this position, Ward's has not hesitated to use the war as a reason to its customers for inability to fill orders.

In a letter dated December 3, 1943, signed by W. A. Jones, central repair department of Ward's Baltimore plant, a customer in Ohio was informed as follows:

"We are sorry that there will be a little more delay than we expected in completing the repair of your merchandise. It is necessary to send to our factory for parts. Our factories are engaged in defense work and such, of course, comes ahead of all civilian needs. However, we are keeping in close touch with the factories and assure you we will complete your repairs as soon as we get these parts."

This was a mimeographed letter and duplicates were sent to Ward's customers, many of whom may have been greatly surprised when they read Avery's national advertisements proclaiming that Ward's was not engaged in war work.

One River—One Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of May 15 carries a very interesting editorial addressed to the editors of the Missouri Valley entitled "One River—One Problem." In view of the situation confronting the Congress in the consideration of legislation affecting the Missouri River, I am including as part of my remarks under the permission granted me this editorial. It follows:

ONE RIVER—ONE PROBLEM

To the Editors of the Missouri Valley:

The time has come to recognize that the Missouri River is one big river presenting one big problem.

It is not one thing in Montana and Wyoming, another thing in the Dakotas and Iowa, a third thing in Nebraska, Kansas, and Colorado, and a fourth in Missouri. It is not primarily an instrument to be used for irrigation, or for navigation, or for power, nor is it primarily an evil force to be controlled against its repeated and disastrous flooding. It is a synthesis of all of these. Where is the plan that will solve the one big problem of the one big river?

The Missouri Valley must find that plan. The place to begin is with the newspaper editors up and down the 2,470 miles of the valley itself. In this editorial, we address them.

WHAT EDITORS ARE FOR

We address the editor of the Miles City Star of Montana, the editor of the Bismarck Tribune of North Dakota, the editor of the Pierre Capital Journal of South Dakota, the editors of the Sioux City Journal, the Omaha World-Herald, the Emporia Gazette, the St. Joseph News-Press. We address the editors of the Kansas City Star, the Jefferson City Post-Tribune, and all the other editors up and down the valley.

We address them because finding the plan is a job for all of us, working together; because time is precious if we are to master the river instead of permitting it longer to enslave us. The floods of this spring are the final and convincing proof that we have got to accept the river's challenge now.

We address them because the plan that will rule the river is one that must be chosen and formulated through public education, understanding and popular acceptance. Through such a plan, all dwellers in the long valley can be made neighbors, pulling together in their common task. This is the creative function of journalism. This is what editors are for.

THIS SPRING'S FLOOD

What happened this spring? While lands thirsted in Montana, water that might have made them fertile spilled ruin over the lower valley. They had too little water, we had too much. Water that might have fed the soil, water that might have turned turbines, water that might have been saved to steady the channel for navigation—all this was wasted. In the wasting, a million acres of life-giving land were despoiled. Fine topsoil from Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri was stolen from the farms as the river uselessly pushed its golden burden toward the Gulf of Mexico.

In its wake were homelessness and paralysis and ruin. Whole villages were swallowed by dark water. Transportation stopped. Food production stopped. Unfattened livestock was evacuated to the cities to glut packing houses. The Federal Government had to start the machinery for relief loans to countless farmers whose livelihood, through no fault of their own, had been sacrificed to our neglect of the river.

What would the unirrigated lands of Montana have given for the water—the same water—that has starved and destroyed so much of the lower valley? What would the river's navigators have given for a system which at once would prevent the hazards of flood navigation and at the same time keep their channels deep and free in all seasons?

TAMING OF THE TENNESSEE

This can be done. It has been done. There is nothing theoretical or dreamily visionary about a plan that could accomplish all these things and give the valley new wealth and power as well. It has been done in the Tennessee Valley. This year, despite a merciless rainfall that for February was the heaviest in 54 years, the Valley of the Tennessee presents a serene, an untroubled picture. The water is within its banks. Great barges ply their placid course. Power is generated in a steady flow that the vital works of war—aluminum, explosives, and the like—may be produced without interruption. The people of the valley are made prosperous by the river and are free from fear of it.

How has this been done? It has been done by building a great and integrated system of dams and reservoirs which hold back the water in time of heavy rainfall and which release it when and where it is needed. It has been done by improved agricultural and forestry methods to hold water in the land. It has been done because this system—its planning, its building, and its operation—is controlled by one regional, unhampered authority. It understands the valley. It does not have to run to Washington, or beg permission of half a dozen bureaus, to make vital decisions at the precise time they must be made.

BIG REGION, BIG PLAN

Under the Tennessee Valley Authority there has been no division of responsibility. There has been no conflict between the Reclamation Bureau and the Engineer Corps, between the people who are interested in power and those interested in flood control or navigation. This is because the Tennessee Valley, unlike the unfortunate Missouri, is one big region and one big river controlled by one big plan. Too many cooks do not stir the Tennessee River broth.

What the contrast and our own experience teach us is this: Never, short of a regional, autonomous, unified authority, can our valley be developed to the full measure of its resources. There must be an end to endless and futile struggle between one interest and another. We need unity, replacing civil war. There is before us in the Tennessee Valley an object lesson that sectionalism can give way to unity to the greater benefit of all.

These are the essentials of the T. V. A. idea:

1. A Federal autonomous agency, with full authority to make decisions within the region.

2. Responsibility to deal with resources as a unified whole, clearly fixed in the regional agency, not divided among several centralized Federal agencies.

3. A policy, fixed by law, that the Federal regional agency work cooperatively with and through local and State agencies.

PICK PLAN'S SHORTCOMINGS

Governor Sharpe, of South Dakota might say, as he did recently in the Christian Science Monitor: Why talk of a new plan when we already have a plan? He offers the Pick plan as the sovereign cure for all the ills of the river. It has merit. The trouble is that, first of all, it is less a plan than a statement of good intentions. It is a rough sketch of flood control and navigation proposals, with blank spaces left open for irrigation and power. In itself, it is a very good start on a unified program of development.

But the irrigation interests seriously object to the Pick plan—notably the provision in the river and harbor bill which would set aside for navigation virtually the entire average annual flow of the Missouri River on the basis of figures for the past 10 years.

In short, the irrigation interests don't trust the Pick plan or the Army engineers because they consider this provision in the river and harbor bill an attempt to steal their water. At this point Mr. Ickes, interested in reclamation only, comes forward with his plan for stealing water from navigation interests for the uses of irrigation. President Roosevelt's criticism of the river and harbor bill last Friday, on the ground that it failed to make proper provision for irrigation, shows once again the fallacy of failing to consider a river and all its problems as a whole. And thus the conflict proceeds. There are, therefore, two major objections to the Pick plan:

The first, that it is impossible politically. The irrigation States won't support it. Obviously, any legislation that covers the whole region will have to have the whole region's support.

The second, it is defective in an administrative sense. It would have to be administered by the Army Engineer Corps, and the corps is restricted by act of Congress to navigation and flood control and barred from the field of irrigation.

The Pick plan, as comprehensively as it tries to approach our valley problems, actually demonstrates just what is wrong. It, or any proposal offered by the Department of Agriculture, the Department of the Interior, or partisans of flood control, the navigation interests or any other single, restricted agency, cannot fail to throw the whole problem out of balance. All these problems, all the questions they raise, travel the same old road to the same old terminal: Where is the one big plan?

THE MISSOURI'S SPECIAL PROBLEMS

It is not our contention that the T. V. A. plan can be transplanted in its entirety to the Missouri Valley. Our river has its special problems, such as irrigation, which do not even exist on the Tennessee. The nature of the Missouri River itself is different. The many able and devoted men who have given years to the study of the Missouri know it to be a rogue elephant of a river, testing man's ingenuity and imagination to the fullest.

Yet the basic idea of T. V. A. can be brought to our valley. It is an idea that has passed its laboratory test with brilliance and is ready for use wherever men seek to make a river serve them. As David Lilienthal, Chairman of the T. V. A. Board, has written in T. V. A.—Democracy on the March:

"It was not conceded that at the hour of Creation the Lord had divided and classified natural resources to conform to the organization chart of the Federal Government. What God had made as one, man was to develop as one."

This newspaper confesses an error of the past—a preoccupation with the interests of its own section, to the exclusion of those of Montana, Kansas, Nebraska, and the Dakotas. All along the valley, from the mountains at 13,000 feet to the low plains of the river's mouth, men have given a similar loyalty to the interests of their sections.

NEED FOR UNITY

Yet is this not our common problem? Will not all our interests be better served—be multiplied—by working together toward a common solution? In the past we have splintered our lances against each other's shields; blunted our swords to no purpose; divided ourselves into partisan camps in which the work of one was to nullify the work of the other.

There must be men up and down our valley who have a vision that transcends the futile rivalries of the past. The editors from Montana to St. Louis have it within their power to preach the gospel that the Missouri is one big river with one big problem, to work with the leaders of their communities, and through them, with the people themselves—the people whose destinies are shaped by the river as the Nile these thousands of years has shaped the destinies of those who share its valley.

We urge the editors of the Missouri Valley to lift up their eyes, to make stout their purpose. With unity we can conquer the one big problem that the one big river challenges us to solve.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH.

Dr. W. B. Bizzell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, I regret to advise the House of the death in Oklahoma Saturday of Dr. William B. Bizzell, president emeritus of the University of Oklahoma, and former president of the Texas A. and M. College.

Dr. Bizzell was a great citizen of both States and his life was given to the training of young men and women of the Southwest to leadership and responsibility in business, professional, and cultural pursuits. From 1910, when he first became president of the College of Industrial Arts at Denton, Tex., until his voluntary retirement from the active presidency of the University of Oklahoma, he had devoted his life to his high calling.

Today around the world thousands of young men who fight and direct the course of the war owe their inspiration in education to Dr. Bizzell's friendly and considerate interest in them and their problems. He was an educator of the highest standing with an active interest in all cultural pursuits. He was widely known as a collector of rare books, and particularly for his collection of Bibles, one of the finest in the Nation.

Dr. Bizzell's administration at the College of Industrial Arts was followed by outstanding service as president of the Texas Agricultural and Mechanical College of the State of Texas, which post he held from 1914 to 1925. In July 1925 he became president of the University of Oklahoma and guided its course until 1941, when he became president emeritus. The greatest growth and progress of the university occurred under his leadership.

One of his outstanding contributions was his establishment of courses for outstanding students in leadership. Always a friend of the student, his was a great contribution to the advancement of the Southwest that will be felt wherever the graduates of the distinguished colleges of Texas and Oklahoma serve.

Post-War Unemployment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to House Resolution 1649, introduced by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CANNON]. This resolution contains what many of us believe to be the best plan to provide against post-war unemployment and economic collapse, that has been presented to the Congress.

We seem to agree generally that, come the end of the great war, and may God grant it may come speedily, there will also come the end to millions of jobs. Those engaged in the war industries number in millions. Other industries employ additional millions whose jobs indirectly depend upon the war market for their continuance. Then there will be millions in the armed forces, and millions that complement them, returning to civil life from the military. Where shall they find employment or other means of earning a living? This question has been raised again and again on the floor of this House. It has been used by most of us in our addresses to our constituents. It is heralded over the radio and through the press. It is discussed in the various districts in all public meetings and around the firesides of our people. Next to winning the war, and if even second so that is this very question. How much have we accomplished if we conquer our military enemies only to sink into the abyss of poverty and bankruptcy at home. Is it not possible to win the war and lose the peace?

As stated above these are not new questions. They have been raised in this House time and time again. But what has been done about them? What is proposed? Is there a Member of this body that will state that our present social security legislation is adequate to meet the situation with which we are faced? If there is one I have failed to find him.

House Resolution No. 1649 proposes the uniform retirement of all citizens over 60 years of age. Retirement under the resolution is not compulsory, but the benefits of the proposal are contingent on unemployment. In addition to those over 60 there is also included the permanently unemployable persons between 18 and 60. This group includes the blind, the deaf, the crippled, and the permanently ill. In addition, the mothers who have the sole support of children under 18 are also made eligible for the benefits of this resolution.

If we are to have unemployment, who is it that should be unemployed? If there are too many to work, who is it that should rest? We say it is those who are unable to work and those who have served the longest. Let us provide decent pensions to enough of them to solve this problem and do away with the nightmare called unemployment. If the groups referred to above can have a good cash income in the form of a Federal pension, they will be good customers in our markets, desirable citizens in our communities, and a continued asset to society. Their spending will afford the market that will sustain good employment conditions and substantial business for those not retired and thus all can have opportunity. The citizen who is alarmed today for our free enterprise way of life may well look into the provisions of this resolution.

The tax provision to raise the money by which the annuities or pensions are to be paid is most interesting. A small rate of tax spread thin over a very wide base is proposed. Merely a 3 percent gross income tax on all incomes personal and corporate. In the case of personal incomes the first $100 per month is exempt from the tax. The resolution would also repeal titles 1 and 2 of our present social security law. It would also make unnecessary a lot of the existing emergency taxes. In this way the new tax would in large measure be a replacement tax and not an additional tax.

Again I should emphasize that this tax will benefit the average citizen far more than it will cost him. It will also pay handsome dividends to business and industry. I cannot visualize even a single citizen that will not be benefited far more than he will be hurt by this resolution.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we can tax and appropriate money when we feel it is necessary to do so. The speed and the magnitude of our efforts for the war have shown it can be done. Now if we do agree that this problem to which I now address myself is also of tremendous importance, shall we not at least give it careful and thorough consideration?

It was the neglect of this very problem that caused the nations of Europe to lose their freedom. It was this very thing that has brought about this horrible war with all its carnage, its blood, its toil, and its tears. If we can appropriate and tax for war, and we must and we should, we can also appropriate and tax for peace and the good of the people. While we drive the Hun from our door, let us also give attention to that other wolf called hunger.

The Indispensable Man

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, we are going to hear a great deal in the days just ahead about the indispensable man. We are going to be told that he is the only one that can guide the ship of state safely through the war and establish the peace. We are going to be told that no American is as well equipped as he to guide our generals and admirals to victory. Well, this same indispensable man was Commander in Chief of our Pacific Fleet at Pearl Harbor. He was the one who selected his personal friend Kimmel, jumped him over many other better qualified naval officers, and gave him the command of the Pacific Fleet. He was the one who gave Kimmel and General Short orders to put their forces on the alert for acts of sabotage and uprisings within the islands, with no threat from without, yet Ambassador Grew had warned the President that the Japs might strike without warning and that Pearl Harbor was the logical striking place. The President had also been told by Secretary Hull that diplomatic discussions with the Japanese representatives had reached a deadlock, and diplomatic deadlocks result in war. The blame for Pearl Harbor goes higher than Kimmel and Short. It rests directly upon the Commander in Chief, the indispensable man. No wonder the court-martial proceedings have been delayed. Court-martial proceedings would bring out the facts and place the blame where it belongs.

Veterans' Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news letter written by me and published in the Monroe County Democrat, Sparta, Wis., April 27, 1944:

WASHINGTON NEWS LETTER

(By Congressman WILLIAM H. STEVENSON)

Recently passed by the Senate and now being considered by the House, is the so-called veterans' bill of rights. It is the most sweeping and generous piece of veterans' legislation in our history. It is an omnibus measure providing for hospitalization, academic education, vocational training, loans, special employment service, and unemployment benefits, with all members of our armed forces eligible under it when honorably discharged after at least 6 months of service.

One of the outstanding features of the bill is the educational provision. This is aimed primarily at insuring against a serious national loss of skills and potential leadership, the development of which has been interrupted by the process of taking young men out of school or apprenticeship to put them into the hard business of war. Subject to qualifying tests, all veterans will be entitled to special vocational training to equip them for jobs in private industry, or to a resumption of their formal academic studies. Under this arrangement, full-time students will receive $500 a year of tuition plus a subsistence allotment of $50 a month and an additional $25 monthly for dependents—in some cases, for a 4-year course in college or university.

Two other important features of the bill provide for loans and unemployment benefits. The loans, which will be interest-free for the first year and run up to $2,000, will be made to finance the repair, purchase, or construction of homes, farms, and business properties. Unemployment benefits amounting to $20 a week for a maximum of 52 weeks, and beginning 1 month after the receipt of mustering-out pay, will go to all veterans out of work through no fault of their own.

Several of its provisions are essential to an intelligent handling of the problems that will crowd in upon us when peace comes. This proposed legislation is far-sightedly designed to promote the war-retarded development of a precious national resource—the potential skills and talents of the millions of young men now in uniform.

Several weeks ago I addressed the House of Representatives advocating legislation that would take care of our returning heroes by reestablishing them in society through educational and vocational training, setting them up in business and on the farm, and for their rehabilitation when they have returned to civil life.

In this address I said: "For those who have been injured or disabled, there should be adequate hospitalization until they are ready to accept employment and to take the places in society they held before entering the service of their country. Our veterans should receive free treatment in Government hospitals until they have fully recovered.

"Those who left a university education to enter the service should have the right to continue their education after their discharge at the expense of the Government for at least as long a period as they have served their country, or as long as their interests and the interests of the public are benefited thereby.

"Those who do not care for further college education, and who need or request a vocational training should be given vocational training in the various vocational schools throughout the country at Government expense. Such vocational training should be designed for returning members of the services who have had no previous training or who desire to brush up on the training or skill they have in order to go back to their prewar occupations on an equal footing with others.

"Returning veterans who lived on farms before they entered the service, and who wish to reestablish themselves on farms should be given Government assistance to purchase tracts of good land upon easy and reasonable terms so that they may become good and successful farmers and farm owners."

The Relation of Soil to Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the writer of the following letter is a member of one of the pioneer families of his county. By thrift, hard work, and application of sound farm practices, including his achievement of being a specialist in the raising of melons, he has made a success of his enterprises. He has seen families come and go on the farms of his section, and his letter is an example of what is taking place in many sections of our country. The letter follows:

VOICE OF THE PEOPLE

DECEMBER 13, 1943.

DEAR MR. BURNHAM: Picture 10 farms all joining each other in Springwater and Dayton 50 years ago and nearly all having large families, a total of 60 people. Today every place is vacant, not a living soul on them. For one place east of Twin Lake 50 years ago William Hannawalt was offered $14,000. Today I don't think the place would sell for $4,000. What is the cause?

Many reasons—long way to market; very poor mail service; many places being obliged to go 1 mile for the mail.

Nearly every one of the older people are gone, and the younger ones have gone to the city where they work half as many hours and receive much better pay, and their mail is brought daily to their door.

On the farm it was doing chores, haying, or working in the gardens as long as there was any daylight, while in the cities the theaters, poolhalls, tenpins, and taverns are running full blast every day and night.

I read a few years ago about some white-collar person telling about soil erosion. Well, what is far worse is mankind erosion.

Those farms 50 years ago produced many hundred bushels of potatoes, grain, large droves of cattle, sheep, hogs, and horses.

The buildings were in good condition. Now some buildings have burned, some torn down, and others decaying and falling down.

I think our Congressman should have this printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as this is far worse than a dust storm or a ditch washed down a gully.

Yours truly,

GEORGE BUTTON.

Safeguards Needed in River and Harbor Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, the western States are thoroughly aroused over the implications in the river and harbor bill recently approved by the House, whereby State control of waters will be superseded by Federal control.

Use of water for navigation may be desirable, but the basic economy of these States is dependent upon the judicious use of water resources for domestic, irrigation, mining, and industrial purposes. It is imperative that an amendment be adopted in H. R. 3961 to safeguard the interests of reclamation under State supervision. Reflecting the widespread interest of western residents in this vital problem is the following editorial published in the Blackfoot Bulletin at Blackfoot, Idaho, on May 10, 1944:

IRRIGATION IN DANGER

The utter incapacity of Congressmen from nonirrigation States of the East and South to comprehend the problems of the reclamation areas of the West was again demonstrated today, as well as the seriously renewed threat to control of the States over the streams within their own borders upon which depend their agricultural life, their present industries, and their future development.

Senator OVERTON, of Louisiana, chairman of the Senate subcommittee holding hearings on the House-approved rivers and harbors bill, declared himself emphatically and autocratically against an amendment suggested by Governor Bottolfsen, of Idaho, which would protect the rights of water users on the upper Snake River.

Governor Bottolfsen, testifying before the committee last week, suggested an amendment to the proposed bill providing a barge canal between the mouth of the Snake River and Lewiston, which would provide that in the operation of the project no demand could be made upon upstream users of water to provide stream flow at Lewiston to maintain navigation at that point.

Senator OVERTON, displaying his abysmal ignorance of the problems of western irrigation, and in complete disregard of the vagaries of nature which sometimes make rivers flow heavily and sometimes lightly, said "We are not going to hamper projects by amending them to give multiple control of States or bureaus outside the War Department, which controls navigable water as an agent of Congress."

It should be obvious to the Senator that without such protective amendments the proposed bill will place in the hands of Washington officials the power to condemn upper valley agriculture to death by demanding the water needed for irrigation.

Westerners are entirely unwilling to entrust the conduct of their irrigation water problems to Army engineers, particularly if the Army's attitude is accurately represented by the statement of Maj. Gen. Thomas Robins, Assistant Chief of Army Engineers, who said today he would like to see the entire barge canal project authorized but added, "I suppose they (meaning we westerners) would still want this crazy amendment." He was referring to an amendment offered by Senator O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, similar to that suggested by Governor Bottolfsen.

Westerners resent the accusation that they are crazy when they seek to protect the life-giving sources of their water from the constant and insidious encroachment of the Federal Government. We think the Army engineers are crazy if they think westerners will jeopardize the results of over 50 years of hard-won reclamation and development without a fight.

General Robins' statement was ill advised, to say the least, and will yet live to plague him. It was, however, fair warning to all Western States that they must unite their forces once more to combat the influences which have been fighting reclamation these many years. The battle has had to be won over and over again. Now it has reached one of its most crucial stages.

The Latest Challenge to Liberty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEONARD W. HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me, I desire to include in the RECORD the substance of a radio address made by me on Monday evening, May 15, over Station WHN, New York City, as follows:

It should not be news to any thoughtful person that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Every generation of our country has faced assaults on the rights guaranteed by our Constitution, and, I am proud to say, every assault has been repulsed. Neither the attacks of enemies from without nor the subtle conspiracies of enemies within have been able to take away from us our rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, our free press, our trials by jury, our individual rights.

Today, once more, Americans are faced with challenges on two fronts. The first challenge is that of the enemy, who dares us to attack him. This we are doing and will continue to do until he is defeated beyond the shadow of a doubt. The second challenge comes from within. I believe that most thoughtful people recognize this challenge but there are many others who, busy with pressing personal and business affairs, have not pondered well the meaning of internal acts which threaten our security and our liberties.

This internal assault has been a subtle, behind-the-scenes, undercover campaign. It no doubt is being led by those men with minds more clever than honest—who have been able to work their way into the inner circle around the President of the United States, the very men who were described by Senator ALBEN BARKLEY in his recent isolated burst of candor on the Senate floor.

This internal assault is not a new one. It has been going on since the advent of the New Deal. It has as its purpose, of course, to socialize this Nation. These actions, apparently unrelated, really are part of the plan—the plan to make over America and to kill our liberties. If such an unholy plan were to come to pass, we would be ruled from Washington by the "Great Brain" and a lot of "little brains" who have proved that they would welcome such an assignment.

The latest evidence of the workings of this conspiracy to make over America is the seizure of the mail-order house of Montgomery Ward & Co. in Chicago on April 27, 1944, by soldiers of the United States Army, who were drafted or enlisted to fight against Germany and Italy and Japan, but who found themselves ordered by "Generalissimo" Biddle to fight against one of their fellow citizens, a man who has never been convicted of crime and even then was not accused of breaking a law of the land.

In an effort to make the seizure of Montgomery Ward less odious, the new dealers hastened to point out that Sewell Avery is a rich man, as if the very fact that he has been successful is something of which to be ashamed. The new dealers, by saying that Mr. Avery is rich, seem to imply that he has no right of civil liberties. My reply is that I do not care whether he is rich or poor; whether he is Catholic, a Protestant, or a Jew; whether he were black, white, or yellow. I declare that Sewell Avery is an American citizen, and that is enough for me in discussing this issue.

Before I go into a fuller discussion of the Montgomery Ward seizure, let me read to you one of the amendments to our Constitution. This amendment is headed "Searches and Seizures," and is a part of what is called the Bill of Rights, amendments adopted by a wary people who although they trusted the President then in office, knew well that in some distant future some man might be elected to the highest office in the land and use his official position to pervert his functions and to steal liberties from the people.

I quote, "The rights of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or things to be seized."

Notice that this amendment to our Constitution, solemnly adopted by the people of this country in a manner prescribed by the Constitution itself, perfectly plainly states that there shall be no seizures except those carried out with warrants which have been issued by judges, after supporting oaths of affirmations have been made by proper authorities.

But what happened when, in late April 1944, Franklin D. Roosevelt wanted to exert a little bit more authority than the Constitution gave him, and wanted to bring low a citizen of the sovereign State of Illinois? Without a warrant, without even having tried to get a warrant, Wayne Chatfield Taylor, another administration handyman, tried to take over the office of Sewell Avery. Wayne Chatfield Taylor was rebuffed. Mr. Avery refused to yield his office to an interloper, just as I am sure that you would refuse to give up your home tonight to a peace officer who appeared on your front porch. You would ask to see his warrant, and if he could not show a warrant, you would likely tell him to go jump in the lake.

Then, the next morning, Generalissimo Biddle arrived on the scene. Peremptorily, he ordered his soldiers to take Mr. Avery from his office. Did Generalissimo Biddle have a warrant? Not at all. Did Wayne Chatfield Taylor have a warrant? Not at all. Yet, as calmly as you would buy an ice-cream cone, they violated Sewell Avery's right to be secure in his office against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Later in the day, apparently sensing already that he had committed a most notorious and malignant act, Generalissimo Biddle rushed to get into court. Where was the Federal court before Generalissimo Biddle resorted to such an act? Was not the same Federal court in Chicago the day before the Ward seizure as was there the day after the seizure? Could not the New Deal have gone into court before, as well as after, this unheard of, uncalled for, and highhanded search and seizure, using American boys who had been drafted to fight the enemy? The answer is "Yes," of course, but the new dealers are not interested in civil rights. They are interested in upsetting civil rights.

Let me tell you, if Franklin D. Roosevelt can exercise such illegal and pernicious powers today against a rich man named Sewell Avery, without being stopped by public opinion, he can exercise the same power against you tomorrow. We must put our faith in the Congress, for the time being, to protect us from this would-be tyranny, but in the long run we must put our country in the hands of new men who believe in our Constitution and who want to increase the liberties of the people, not decrease them.

There may be those who have been misled into thinking that this is a partisan fight—this intention of the Congress to investigate the Presidential seizure of Montgomery Ward. Let them not be deceived. The fight is between men who believe in Constitutional, Bill of Rights Government and men who do not believe in it.

On April 28, the day after Generalissimo Biddle seized Ward's, Senator HARRY FLOOD BYRD, of Virginia, introduced the Senate resolution to investigate the act, declaring:

"Today the American people are in the hands of a centralized and entrenched bureaucracy such as America has never before known. It is imperative, so as to preserve our freedoms, that we safeguard the rights of individual citizens to appeal to the courts. * * *"

I personally know that this act by the Roosevelt regime caused widespread concern from citizens of every class and station in life. In addition to the hundreds of letters which I received, even before the ink was scarcely dry on the pictures published showing the soldiers carrying Mr. Avery out of his office, other Congressmen and Government officials have received letters by the thousands, and, it is said, by the tens of thousands.

The seizure of the mail-order store of Montgomery Ward is one of the most flagrant exercises of power ever dared by a President of the United States. The public morale has been grievously undermined.

The White House would like to see the issue posed by the Montgomery Ward case forgotten. But the President cannot, by ridicule, divert the people's attention from the great constitutional issue that is involved; he cannot convince the people, as he has tried to do, that the press has presented a biased picture in reporting the matter; and he cannot make us "laugh off," as an imaginary bugaboo, the unwarranted use of the military power of the country in enforcing his capricious edict to seize the Montgomery Ward store.

Men who will resort to such things as the Chicago tyranny are of even greater threats to our liberties and our institutions.

The fight is against unbridled power, despotic power. And this fight we shall win this coming November. Every American should be girded for it. The outcome may well determine whether we shall be free citizens or servile subjects.

They're Here Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. ROBSION

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to me by the unanimous consent of the House, I am extending my remarks and including therein an editorial appearing in this week's National Tribune and the Stars and Stripes under the caption "They're here again."

This very able editorial calls attention to the so-called American Veterans' Association and the National Economy League. We are informed that the American Veterans' Association is made up of a small number of wealthy men who have seen some service and is the offspring of the so-called National Economy League. This organization of veterans does not speak for the great body of veterans and their dependents. They have almost a perfect record of opposition to legislation helpful to the veterans and their dependents. Their most important contribution was in helping to force through Congress the so-called Economy Act of March 30, 1933, under the present administration. This vicious act is well remembered by the veterans and their dependents of World War No. 1; the Spanish-American War; the Civil War, and the Indian Wars. This was the greatest act of ingratitude ever shown to the defenders of our country and their dependents. Let us indulge the hope that no Congress will ever give sanction to another such measure.

The editorial is as follows:

THEY'RE HERE AGAIN

Once more the so-called American Veterans Association is coming to life. That means there is being resurrected also that illicit sire of the A. V. A., the National Economy League.

Just as surely as the American Congress responds to the wishes of the people and enacts some long-needed relief legislation for the aging veterans of our wars and for their dependents in want, the illegitimate offspring of the old Economy League leaps up with a strangled cry of "racketeer" and "Treasury raider." His keepers, who must help foot the bills of Government generosity, push the button and this small but well-oiled group of veterans goes into action to tell the suffering taxpayers what a god-awful end they are coming to.

The veterans of this country and the widows and orphans of those who have died need no educating as to this combination. They recall well "an act to maintain the credit of the United States Government" that was passed in 1933 and which sent thousands of veterans and widows to premature graves. They remember the inception of its sponsors late 1932 down in Chattanooga, Tenn. They have real reason to know about the birth of that infamous Economy Act the following spring, and they know something too of the many high-minded and even subsidy-seeking bankers, and others of the N. E. L. advisory council who renounced the association they had made when they learned that the fine-sounding purposes they endorsed were but a cloak utilized to cover a sneak attack on the Nation's defenders.

Many will recall that these lofty-souled individuals even wheedled into their fold the commanding general of the A. E. F. and that Gen. Pershing later denounced them roundly when he learned that the founding principles of membership were being so vitiated that they jeopardized the rights of his war associates. The list of supporters read like Who's Who, and most of those who stuck it out to stab war veterans in the back were actually so enrolled. We do not forget either that those of them that were veterans allowed their names to be placed on the roster of that so-called veterans' organization, the A. V. A.

It was long years ago when these saviors of down-trodden taxpayers stole into the Congress like a thief in the night, wriggled serpent-like into the graces of a new administration, played upon the fears of a bewildered populace and sold a bill of goods that carried such a stench it succumbed from its own odor. Yes, that was years ago—a half-score of them—but our veterans can not forget. Their souls were seared by cruel hunger and desperate suffering, by broken homes, and by death through violence of the innocent victims of this act to "maintain the Nation's credit."

For a time father N. E. L. and son A. V. A. rode high, wide, and handsome. Every time the Congress considered a veteran's bill, they hollered murder. But soon they were unmasked, and the louder they yelled, the more they were investigated by aroused friends of the country's veterans. When it was determined finally that both existed more on paper than in reality, their influence disappeared to the vanishing point. About the last loud croaks that were heard from N. E. L. and A. V. A. were just before the present war engulfed us in 1941. N. E. L. shouted high defense costs and A. V. A.'s national president who boasted of a membership of "about 13,000 * * * some of whom paid dues * * * but not 'set' dues," appeared before a Senate committee and labeled two veteran proposals "sneak legislation" and "tricky bills." The same bills had passed the House previously, and had been before the Congress for years, but this witness, seeking to create a sensation and speaking for his masters with the moneybags, attempted to cause confusion by false testimony.

Since the war broke out much legislation has been enacted for the coming veterans of World War No. 2 and for their widows and orphans, but we have not heard a single peep from A. V. A. or N. E. L. about that. The legislation is costly, too, very costly, but they dare not squawk. If these great patriots stuck to their time-worn arguments they would say that they have always contended nothing was too good for the service-connected veterans or the widows of the deceased. We have heard them say that often, but we have never heard of their going before the Congress on their own initiative to do anything about it; they appear only to oppose something for former servicemen, something that bears a cost in the coin of the realm. No, the truth is that the boys have been lying low for awhile.

Recently, however, the second great national commander of the A. V. A., Robert B. Luchars, of New Jersey—the first one is said to have disappointed his sponsors and to have fallen into disrepute—let loose a blurb in the press against pensions in general and in opposition to some Spanish-American War and World War No. 1 legislation in particular. The release is from his "national headquarters" in Washington, an institution that is as fictitious as the organization itself, and indicates that the little but loud outfit he represents is about to get its second wind, along wih its sire, the N. E. L. No doubt, too, the "executive headquarters" claimed to exist in New York City will again come to life and the rent will be supplied by its who's who list of contributors.

No powers of divination are required to ticket the new activity. This war is costing a lot of money. The big-moneyed boys who claim they pay the bill, but don't are feeling the pinch. So out comes the serpent again from his hole in the wall, speaks in the name of veterans whom he does not represent, and wails about the benefits being paid to aging men and women who are the wards of Uncle Sam and the sufferers of war.

To us there is nothing so loathsome as he who will fight in war against a common enemy and then desert his comrade in need. There is nobody so lacking in honest patriotism and common decency as he who will cherish his pocketbook above the care of those who protected him when his country's defeat would have denied him not only a livelihood but also his very liberty. History can and will repeat itself. An economy wave will again come, scoffers to the contrary notwithstanding. It behooves all organized veterans to watch closely the stealthy moves of their mortal enemies. They're here again.

Full Employment for Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Millard W. Rice, national service director Disabled American Veterans, over radio station WINX, Monday, May 15, 1944:

Your two questions are really one big question, namely: What plans and arrangements have been made for full employment during the post-war period for returned disabled veterans and other discharged veterans, and citizens generally?

Such a comprehensive question cannot be adequately answered in just a few sentences. It is too all-inclusive.

Since shortly after World War No. 1, I have repeatedly stated before veteran gatherings that full employment for America's veterans could be provided for primarily by one of two divergent methods: first, by effective perferences for veterans for all private and public employment, and, second, by full employment for all employable Americans, and, therefore, including all of its veterans.

Inasmuch as veterans will constitute between 20 and 25 percent of the total number of all employables in this country, following the termination of World War No. 2, it is quite apparent that it will not be practicable to provide full employment for all employable veterans merely by attempts to provide effective preferences for veterans as to all public and private employment. To try to solve the problem by the preference method alone would tend to divide up the economy of America between veterans and nonveterans, which would lead eventually to bitterness, disillusionment and confusion.

The Federal Government now has about 3,000,000 civilian employees in addition to its eleven or twelve million employees in its armed forces. Upon their discharge from employment in the armed forces, eight to ten million discharges cannot possibly obtain governmental civilian employment. Most of them will, therefore, need to look for employment under private employers.

It is true that section 8 of the Selective Service Act in effect provides that if a discharged veteran of World War No. 2 makes application within 40 days after his discharge for restoration to his former permanent job, the Federal agency by which he was employed must reinstate him; State, county, and municipal agencies are under obligation to do so, and private employers must do so, if it is at all practicable.

Some months ago, in a personal conversation with Col. Paul H. Griffith, Chief of the Veterans' Personnel Division of the Selective Service System, and followed up by letter, I estimated that probably not more than 20 percent of the veterans of World War No. 2 would be reinstated to their former jobs under this law. Probably at least 10 percent of those who will have served in the armed forces did not have any permanent jobs when they went into active service. Probably another 25 to 30 percent of them had temporary jobs previously held by other servicemen who would be entitled to preferential reinstatement thereto. Probably 25 percent would find that their jobs had been abolished by business failures, production changes, and technological developments; and probably another 20 percent would fail to make application for reinstatement to their former positions within the required 40 days because of illness, restlessness, change of residence, a desire to have a different kind of a job, or because of not wanting to cause the discharge of some woman or older person from such job. A careful survey ought soon to be conducted to find out what the situation will be, as per our suggestion then conveyed to the Selective Service System, as well as to the United States Employment Service, and to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and others, so far without any tangible results. To make such statements does not sound particularly helpful, but I think that we ought to face the facts frankly, and then take the necessary corrective steps.

At this point, I want to emphasize that we do believe that effective civil service and employment preferences should and can provide suitable, gainful, permanent employment for every service disabled veteran.

Parenthetically, let me say that service-connected disabled veterans constituted less than 10 percent of the total onumber of veterans of World War No. 1. That percentage will probably be "upped" as to veterans of World War No. 2.

Even if there should be as many as two and a half million partially handicapped service disabled veterans following the termination of this war, they would form not more than 5 percent of all empoyables. The Federal Government ought to set the example of giving preference of opportunity to the Nation's service disabled veterans by employing considerably more than its proportionate share.

Civil-service preferences for disabled veterans have not heretofore been nearly as effective as they should have been. The present attitude of the Civil Service Commission gives high hope that much more effective preferences will hereafter be extended to America's war disabled. Through H. R. 4115, the so-called Starnes bill, which has already passed the House of Representatives by unanimous vote, and due to be considered by the Senate Committee on Civil Service next Friday, Congress is on its way to provide more effective preferences as to all Federal employment for service-connected disabled veterans, the wives of disabled veterans who are not able to qualify for civil-service positions, the widows of veterans, and, to a lesser degree, for other war veterans generally. Some few classifications of positions would, under the new proposed civil-service preference law, in effect be set aside exclusively for service-disabled veterans. Moreover, negotiations have been going on during the last several weeks relative to vocational training courses within Federal agencies for service-handicapped veterans.

If as many as 20 to 25 percent of all of the employees of all Federal agencies should finally consist of service-disabled veterans—which is a reasonable expectancy—that, however, would give jobs for only a small percentage of them. The big majority of our war-disabled would nevertheless need to find jobs in private industry.

Although several surveys have indicated that disabled persons are, generally speaking, more careful and cautious, more reliable and productive, and less likely to lose time because of illness, than is true as to able-bodied persons in most types of employment, most employers have nevertheless continued to be under the misapprehension that they would run the risk of increasing their State workmen's compensation costs by their employment of disabled veterans.

Such unwarranted fear, it would appear, cannot be removed by education alone, but by the adoption of legislation similar to that which has been in effect in Canada since 1921. To that end, the Disabled American Veterans has sponsored the introduction of H. R. 2950—introduced by the Honorable JOHN E. RANKIN, chairman of the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation—in effect to provide that the Veterans' Administration should reimburse every private employer, insurance company, and State workmen's compensation fund as to all payments made to service-connected disabled veteran employees on the basis of the operation of any State Workmen's Compensation Act.

The D. A. V. considers the enactment of such proposed legislation to be of first importance if service-disabled veterans are to be extended an equalized opportunity for suitable permanent employment following the termination of this war, when there will no longer be a manpower shortage. Even now, during time of war, however, this fear of bringing about an increase in workmen's compensation costs is definitely a deterrent to the employment of disabled dischargees in those areas where there is a surplus of manpower. The enactment of such legislation would, in our opinion, avoid the necessity for mandating by law, as was done following World War No. 1 in several European countries, that a certain percentage of the employees of all employers having over a certain number of employees, must consist of veterans having service-connected disabilities. If needed, such legislation in this country would be justifiable.

The D. A. V. believes that every employer should grant preferential seniority to every pre-war employee who has returned with a service-connected disability for any job for which he can qualify. Following the precedent already established by some, every labor union ought to specify in its contracts with management that all of its service-disabled veteran members are entitled to preferential seniority as to any job for which they have the qualifications.

Adoption and actual application of such proposed policies and preferences as to service disabled veterans would, in the opinion of the D. A. V., solve the problem of providing suitable permanent employment for every service-disabled veteran not totally disabled. Incidentally, it should be kept in mind that only about 10 to 15 percent of all service-disabled veterans are rated by the Veterans' Administration as totally disabled; most of America's service-disabled veterans should, therefore, be regarded as employable.

Although preferences can absorb some of the able-bodied veterans into suitable permanent employment, preferences and procedures alone cannot give the opportunity for full employment to all returned veterans, and I am strongly convinced that that objective can be accomplished only on the basis of detailed advance planning aimed toward full employment for all employable Americans.

Starting out with a 2-day conference held last November by the National Council of American Veteran Organizations, many 1-, 2-, and 3-day conferences have during the last several months been held by various groups, looking for the solution. Many counties, municipalities, and States, but not nearly enough of them, have had functioning post-war planning committees, which give much promise for the future. The over-all picture, from the national standpoint, however, has not as yet been clarified. Briefly, the problem is to convert some 20,000,000 employees from the production of war matériel to the production of peacetime commodities, and to absorb eight or ten or twelve million armed forces dischargees back into useful productive civilian living.

Parenthetically, may I state that the attempt to solve the economic maladjustments of veterans, solely from the veteran angle, such as appears to be the purpose behind the so-called G. I. bill of rights, now being considered by the House of Representatives, whereby all post-war adjustments for all veterans would unwisely be delegated to the Veterans' Administration, will more probably lead to veteran doles rather than permanent useful employment.

If able-bodied veterans are to be given the opportunity for suitable permanent employment, they should be integrated into our civilian population and not set aside as problem cases, by concentrating all authority concerning all veterans within the Veterans' Administration, which is already overloaded with its primary responsibility on behalf of service-disabled veterans and their dependents.

Full employment for all employable service-connected disabled veterans, however, can and should be solved by special exemptions, provisions, policies, and preferences. Full employment for millions of able-bodied veterans, however, cannot be solved solely by preferences and procedures, but only by the adoption of policies designed to furnish the opportunity of full employment for all employable Americans.

In conclusion, may I quote from a statement formulated last November, by the National Council of American Veteran Organizations: "Working together, Americans can quickly develop America's resources so that an abundance of the necessities and comforts of life can be made available for all freedom-loving Americans, while still keeping America's representative form of government and the freedoms for all Americans guaranteed under our Constitution, and, at the same time, not only thereby set an example to be followed by, and in, all other countries, but also materially to assist all peoples to attain freedom from want, freedom from fear, freedom of religion, and freedom of speech."

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a resolution adopted by the Franklin County Board of Supervisors on May 5, 1944, urging Congress to enact legislation authorizing the St. Lawrence seaway and power development as a post-war project:

Whereas the welfare of the people of the State of New York is directly concerned in the successful completion of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project; and

Whereas the development of the St. Lawrence River will remove the last major obstacles to deep-draft navigation throughout the Great Lakes system to the Atlantic Ocean and the ports of the world; and

Whereas the same development will simultaneously make available 1,100,000 horsepower of low-cost hydroelectricity, under the self-liquidating State power project; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of New York on March 15-16, 1944, by unanimous vote, adopted a resolution declaring that this State urgently requires the prompt development of the St. Lawrence to furnish low-cost power to millions of industrial, rural, commercial, and domestic consumers: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we appeal for the immediate enactment of such legislation as may be necessary authorizing the St. Lawrence seaway and power development as a post-war project; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to our United States Senators and our Representative in Congress.

Political Interlude

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PETE JARMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, while passing through New Orleans I read a very appropriate editorial in the Times-Picayune of Sunday. In inserting it in the RECORD, pursuant to permission heretofore granted by the House, I call attention to the fact that Louisiana is not one of the eight Southern States which collects a poll tax for school purposes, and that it is, therefore, not feeling the weight of this particular antisouthern attack by those gentlemen not citizens of the States concerned, who would glibly set the Constitution aside for political purposes.

POLITICAL INTERLUDE

Rampant politicos in the Federal Senate take time out this week for periodical genuflection to their great god politics. That hardy political perennial, the anti-poll-tax bill, will start its election year work-out in the "House of Elders" today. It comes up with a proposal to limit debate. Enforcement of cloture requires a two-thirds majority. Denial of the cloture bludgeon, according to Washington report, will cause the measure to be laid aside.

Real or imagined political exigency may frighten to its support a few who know the measure to be unconstitutional, a dangerous threat to the constitutional rights of the States and an example of political legislation at its worst and untimeliest. But we cannot believe two-thirds of the Senate membership, no matter how great the political pressure, will vote to shut off its discussion.

Opposition to the pool tax is not the salient issue before the Senate, as all the Senators know. That State levy has been imposed by nearly all the States at one time or other—without challenge of their constitutional right to adopt it—and abolished voluntarily by all but a handful. The issue before the Senate is the coercion of these remaining States—and the incidental but nevertheless menacing extinction of a State power exercised since the Nation's establishment.

There are two valid, constitutional, democratic ways of ending the centuries old "capitation" or poll tax—through its repeal by the legislatures of the States retaining it, or by an amendment to our Federal Constitution. The Senators know that, too.

Neither of these time-honored American methods suits the rabid politicians who back the pending measure. A lot of them probably have no other purpose than to exploit the issue for political profit. Others may be supporting it as a club to destroy the constitutional rights of the States and center all governmental powers of every kind in Washington. Some Americans believe in that centralization of power under a benevolent Hitler. This so-called anti-poll-tax bill, designed to lynch a State right established and unchallenged for more than a century, constitutes a long step toward that centralization. Other purposes are professed for it, but it has no other attainable objective.

Thoughtful Americans in private life who take the trouble to study the matter are not fooled, and American Senators who believe in our American system and Constitution should neither be fooled nor frightened by its political ballyhoo.

Spencer Canary, of Bowling Green, Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. WEICHEL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Spencer Canary, editor of the Sentinel-Tribune, of Bowling Green, Ohio.

Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last Spencer Canary, of Bowling Green, Ohio, was 70 years of age. He is one of the distinguished newspapermen of my district. He came up the hard way, and has earned his high place among the journalists of Ohio. His application, study, and experiences have given him a seasoned philosophy.

I want to pay tribute to him on his birthday and extend my sincere congratulations and include his reverie of Three Score Years and Ten.

THREE SCORE YEARS AND TEN

When a person reaches the age of 70, as the editor will on Saturday, his mind goes back through the past, compares it with the present, and speculates upon the future.

It has been a privilege to live those 70 years, because in them practically all the inventions and improvements that make life more enjoyable for the individual and for society as a whole have either come or been so vastly expanded as to make them absolutely new to all but relatively a few inhabitants. That is true of electric power and lighting, railroad transportation, sanitary sewers, and inside toilets, community water plants, refrigeration, bath tubs, hospitals, educational facilities, newspapers, care of the mentally sick and the infirm, to say nothing of interurban traffic facilities, linotypes, fire protection, telephone exchanges, motorcars, good roads, wireless, phonographs, radios, and movies.

To the editor life has been a splendid adventure and still is. The changes in population from 55,000,000 to 135,000,000 inhabitants and the changes wrought by inventions and society's progress toward greater interest in all its members have made life an interesting one. Political conceptions ranging from absolute monarchy to communism with their economic ideas have appealed to the imagination and developed arguments, controversies, and wars. Talented and despicable persons have come and gone; but to the editor the average citizen of today is like the ones of his boyhood and youth and, as he reads history, like those of centuries ago. Human nature has not changed much; but its manifestations have differed with the changing periods. At heart the average person of today is like him of the 1880's and like him of the Biblical days, days of the Crusaders, days of revolutionary fathers. There is simply adaptation to the changed conditions, just as our servicemen are adapting themselves to conditions in the Pacific jungles, Africa, Italy, and Alaska.

And that average person is a pretty good fellow. He differs in ambitions, education, environments, and experience; and consequently his viewpoint differs from others, but he is essentially honest in his opinions and actions, kindly and considerate of others. He is cynical at times and errs in his judgments of others' purposes, but for the most part he has real faith in people as a whole and faith in "a Divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will."

The editor has had throughout the years, and still has, high respect for the ultimately settled convictions of this average citizen taken collectively, while at times he has been amazed at what seemed to him the erroneous judgment of the majority without proper consideration of the facts in relation to themselves and to minorities. But he pities the person who has not enough sense of humor to recognize that he may be wrong and not enough faith in his fellowmen and in the Diety to believe that the affairs of this old world will ultimately be settled on a basis of personal freedom and justice for all.

These are strenuous times, and problems are baffling. So it has been to a degree for a greater part of our life, but that is what makes life interesting. It is not the red glow of the setting sun that most delights us but its rays thrown against the clouds that accompany it to bed, and the greatest thrills come from the lightning playing among dark clouds and the roar of thunder. So, too, the trials and dangers through which one passes in life, the defeats as well as the successes, thwarted ambitions, and the pleasure of accomplishments all make life an adventure that for each individual is full of drama, and in those who are dying under normal conditions there is a benign majesty which the editor hopes may be his when the thread of life grows weaker and weaker and finally snaps.

Uruguay: A Social State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE L. RADCLIFFE

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. RADCLIFFE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Uruguay: A Social State," by Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, professor of sociology at Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md., and visiting professor of social history at the University of Havana.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sign, Union City, N. J., of February 1944]

URUGUAY—A SOCIAL STATE

(By Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, professor of sociology at Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md., and visiting professor of social history at the University of Havana)

The Republic of Uruguay, although the smallest country in South America, takes first prize on the continent with respect to social progress. Operating a national territory about the size of Minnesota, the cowboys of "the Purple Land," as William H. Hudson styled the people of this miniature cattle empire, display qualities of moderation, good neighborliness, self-discipline, and teamwork. When John Gunther coined the expression, "Uruguay is the Denmark of South America," he was not as far wrong as he usually is, although he probably would have been more felicitous in describing the "Banda Oriental," or eastern bank of the River Plate, as "the Wisconsin of the other American Republics."

Just as Madison served as a laboratory for workingmen's compensation acts and diverse forms of labor insurance in North America, so Montevideo, capital of Uruguay, pioneered among the good-neighbor capitals in favor of the 8-hour day and minimum-wage laws for both factory workers and farm laborers. For many years, despite disappointments and setbacks, Wisconsin and Uruguay blazed the trail for a comprehensive system of social security that would protect mothers, children, the unemployed, and the aged. Neither milk producers nor cattle raisers were despoiled in "the dairy State" or in "the sheep and cattle kingdom." Rights were respected wherever they were just. The extreme claims of employers and employees were modified, adjusted, whittled down, and tailored to meet the needs of a balanced economy.

In recent years, however, Uruguay has stepped up the tempo of social change. Today the only political entity that maintains the pace of our tiny good neighbor has its headquarters on the other side of the world at Wellington in the Antipodes. It is my own opinion that Uruguay, with its national monopolies of banking, insurance, electricity, communications, storage, fuels, beef packing, and fisheries, constitutes the most ambitious experiment in state socialism that has been attempted within the framework of democracy. In this sense, the buffer republic, wedged in between Brazil and Argentina, can best be described as "the New Zealand of the New World."

Like its opposite number "down under," Uruguay is struggling with the financial burdens that apparently are inseparable from government ownership and operation of a number of the social tools of production. Although the system works beautifully in an era of expanding markets and domestic prosperity, it has its difficulties when export trade slumps and home producers, whether governmental or private, have to meet their pay rolls and continue to eat. Both Uruguay and New Zealand, it may be observed, found the going unusually rough in the last world depression. Now, when foodstuffs and raw materials are in strong demand, the two countries are sharing in the upswing that is natural among producers of primary products. The real test for both social economies will come, of course, in the days of post-war reconstruction and will depend in no small measure upon the nature of world juridical institutions and the flow of international commerce.

In the meantime, it is fair to consider the two republics as committed to the organization of new ways of community living which aim to combine the virtues of private enterprise with reasonable measures of state initiative and state supervision. If successful, these social states can chart the middle way between the rocks of rugged individualism and whirlpools of leftist totalitarianism.

The Uruguayans, certainly, are not Marxists, and they were never Nazi-Fascists; cherishing their families, their farms, and their church, they believe that these institutions can perform a useful function in the cooperative commonwealth. Nor would they quarrel with those commentators who, like Dorothy Thompson and Walter Lippmann, would be inclined to characterize Uruguay as a social democracy.

One reason among others that may give confidence as to the future of this Republic springs from the fact that, unlike the situation in Chile, there is no sizable organization of Communists among the people. Politically, there are only two major parties, the Colorados and the Blancos, or, as we would say, the Pinks and the Whites. (More caustic commentators sometimes speak of these two groups as the Crudos and the Asados; that is to say, the Raw Ones and those Well-cooked.) The former have had a rather long lease on power, but one always subject to constitutional limitations which accord to the minority party a definite representation in the government and administration. Again, in the establishment of this principle as well as in its actual manifestations, one is impressed by the Uruguayan sense of proportion and fair play. The whole system seems to be pervaded by the spirit of that famous precept of Roman and English equity, "Use your own rights in such a manner as not to infringe upon the rights of others."

In the practical order there is a basic feature insuring the stability of Uruguay's social state. As in every one of the American Republics, land is the most important source of wealth and income. But, unlike the condition in the other countries in the Latin-American orbit, we find a comparatively large number of Uruguayan ranchers and farmers who own the fields they cultivate as well as the flocks and herds they tend. Almost 50 percent of the rural population hold the title deeds of their pastures and wheat lands. Peonage and tenant farming are virtually unknown. To be sure, there are agricultural workers as in every other part of the world, but these sheep herders, gauchos, and farm laborers are embraced in the national system of social security. They look upon themselves and are regarded by their employers as something decidedly more than "hired hands." They feel they have their stake in the national wealth and some claim upon the nation's dividend. If not yet partners in the productive enterprise, they believe they have a right to expect their government to create conditions which permit them to graduate into the land-owning class.

It has often been remarked by Uruguayan intellectuals that this development fits squarely into the framework of the recommendations of Pius XI and Pius XII, who have called for an extension of the principle of private ownership. Cooperative management and profit sharing, it is noted in these circles, are twin corollaries of the same principle.

Although the social state is engaged in numerous business activities, chiefly through the medium of autonomous entities, or agencies, created by and responsible to the State, it should be emphasized that the administration does not and cannot consider positions or jobs in these corporations as political plums. In the selection and appoint of personnel, strict civil-service rules prevail. Consequently, an ideal of public interest similar to that which rules in Great Britain has been developed, quite outside and above the sphere of partisan politics.

Commenting on this feature of Uruguayan administrative practice, one of the cabinet members, on the occasion of a recent visit to Montevideo, remarked to me: "Ordinarily, a political appointee is about one-fifth as efficient as a worker chosen on the basis of talent and experience. In Uruguay, where our population does not exceed 3,000,000, almost every citizen is aware of the abilities and merits of his neighbor. Each voter, man or woman, can scrutinize the record of the directors, technicians, and clerks in our National Administrative Agency for Fuels, Alcohol, and Portland Cement. The least sign of political corruption can be instantly aired and penalized. The managers of these state corporations have to operate in a goldfish bowl. As a result, we have had few scandals in the field of public administration. Moreover, our budget would not allow much margin for graft and pork-barrel appropriations. A few extra thousand would be immediately reflected in stiffer taxation. Since all governmental revenue is derived from customs duties, a new tax would stand out like a sore thumb. This in turn would raise a storm of protest and criticism from people who, in our tiny country, live cheek by jowl with our politicians and public servants. Up to the present, we have had relatively rare cases of job stealing."

It may be that there is another explanation for the low rate of political racketeering in Uruguay. Reference has already been made to the national constitution, which vests executive power in a president assisted by a council of ministers composed of nine members. These cabinet officers are selected by the president from the two political parties polling the greatest number of votes in the presidential elections. Six of the ministers are chosen from the major party, leaving three for the minority. If we could imagine Wendell Willkie, Senator Charles McNary, and Representative Joe Martin associated in the current administration in the United States, we could form some notion of how the system is intended to function. Similarly, in the senate the seats are divided between the two parties, with 15 assigned to each in a chamber of 30.

Most important of all, perhaps, is the provision that the president cannot be reelected for the term immediately following his constitutional period of 4 years. He is eligible for another term after an interval elapses. The vice president, who, like his chief, is elected directly by the people, is subject to the 4-year restriction.

Another interesting check on the executive is the so-called Permanent Commission, composed of four Senators and seven Representatives, whose duty it is to see that governmental executive acts follow the course indicated by the constitution and laws of the general assembly. When the bicameral general assembly is in recess, normally from December to March every year, the permanent commission exercises its power of supervision. The legislative branch of the government, it may be added, elects the ministers of the supreme court of justice. Voting is more than a privilege, it is a legal duty for citizens, both men and women, with a substantial fine applicable to those who fail to exercise the franchise. This is enough to indicate that the Uruguayan Constitution is not a slavish copy of any other organic law, whether the latter originated in the United States or Europe. Although the constitution of this "social state" follows the broad outlines of the United States document, it contains original features.

Throughout Latin America, Uruguay is celebrated as "the Left Bank" of Buenos Aires. This is understood not so much in a political as in a social and recreational sense. Montevideo is the mecca of Argentinian honeymooners, sun worshippers, and pleasure seekers. Along the Uruguayan coast, stretching in both directions from the capital, gleam 150 miles of golden sands. The shore line is dotted with hotels, bathing beaches, race tracks, tennis courts, golf courses, polo fields, and gambling casinos. Luxurious "boites" and night clubs are to be found at all the principal seaside resorts, where internationally known orchestras provide enchanting music, and dancing only ceases with the dawn. Tourist business on "the Left Bank" is a national industry in a rather unique and thoroughly realistic sense: The majority of the hotels, cabarets, and casinos are owned and operated by the community and constitute a lucrative source of income for the government. For that reason, among others, there has been relatively little criticism of the Argentinians by the press of Uruguay, whereas a veritable cyclone of protest against the isolationist policy of Buenos Aires has originated in Santiago de Chile.

The Uruguayans, with an eye to a gigantic revival of tourist traffic from Argentina in the post-war period, have no intention of antagonizing their powerful, wealthy customers. Just as Palm Beach, Miami Beach, and St. Petersburg, Fla., depend upon rich northerners for the prosperity of their subtropical empire, so the Uruguayan municipalities cherish their affluent blood relations, like themselves predominantly of Spanish and Italian descent, only a few hours distant across the estuary of the La Plata. Uruguay, with the most equable climate of any country in the Western Hemisphere (average winter temperature 50° and summer 70°), hopes not only to retain its old friends, but also to win votaries among the tourist population of North America.

At this point, it should be emphasized that Uruguay can point to a record second to none for cooperation with the United Nations. When the Admiral Graf Spee was stricken off her coast she gave the German skipper 24 hours to reach the open sea. The day after Pearl Harbor the authorities in Montevideo declared their ports open to the warships of the United States. The President of the Republic and the general assembly joined hands to institute compulsory military training for all men between the ages of 18 and 45; increased the civil and military aviation budgets; added to armaments; froze Axis funds; restricted the activity of Axis nationals; and stigmatized as "criminal" any attempt to bear arms against an American nation or to spread antidemocratic ideas. Despite angry protests from Argentina, the Uruguayans incorporated themselves wholeheartedly in hemisphere defense by conceding the use of air and naval bases. Gasoline and fuel oil were rationed, an office of civilian defense established, and two national defense bonds issued to the public.

With excellent political judgment, the Committee for Political Defense of the Hemisphere, comprising representatives of all the American Republics except Argentina, set up its headquarters and held its first meetings in Montevideo. Recently, this committee announced that the activity of enemy agents, sabotage, spying, and other conspiratorial efforts had been reduced to the vanishing point. It is likely that the Inter-American Advisory Committee for Political Defense will maintain a center at the Uruguayan capital after the war.

Uruguay's cooperation in the economic sphere has been proportioned to her resources. In July 1942, she signed a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States. Wool from her sheep for uniforms and hides for industrial and military purposes have been a useful contribution to the arsenal of the United Nations.

This fine collaboration is in complete harmony with what the former President of the Republic, Gen. Alfredo Baldomir, said to me in 1938. His words were prophetic:

"Our tradition of friendship for Great Britain and the United States is the most powerful element in our foreign policy. We admire parliamentary institutions and have faith in the dignity and liberty of the individual. The British, of course, buy the bulk of our meat and leather, while we reciprocate by riding on the railroads they have built in our country on a scale which surpasses, relatively speaking, any transportation network in Latin America. You can see for yourself that we prefer American motor cars. We boast one motor vehicle for every 33 inhabitants and the market, as everywhere else in South America, can absorb more. Our politics and economics will remain definitely in the Anglo-American orbit."

It is true that, thanks to a beautifully planned program of paved roads, Uruguay had witnessed a 67 percent increase (from 39,000 to 65,000) in the number of automobiles from 1932 to 1940. This jump is symbolic of the potentialities of the Latin-American market for manufactured products. With expanded purchasing power and a higher standard of living, it is estimated that Latin America could buy 10 times as many motor cars as are operated below the Rio Grande. In Uruguay, where a liberal wage and labor policy have achieved notable reforms, one can see what Latin America, at its best, offers in terms of better living and better business.

Without doubt education has been at the foundation of much of this progress. Literacy, although still an ideal rather than an achievement, is increasing. Compulsory instruction on the primary level dates from 1909, while industrial training is fostered by 19 technical schools. A number of mobile units conduct courses in the country on practical farm economics. The School of Veterinary Medicine, so important in a pastoral nation, is regarded as a model throughout the Americas. Six normal colleges providing a 4-year general course rounded off by 2 years of intensive professional study, supply a steady stream of competent teachers for the public schools. Private religious schools, both Protestant and Catholic, number over 170, with an enrollment of 21,000. Crowning the whole educational system is the Central University at Montevideo. The university includes schools of law, medicine, social science, dentistry, pharmacy, chemistry, engineering, architecture, economics, and agriculture. Educationally, the Uruguayans are in the forefront of Latin America.

While trying to secure proficiency for their sons and daughters in letters and numbers, the people of Uruguay do not forget bodily health. By means of private donations and state contributions, hundreds of school canteens for the feeding of undernourished children have been opened. Thousands of free meals are served every day, while the copa de leche, a glass of fresh milk for each pupil, is almost a national institution. Food is also available at a reasonable rate in the so-called popular restaurants. When students fall victim to illness, they are able to attend 1 of 20 open-air schools or to receive treatment in summer camps and colonies. There is even a camp for run-down teachers.

Again it was no accident that the International Council of the International Institute for the Protection of Childhood recently held its meeting at Montevideo. Upon her return to the United States, after attendance at this conference, Miss Katharine F. Lenroot, Chief of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor, had this to say:

"The South American countries have not only advanced in a material way; they have made outstanding strides in social progress.

In many respects they are far in advance of us, particularly in their social-security programs which, notably, stress child welfare and medical care."

It may be that North Americans have something to learn from their Good Neighbors, particularly the Republic of Uruguay. The acre of diamonds, or social paradise, for which our world planners are groping may lie in our own backyard. Unquestionably, the Uruguayans have been coming to grips with the most acute political and economic problems which confront the modern world. In moving from the domain of the individual to that of the collectivity, it may be enlightening to study the social solutions which are in the alembic on the left bank of the River Plate. In an atmosphere of freedom, comparative prosperity, and peace, there is evolving a new type of socio-democratic state. Uruguay may not have all the answers to our prayers for the world beyond military victory, but it has some extremely attractive, workable suggestions. The latter have the merit of being more Christian than pagan, and more American than Asiatic.

War Training Service Instructors Are Forgotten Men of World War No. 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an article which appeared in the May issue of the American Pilot, an outstanding aviation magazine in the United States. The article is entitled "Airviews":

WAR TRAINING SERVICE INSTRUCTORS—THE FORGOTTEN MEN

As we went to press with this issue, we read a report filed from Washington to the effect that Representative RAMSPECK from Georgia, who functions as chairman of the House Civil Service Investigating Committee, was about to light a fire under the Army Air Forces in an effort to determine why they were spending millions of the taxpayers' money training WASPS when thousands of trained civilian pilots were being released as the Army pilot-training program began to taper off.

In a lighter moment we would be tempted to call that the $64 question, but we will wait and see how bright the flame burns and how high it reaches. The WASPS, as everyone knows, is headed up by the ever-charming Jacqueline Cochran, and have something like five-hundred-odd ladybirds ferrying planes, towing targets, and doing similar tasks, with another 500 in training, and an equal number already signed up and waiting to enter training, at a minimum cost, the report states, of $6,540 each.

As this is written, the committee had not ended its investigation, but there were indications that it didn't think too much of what it had found. To quote Representative RAMSPECK, he said, "They're (the Army) spending a large sum of money training these women, when evidence tends to indicate that there are available several thousand pilots partially or adequately trained who are being let out. That's the question we're posing to the Army—why train people who have relatively little experience—men or women—when you have people who already have much training?"

Perhaps we should have capitalized Mr. RAMSPECK'S "why," as so many other people have been asking that same question, including us. The fact that they are women has nothing to do whatever with the matter and is not even a consideration in the committee's investigation or our thoughts. We are simply concerned with facts. We know that as a result of the curtailment of the Army and Navy's pilot-training programs, almost 1,000 pilot instructors working on War Training Service and Army primary schools have been released and they are, for the most part, "at liberty." To make matters even worse, it is expected that on June 30 another 4,000 will be released in further curtailments. Added to this will be some 4,000 men pilots who were studying to be instructors.

Eloquently stating the case for all his brothers were the remarks of R. B. Jackson, of Chagrin Falls Airport out in Ohio, and reported by Tex Wurzbach in the Cleveland Press:

"This whole program, War Training Service, now has been stopped and by mid summer we will have trained our last Army student. But that leaves us pilots, many having 800 to 1,600 hours flying time, to either enter anywhere in the Army except the flying department or be drafted. We don't feel bad about going into the service, but we were turned down when many of us tried to enlist in the Ferry Command or Air Transport Service. They told us we were frozen to our training jobs and to return to them because that's where we were needed. Meanwhile, everyone was calling us draft dodgers when we couldn't do anything about it. Then the draft boards began to draft us and the Army and Navy then took us to the induction centers and reassigned us back to these (same) jobs. But now that the program is being stopped, we have the choice of going into active service or asking for a discharge in which case we will be drafted. Our claim is that the Government is taking WASPS who have 35 hours of flying time and training them to ferry planes from factories to points of delivery. Here we are, already seasoned pilots and we stand a good chance of going to a cook or baker's school. All over the Nation the thousands of us War Training Service instructors are trying to arouse public opinion so that a few regulations can be changed so our experience will not go down the drain while millions of dollars are being spent to train others to learn to do what we already can do."

That, as we first started to say, is the $64 question, but now we know that it is the $6,540 question and we are wondering how the Army is going to answer it. Meanwhile, stand by for the jack pot.

Post-War Relationship Between Agriculture and Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address delivered by myself at the annual meeting of the Millers' National Federation, held in Chicago on Chicago on May 4, 1944:

I appreciate the invitation to attend this meeting and to appear upon your program. I am especially glad of the opportunity which it gives me to become better acquainted with your members. My anticipations in this respect are happy ones because I know some of you already. This acquaintanceship has been so pleasant that I can only look forward to its extension with pleasure.

As some of you at least know, I represent in Congress a great wheat-growing district out in southwest Kansas. In times past that country has been described as being a place where you could look farther and see less than anywhere else in the world. That's not true now but you can look anywhere in any of a number of counties in my district and see more wheat than you can see anywhere else that I know of. During the past 15 years the 33 counties which comprise my district have produced almost one-tenth of all the wheat produced in the United States. Naturally, with all that wheat, the milling business is important also and Kansas leads the Nation in flour production.

The subject assigned me is the relationship between agriculture and industry and I'm going to get to that presently. Mr. Fakler suggested that perhaps you might be interested in having me say something on the subject of subsidies. Well, I can say a lot on that but unfortunately, from your standpoint and mine, I'm afraid anything I may report will be rather discouraging. Not that the arguments against food subsidies aren't just as good as ever, but rather, because this doesn't seem to be a case where the best argument wins.

The simple fact that the American people as a whole are eating better today than they ever have in our history and are spending a smaller proportion of their national income for food than ever before, demonstrates that there is no real need for the Federal Government to contribute to our individual grocery bills. Today about 20 percent of our national income goes for food and if we were eating the quantity and quality of food which we were consuming during the 5 years preceding the war, we'd be spending only 16 percent of our national income. This, of course, applies to flour and bread just as much as to other foods. Neither flour nor bread prices are above the average for the last 25 years, during most of which time the national income averaged less than half what it will be this year. To take the subsidy off of flour would result in an increase of less than 1 cent in the cost of a loaf of bread and it would still be the cheapest as well as the best of all staple foods.

Not only are subsidies unjustified economically, but they are unfair to the coming generations which will have to pay the bills. At the best, they only conceal rather than prevent inflation, and at the worst, they contribute to inflation because they increase the amount of money available for spending as compared with the goods and services available.

It's idle, however, to discuss food subsidies from an economic standpoint, because their origin and continuation are based upon strictly political considerations. They are purely and simply a gesture of appeasement on the part of the present administration to the leaders of organized labor.

Twice both Houses of Congress, by large majorities, have prohibited food subsidies. Twice this prohibition has been vetoed. Now, with the extension of price control about to come up, there is a further opportunity to ban food subsidies. However, in the end it is likely that the result will be the same as before. Without a two-thirds majority to override a veto, we are helpless.

However, I think that the fight against subsidies has accomplished something in that it has probably prevented their extension on a much larger scale. In the beginning there was talk of two or three billion dollars in food subsidies, and I have no doubt but what we would be paying this much or more had it not been for the fights which have been made.

I do not want to deprecate the work of the Office of Price Administration in its efforts to hold down prices and prevent inflation. The fact remains, however, that one of the principal reasons that the cost of living has not advanced more is because of the miracle of production which we have seen in this country during the past 3 years. It is simply amazing. In the first place, there were few people who believed that we could produce the quantity of war material which we have and there was no one who felt that if we did we could keep our production of civilian goods where it has been. What we have done has been to produce this prodigious quantity of war production and, on top of that, make almost our normal peacetime output of civilian goods. It is this as much as any one factor which has prevented inflation.

This achievement in production proved that American industry, labor, and agriculture, working together, are unbeatable. It did something else. It gave our people renewed confidence in their country and its traditional institutions and policies. For 10 years before the war we had been following a defeatist philosophy. Our governmental policies, in a large part, were based upon the principles of certain economists who held that we had reached in our development what they called a mature economy. They said, in effect, that we were incapable of further expansion, that we had reached the last frontier, and that free enterprise as we had known it in this country was pretty much a thing of the past. The more extreme proponents of these theories held that about the best we could do from now on was to let the Government see that what little we had left was divided equitably among the people.

One of the most significant actions taken by Congress in recent years was the refusal last year to appropriate funds for the continuation of the National Resources Planning Commission. This agency had been set up by Executive order early in the present administration. It did a prodigious amount of work, especially in surveying our natural resources and their potentialities. Much of its research will be helpful in the future. The trouble with the Commission, however, was that it got off on the mature economy theory and most of the plans it formulated were based on the idea that in the future most of our development would have to be through Government programs and Government spending .

Some people got the idea that when Congress stopped the work of this Commission it mean that Congress was opposed to planning. It meant nothing of the kind. It simply meant that Congress could not agree with the defeatist philosophy which appeared to be the basis of all the Commission's planning.

Congress does believe in planning and the best evidence of it is that there have been set up in both the House and Senate, Committees on Post-War Economic Policy and Planning. I happen to be a member of the House committee and can testify to the fact that it is giving most thorough and conscientious study to the problem. Both the House and Senate committees are getting the advice and suggestions of the best business and economic brains of the country and are coordinating their activities with the work of the numerous committees which have been set up by industry, agriculture, and labor, on post-war planning.

These congressional committees are not proceeding on the theory that there is no room for further expansion and development in this country. They take the view that this Nation and its people are standing on the threshold of greater opportunities than we ever have had before. They believe, as I think you do, that if the American people can successfully meet and solve the great problems arising out of the war, that by using the same energy, ability, and spirit of cooperation, they can successfully solve their post-war problems, national and international.

This is not said with any idea of minimizing these problems. They are indeed great—greater than have confronted us in our entire history as a Nation. Even if the war ends at the earliest date for which we dare hope, we will find ourselves with a national debt of between two hundred and fifty billion and three hundred billion dollars. A few years ago Congress solemnly debated whether it was safe to increase the debt limit to fifty billions. We will have also the great problems of disposing of our surplus war supplies, of changing over from war production to normal production, of finding jobs for our returning servicemen and helping them make the necessary adjustments from military to civilian life. If we're going to meet our obligations with respect to employment, we'll probably have to find jobs at living wages for some ten or twelve million more people than were employed before the war. The immediate pressing problem, one that cannot wait because it's right on our doorstep now, is to find some fair, quick, and simple method of terminating war contracts.

One reason for thinking we can solve these great problems comes from the fact that all over America our people are giving their best thought and consideration to these matters. It is said that there are nearly 300 national and regional groups and organizations which are working on post-war planning and perhaps 3,000 local groups which are working along the same lines.

There are those who criticize these activities. They say that America should give its undivided attention to winning the war and that when the war is won there will be plenty of time to work out post-war policies. I agree that we must not let post-war planning take our minds off of the war or divert our attention from the fact that winning the war should be the primary consideration of everyone of us. There is no way, however, by which we can swing from a wartime economy to a peacetime economy overnight. Our defense program began in 1940. It has just hit its peak this year. It may not take that long to convert back from war production. We hope not, but it will take time. The fact is, it's a continual process. It's going on right now. In certain lines of war production we have reached our goal, orders are being canceled, production cut back, and employees discharged. This thing is going to continue. The fact that we are fighting two wars and that one will probably be finished before the other, is going to mean that there can be much conversion before hostilities end.

There is no reason why plants which have finished their jobs of war production should not convert to civilian production unless they can be used in some other type of war production. Why should they stand idle if there are men and materials available for the production of needed civilian goods? Of course, I realize it is not quite as simple as that. We must be fair to those industries which have converted to war production and which still have large orders ahead. Is it right that their competitors who have completed their war contracts should get the jump on them when it comes to the civilian market? Perhaps not, and yet I think all will agree that unless we hold up all conversion and thus jeopardize recovery, some companies will get their goods on the market first. In order to be as fair as possible in the matter, I think that this situation might well be taken into consideration in adjusting contract settlements. Try as we may, however, there are bound to be cases which canot be worked out fairly and equitably, and to put too much emphasis on that phase may delay recovery.

There is also the problem of disposing of Government stocks. Already this is causing concern because we have reached the point where some supplies are ready for disposal. I know it is a matter of importance to the food industry, because if stocks of food, which may become surplus, are thrown on the market recklessly and without consideration as to the effect on supplies and prices, the situation might become rather chaotic. This matter has been covered by legislation which is now pending before the House Committee on Agriculture.

I have spoken of our remarkable production achievements and of the renewed confidence which this has given to our people that our American system of free enterprise, combined with our know-how and driving energy, can out-produce any other system ever set up. Paradoxically, the great demonstration of our productive capacity is the thing which is giving us our greatest worry now. We are wondering whether we have the consumptive capacity to match it; whether we will have enough buying power to absorb the production of which we are capable.

This realization of the nature of our problem has resulted in widespread discussion of what is referred to as an economy of abundance. I know of no public discussion of post-war problems, either on the part of industry, labor, or agriculture, which are not in harmony with this thought. The only dissenters which I have heard are a few in Government or in academic circles who, even after our experience during the war years, still contend that we have reached the limit of our ability to expand.

But, with all this talk of abundance, there still remains the question as to whether or not in actual practice such a policy can and will be worked out. If we have a real economy of abundance in this country, industry, labor, and agriculture will all have to change some of the policies which they have been following in the past.

This has been especially true of industry and labor. As far as agriculture is concerned, its experiments with a scarcity economy have been forced upon it because of the prevalence of such practices on the part of industry and labor. Anyone who knows farmers knows that more than any other group they are in favor of abundant production. The farmer hates any program which is based upon curtailed production. His every instinct and inclination are to produce all he can. It is this fact which accounts in large part for the marvelous record during the war period. Yet, the very fact that the farmer believes in abundant production has been his undoing. Too many times he has been the only one who believed in that theory. The idea of killing pigs and plowing up crops never originated with the farmer. Nevertheless, there have seemed to be times when that was the only alternative to ruinous prices and impending bankruptcy. The curse of the farmer as far as abundant production is concernd is that this course, in so many cases, has resulted in extremely low, if not disastrous, prices. If the farmer is to produce abundantly some way must be found to protect him from being destroyed in the flood of his own abundance.

The great dilemma of the farmer is that he buys in a market where prices are fixed by the seller and sells in a market where prices are fixed by the buyer. He plants his crop or breeds his livestock from 6 months to a year before he can put the finished product on the market. When the operation begins he has no idea what price he will receive or whether he will have anything to sell in the end, because he has to take all the risk of weather, insect pests, and plant and animal diseases, risks for which, generally speaking, there is no insurance.

That has been the position of the farmer in the past except where Government programs have intervened. What of the position of industry and labor on this matter of abundant production? While we cannot generalize as to all of industry or all of labor, there can be no denial that in the past there has been a tendency on the part of large segments of both toward monopoly and fixed prices. There has been a constant effort to do away with competition.

I have been a member of State or national legislative bodies for the past 23 years. I've seen much legislation proposed and some enacted at the behest of industry and labor. Never, however, have I seen either group propose anything to bring about more competition. This was true, irrespective of the nature of the legislation, no matter whether it dealt with tariffs, wages, hours, prices, or business practices. The sponsors of such legislation were for competition, of course, but always for the other fellow.

Certainly, if we are to have an economy of abundance, labor organizations will have to abandon a lot of rather common practices of the past. There is no better example of monopoly than the closed shop. There is no better example of scarcity economics than some of the labor practices known as featherbedding.

It is not fair to say that the practices and policies which I have mentioned have been followed by all branches of industry or by all labor organizations. That they are widely prevalent in both industry and labor is a matter of common knowledge.

I think all of us believe in fair wages and fair profits, but we can't have an economy of abundance if we have excessively high wages or excessive profits. There is too much of a tendency for labor leaders to talk about increased wages without any thought of increased production, and of business leaders to talk about increased profits without basing them on increases in production.

One of the great gains which has come out of the war has been improved technological processes. In some lines we've made as much progress as we might make in 10 or 15 normal years. This has resulted in lower production costs. Perhaps some of the results of this increased efficiency should be passed on in the way of wages and profit, but the best way to benefit everyone and promote abundance is to give those savings to the public in the way of lower prices.

One thing sure, if we are going to employ 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 more people in production and distribution after the war we'll have to produce much more than we ever did before. We'll have to sell those goods after we produce them. Will we sell more or less if we have moderate profits and moderate prices, as contrasted with large profits and high prices? What we must have if we are all to do business with one another is something like a fair relationship between prices, wages, and profits. If one group, through organization, legislation, or monopolistic practices gets more than its share of the national income that slows up the exchange of goods and services—it moves in the direction of scarcity.

I think this brings me up to what I am supposed to discuss—relations between agriculture and industry. I've been a long time getting there, but I'm not going to detain you much longer. From what I've already said, it's fairly obvious that I don't believe we can have a policy of abundance in one segment of our tconomy and scarcity in another; we can't have half the Nation operating under free enterprise and the other half regimented; we can't have the law of supply and demand operating as to one industry and monopolies operating in another. In the long run, we've got to operate straight across the board, one way or another.

For years labor and industry have pretty well controlled their prices. Agriculture operated in a free economy. It was the only way 6,000,000 competing producers could operate. It was the way they wanted to operate. However, as the interdependence of industry, labor, and agriculture became greater agriculture, in self-defense, was forced to seek the protection of fixed prices and fixed production. The only way this could be done was through governmental action, because there is no way by which the millions of widely scattered farmers in this country could function as a unit otherwise. And so, we've had Government price supports for farm products and we've had the inevitable accompaniment of price fixing—production and marketing controls. I'm referring now not to war-food programs, but to pre-war policies. Just as sure as industry and labor, in the post-war world, attempt to eliminate competition, fix prices, and follow other scarcity-promoting practices we'll have farm price supports and marketing quotas again. Not because farmers want them—they don't—but because they are rather more pleasant than foreclosures and bankruptcy.

I'm sure that all of us want the same thing, and that is less Government control and planning. Yet, I think that in any program for the post-war period, there is a place for Government. In the first place, the Government must necessarily determine our fiscal policy. It must deal with taxation and with expenditures for public works if there are to be any. Certainly, our tax policies for the next few years are going to be all important in determining the course of our business development. Whatever we have in the way of a social-security policy will have to be operated by the Government. I'm thinking now particularly of unemployment insurance which may be needed to bridge the transition from war production to normal production. Then also, whatever is done in the important field of terminating contracts and disposing of surplus supplies must be done through Government. Relaxation of wartime controls is something which depends almost wholly upon governmental action. I have already said that anything in the way of farm programs must necessarily be under Government sponsorship.

Now there is no particular reason why I should make this sort of an address to the millers. As far as I know, yours is at least a reasonably competitive business. It is an old-established business with long and honorable traditions. It is a most fundamental and necessary business. What I have said has been addressed to you, not as millers, but as leaders in the business community who will have a great deal to say about the relationships between Government, industry, and agriculture in the important months and years ahead of us.

What we have to have, if this country is to keep off of the rocks of unemployment, bankruptcies, breadlines, and foreclosures, is a combination of business statesmanship, labor statesmanship, agricultural statesmanship, and governmental statesmanship. I'm talking to you because you can and must furnish a part of the leadership along this line.

It would be presumptuous for me to make suggestions as to a post-war program for your own industry. I know that you are working on it. I cannot refrain, however, from saying that, in my opinion, the opportunities for progress and development in the production, processing, and distribution of food have never been as great as they will be in the post-war period.

Never at any time in the history of the world has there been so much interest in food and nutrition. Here in this country we usually take food for granted. It is only when rationing and other controls incident to war touch us that the average American gives any thought to food. Yet the nutritionists tell us that a considerable part of our population is undernourished even in good times. As for the rest of the world, there are hundreds of millions who suffer from constant and continual hunger. Never in all the history of mankind has there been a time when the human race has had enough to eat.

The United Nations Food Conference was a recognition of the fact that this world is food conscious today as it has never been before. Whatever may eventually come out of this organization, it is a landmark in world nutritional history. Along with this increased interest in food, the war period has seen marked technological advances in food processing and distribution. Quick-freezing, dehydration, and compression all appear to have great possibilities.

There will never be a time in the years immediately ahead when the world will not need all the surplus food we can produce in America. It is only a question of buying power on the part of other nations and, of course, our willingness and ability to accept goods in exchange.

I think that after the war this country should make a special effort to stimulate the export of wheat and wheat products. It will take some effort. Our experts may probably have to be on the basis of a lower price level than that which is received for domestic consumption, and if this is done, the mechanics for doing so will have to be worked out.

I still think the old McNary-Haugen idea is worth considering. We made a great mistake in not trying it out when it was advocated back in the twenties. Recently a new plan known as the Pickert-Bearman plan has been worked out to promote the export of surplus farm products. Some of you may be familiar with it. There is not time to discuss it here, but I think it has real possibilities.

But in the long run, the milling business and every other business can prosper only as we all prosper. The war has furnished another convincing demonstration that in this country we all go up and down together. We can't have prosperity unless men are employed at good wages. We can't have employment unless there are men who are ready to risk capital and contribute managerial ability to make profits and furnish jobs. We can't have either jobs or profits without sound governmental policies. The city man cannot get along without the farmer or the farmer without his customer in the city. America in the future can achieve its destiny only as we all work together. Each of us can achieve success only as we work with the other fellow.

I found this thought most effectively presented the other day in a little publication called the Buddgette, gotten out by the Edward G. Budd Manufacturing Co. I want to conclude by reading this little article entitled "What's Going to Happen to Me":

"That is the most important question there is in our lives. In these troubled times it becomes harder to answer than ever before. It is a personal question. It sounds selfish, but it is not that so long as we do not add, 'and to hell with the other fellow.'

"'What happens to me' is closely tied up with 'What's going to happen to us.' There are many who haven't learned this yet. Some are nations; some are politicians; some businessmen; some are labor leaders; and mostly they are just plain folks.

"It's the plain folks who count. The leaders will reflect their attitude. Life is getting too complicated to let the thinking be done by a few, or to have it self-centered.

"We know, for instance, that we are all in this war together. We are going to have to learn that we are all in this life together, too. The excitement of war makes it easy to remember the first. The let-down following the war period is going to make it harder to recall the other. But we are going to have to do it for our own individual good.

"What's going to happen to me? Frankly, I don't know. All I know is that it will be nothing very good unless something good happens to you, too."

The Political Economic Views of Andrew Jackson Higgins, One of America's Greatest Builders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following as taken from the Eureka News Bulletin:

THE POLITICAL ECONOMIC VIEWS OF ANDREW JACKSON HIGGINS, SR.

From time to time Andrew Jackson Higgins, Sr., has expressed his political economic views before universities, business clubs, commerce associations, American Legion posts and on the air. Well-known columnists and national magazines have carried interviews from Mr. Higgins which left no doubt in anyone's mind as to his position.

Some ultra-conservative bankers and industrialists have raised their hands in horror and we have heard them exclaim to Mr. Higgins, "Surely you have been misquoted. Surely you, one of the largest employers of men in the South, the South's leading industrialist, have no socialistic inclinations!" to which Mr. Higgins replied, "Wouldn't you rather see this country a little pink than totally red?"

This great conflict, of which World War No. 1 was a part, is a world-wide battle for both political and economic freedom; a conflict of two radical schools of thought, made possible because of a dissatisfied world.

It must be remembered that less than a century ago slavery was a part of the economic system of the United States. Even today, slavery is a recognized legal practice in certain areas in East Africa. Some American industralists of today would want restored the unregulated capitalism of the last century—the days when there were no income taxes and corporations were ruthless and the big steel mills paid a man a dollar and a half a day for 11 hours work, and starvation faced he who was too old to work—the glorious days of free enterprise—the days of Vanderbilt's "public be damned" policy, when railroads would charge one person a certain rate and his neighbor ten times more. Those days are gone forever. The pendulum has been gradually swinging to the left.

The various social reforms since World War No. 1 such as social security, employment insurance, shorter working hours and better working conditions, have been brought about not because they were forced upon America by Roosevelt's brain trust, but because the majority of right-thinking Americans wanted such social benefits.

Ultra-conservative industrialists of the old school looked upon labor as a purchasable commodity which could be treated as any other material with wages based upon the law of supply and demand, regardless of the cost of subsistence.

From the earliest days Higgins has looked upon the honest workingman as a partner. To the man who cheerfully gave his best to Higgins there was no limit to his reward. Higgins, now, or at any time in the past, has never had any use for the shirker or the parasite. They had no place in Higgins industries. Higgins knew that the majority of workingmen were honest craftsmen who worked both for subsistence and for the pleasure derived from a fascinating occupation.

The honest workingman knew that Higgins was his friend, and as a result, management and labor has worked together to make Higgins Industries what it is today. They worked together as a family. They have had their differences. What family hasn't? But the differences were always settled in Mr. Higgins' office—not in the newspapers and not in Washington. As a result, labor recketeers and gangsters have never gained a foothold in the unions affiliated with Higgins Industries, Inc. Under the craft unions, or the C. I. O. system of collective bargaining, the "fly in the ointment" is that there is not much incentive to the workmen. By collective bargaining in their union, they have ruled out the recognition by management administering capital of merit among the craftsmen; that is, to recognize in pay one individual more than another—in face of the fact that there are no two people exactly the same, mentally or physically, or with the cleverness of their minds or their hands.

Management and labor in Higgins Industries have come a long way together, and they have a long open road ahead.

One can visualize five systems applicable to America's industrial societies:

(1) Unregulated capitalism functioning as "free enterprise"; (2) capitalism regulated for the benefit of the whole people; (3) capitalism controlling government or (4) controlled by government for the benefit of a privileged minority; (5) socialism. The first never existed in its pure form, does not exist today, and becomes increasingly impossible with every addition to the complexity of the industrial order. Politically, it is a euphemism to protect the third system.

Because fascism represents absolute loss of political liberty, and communism a loss that is somewhat less than absolute, anybody faced with a choice between fascism and communism will prefer communism if he places primary value upon liberty. But for that same reason he will seek to evade such a choice by reaching economic and social decisions through the processes of democratic self-government.

In a recently published book just off the Bobbs-Merrill press, The Road to Peace and Freedom, by Irving Brant, we have an expression of the political economic "pink" policy of Andrew Jackson Higgins. Brant expresses this philosophy in the following words:

"In a self-governing society ruled by intelligence, there need be no aping of any system developed outside its borders, but there will be no rejection of any system because it developed outside. Believers in capitalism are frightened by the fact that every additional step in the regulation of capitalism is a step in the direction of socialism. So, too, on a mountain road, every step away from a landslide is a step toward a precipice. Shall one therefore let himself be crushed by falling rocks?"

Whenever the businessmen, technicians, statesmen, and journalists of the United States recognize that regulated capitalism is the only alternative to socialism, they will cease to fear their movement in the direction of socialism. They will cease to fear it because they will be hunting constructively for the place at which they can stop, and if there is no stopping place, they will know there is none and adjust themselves to the fact. There is just one thing that can drive the country into socialism without necessity for it. That is the blind resistance to regulated capitalism which makes it impossible to see the stopping place, if there is one, on the road to socialism.

To realize what a vast difference the attitude of businessmen and political leaders makes, consider the fact that in Russia the socialistic industrial system is managed by men who correspond to our business executives and engineers, working as hard as American businessmen do, and with the same basic incentive of self-support. The entire force of government is directed to the same end. It is obvious that the Russian system would break down if it did not have the support of such men of ability.

A Socialist regime in the United States would break down without a similar support. What our businessmen, technicians, and statesmen fail to realize is that they are breaking down the only alternative to socialism—regulated capitalism—by offering the same kind of opposition to it that they expect people to offer, with fatal results, to socialism. If this attitude remains unchanged for but a few more years it will destroy the system of private enterprise in the United States.

A few far-sighted American businessmen realize the truth of this, but their views have not dented the general attitude of the business world. It has not even penetrated the consciousness of organized labor sufficiently to produce a unified political policy. Since there is no present indication that American business and political leadership is capable of preventing this catastrophic conflict, it is all the more imperative that the people of this country assert their unity in all matters which now bind them together. The greatest of these is their common desire for freedom and self-government.

The American people share with the British the longest heritage of personal freedom and governmental responsibility to be found anywhere in the human race. They should therefore be better able than any others to hold to their rights through the adjustment of society to this complex new age of titanic industrial and financial power.

The surest defense of American freedom is a free and peaceful world. The strongest assurance of a free and peaceful world is American devotion to it. Thus the defense of the United States against its dangerously looming domestic hazards leads us once more to the international field—to the choice between world responsibility and isolation, between cooperation and grasping chauvinism, between democratic revolutions and the cold fears of visionless diplomats, between a world organization for peace and a Third World War. We are at the junction of the roads, one leading to war, slavery, and death, the other to peace and freedom. The ways are open, the paths are broad and plainly marked. It is for us to choose between them.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an article which appeared in the April issue of Contact magazine, which is an outstanding aviation publication:

WANTED FEMALE—IMPERSONATORS

On the page opposite this editorial is a story from our I. N. S. Washington correspondent concerning commissions in the A. A. F. for women pilots. Kindly note the concluding paragraph of that story: "We realize that some people are saying that we are depriving men who have had some training in this program. However, we cannot lower our standards just because a man has had a few hours in the air."

Now this sort of pap—no matter who hands it out—is misleading and deceptive. Just who are these men pilots who have had "some training"? What sort of malarky is this that would lead the American people to believe women pilots are being trained to displace—not replace, mind you—men pilots because "we cannot lower our standards just because a man has had a few hours in the air."

More specifically we think this story and another on page 6 of this same issue of Contact, is plain unadulterated hogwash of the familiar Washington brand. Here are the real brief facts:

Encouraged by the Army, the War Production Board, the American Legion, and various Washington wind machines, thousands of men, on their own time and money, at real personal sacrifices, became highly trained W. T. S. flight instructors. These instructors trained thousands of Army Air Corps cadets in the W. T. S. program. That program has now been scrapped. These flight instructors are, for the most part, right back where they first started—candidates for the walking Army. As for the "few hours in the air" so glibly passed over we have seen one petition signed by many of these men in the Enlisted Air Corps Reserve, whose flying time averages 700 hours per man. Among other things these able, experienced male pilots—about 5,000 of them so nonchalantly tossed aside by the A. A. C.—are told they may join the Air Transport Command, if they can meet the A. T. C. requirements, viz.: Minimum of 1,000 hours flying time with 200 hours logged on planes powered with 200-horsepower engines or better. Mark you, this is a standard for male pilots. Now, how about Jackie Cochran's glamour girls—35 hours total time, a student permit and no license necessary? ("The A. A. T. will train you from scratch for you are badly needed"—Jacqueline Cochran, Ladies' Home Journal, March, 1944.) Why this discrimination? Who is throwing their weight around in Washington? Is somebody making a play for the 1944 female vote?

Our esteemed contemporary—and we do mean esteemed—Gill Robb Wilson, writing in his column for the New York Herald Tribune, sympathizes with these 5,000 discarded men pilots; but Gill thinks they should not be yelling for airplanes just because they are flyers. They should be willing to peel potatoes, clean windshields for women pilots or what have you to help win the war. By the same token we hear Uncle Sam is in need of thousands of nurses. How about some of these 35-hour female wonders swapping their flying togs for nurses' uniforms? But that would be downright rub-and-scrub work—no glamor there—and we do mean glamor—we sort of remember the "Airport Annies" who buzzed around our pre-war airports.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following communication signed by Gold Star Mothers present at exercises held at Webster, Mass., on May 14, 1944:

Hon. PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Mother's Day. We are Americans devoted, above all, to this beloved country of ours—the United States of America. Many of us have already made the supreme sacrifice, offering the very blood and lives of our sons on the field of battle, with only one consolation in mind—that this sacrifice will bring truth, justice, and liberty to all humanity.

Will the United States of America betray Poland?

To those who writhed in anguish at Poland's agony on September 1, 1939, when he signaled his forces to roll over the boundaries of Poland, Hitler, with all his vision, had he devined that men who would be free could not be intimidated by might, however monstrous, would not now be struggling to fend off the hands that reach for his throat. Our memories certainly would be short, indeed, if we forgot that it was in the same year of 1939 that Russia, now presumably our ally, stabbed Poland in the back by seizing and occupying eastern Poland while fighting the Nazi hordes in the west. Is not Russia just as guilty as Hitler in violating Poland's inborn rights to national unity?

Will the United States of America betray Poland?

Indeed, Mr. Congressman, the future of Poland is very black and our hopes are all beclouded by the German brutality and the Russian stubborn, greedy, and ignorant passions. At this moment our faith is highly uncertain by the apparent indecision of both our American and Allied diplomats who, swayed by un-American propaganda, are belittling the legal Polish Government in London, forgetting that this august body was elected after the tragic death of General Sikorski on July 4, 1943, strictly in conformity with the manner in which governments in Poland had been formed for a long time before the outbreak of the present war. Sir, we mothers, who are giving and sacrificing our sons in the defense of the "four freedoms," trust in your sense of justice that you will do your utmost and that you will enlighten those who have been swayed from the truth by this false, malicious, and diabolical propaganda.

Poland will rise again, rise from her knees to which she was beaten, rise in red scars and scorched tatters as a living example of the madness of the militarists, rise to point an unwavering and accusatory finger at the Nazi and Russian criminals who wantonly slew that they might rob. It has been so long, and so many others have become victims like her, that there may have been moments when we forgot that it was Poland who bore the first onslaught and the most savage battle, not for days, but for weeks, in a nightmare of pain, sustained only by faith in God and the ancient will to fight for freedom and liberty.

The fire that destroys now meets the fire that cleanses, and in the greatest battle men ever waged on earth against the powers of darkness, the salvaging flame of the free will light Warsaw again, tinting the ruins which shall be monuments eternal to Poland's unsurpassed heroism.

In our labors, our discomforts, and our sacrifices, whether on the firing line or on the production line, we have the spiritual satisfaction of knowing that the United States of America is on the right side in this war as she has been in every war; that our beloved country is maintaining unbroken the record of never having engaged in a war of conquest, spoils, or aggrandizement.

America's hero dead here or wherever they may rest, gave up their lives only in righteous and sacred causes—for liberty, for unity, for the preservation of human rights, for the freeing of the oppressed, for the championship of great ideals. Our proudest boast is that America always has played only one role in its history—that of the defender of precious principles—of truth, of justice, of right.

American fighting men, our sons, are giving their lives for these ideals in this war.

Will the United States of America betray Poland?

At the Mother's Day exercises held in the Municipal Auditorium at Webster, Mass., on May 14, 1944, and in the presence of many Gold Star Mothers, 642 mothers with 974 sons in the armed forces of the United States of America from the towns of Webster and Dudley in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, it was unanimously voted and resolved that the foregoing appeal be forwarded to the Honorable DAVID I. WALSH, in the United States Senate, Hon. SINCLAIR WEEKS, in the United States Senate, and to the Honorable PHILIP J. PHILBIN, in the House of Representatives.

Witness the hands and signatures of the Gold Star Mothers who were present during the exercises so held.

Mrs. Stasia Miller, six sons in service, one died in action; Sofia Troub, three sons in service, one died in action; Mrs. Mary Marcinczyk, one son, died in action; Julia Loska, one son, died in action; Mrs. Annie Wysocki, one son in service, one son dead; and Mrs. Mary Wagner, one son dead.

Address of Col. Ruth Cheney Streeter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech of Col. Ruth Cheney Streeter, United States Marine Corps, Director, Marine Corps Women's Reserve, before the seventh annual dinner of the Massachusetts Committee of Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, in Boston, Mass., May 11, 1944:

Mr. Toastmaster, Governor Saltonstall, Mayor Tobin, distinguished guests, and members of the Massachusetts Committee of Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, it was a gracious gesture on your part to include a representative of the women in military service on your program tonight. I came with pleasure because it seems to me that your very name is an inspiration.

Have you ever noticed how in times of stress we tend to lose our individuality, but having stood up and been counted we become symbols of the cause with which we have allied ourselves? This meeting seems to me a symbol of two things—freedom and team play.

Nowadays we hear much about "four freedoms," and then people are apt to add their own ideas of extra freedoms. Tonight most people would regard this occasion as being a splendid example of "freedom of religion," and so it is, but it is also more than that.

Personally, I have always been troubled by a conviction that the word "freedom" is singular, not plural, and that if you refer to the one word alone you include therein all the decent independence which people have a right to expect and for which they are willing to fight and die.

Many years ago, Tom Paine described, in stirring words, "freedom" and the price which apparently must be paid for it ever so often. We all know the first words: "These are the times which try men's souls." But we may have forgotten that he goes on to say: "The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country, but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny like hell is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheaply we esteem too lightly; it is dearness only that gives everything its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated."

You ladies and gentlemen are showing by your presence here tonight how highly you rate "so celestial an article as freedom."

The second thing which it seemed to me was symbolized by this group is "team play." Kipling described it well when he wrote:

"For the game is more than the player of the game
"And the ship is more than the crew."

In our day, the ship is this present war and the crew consists of soldiers, sailors, marines, and the people on the home front. They differ greatly from each other. For one thing, they differ in matters of religion; but that does not interfere with their all working together as one crew. For another thing, the crew—even the uniformed members of it—now consists of both men and women. There were a few women in the military services in World War No. 1, but there are now many more and they are doing very valuable work.

It was a kind and thoughtful gesture on your part to ask me here to represent those women. I cannot make you an erudite speech, but perhaps I can tell you a little of what being in a military service means to the women whom you so generously honor tonight. I happen to be a marine, but tonight I speak for all my colleagues in the service—WAC, WAVES, SPARS, Army and Navy nurses.

In the first place, we women recognize, of course, that our contribution in no way equals that of the men, who undergo hardship and danger; and that the special honor and glory which belong to the fighting men are still reserved exclusively for them.

But the women are doing much of the home work for this war, and doing it often under conditions of isolation, monotony, and regimentation which represent an enormous contrast with their ordinary lives, and doing it extremely well, nevertheless.

The commandant of the Marine Corps Women's Reserve schools at Camp Lejeune, a much-decorated, regular officer back from Guadalcanal, was talking with me the other day, and remarked solemnly, "I used to think I knew all about women."

"Yes, sir," I replied, "that is a common masculine misconception."

He blinked a bit, but continued valiantly: "You know, they aren't at all like what I thought they would be. We men thought they would weep on our shoulders every time they didn't get their way, but not at all; they are perfectly good sports. Then we thought they would all want to be prima donnas, but they don't; they pull together extremely well and they are often better than men at the sort of work they are doing."

It is occasionally part of my job to inspect the barracks at our recruit depot. I am less likely to look for dust or disorder than to look for the names and faces of enlisted women who are standing so rigidly at attention at the foot of their bunks. They are keen, young faces, and the names on their name tags are from every country, and I am sure represent all forms of religion. But they are in the process of becoming marines, and this common purpose is greater than possible differences.

Of course, we women in uniform are awfully proud of the opportunity to share the military obligations of our generation. Pride in the corps and the resolve to uphold its honor, no matter what the cost to ourselves, are traditions which have been rapidly absorbed by the women. And no wonder, for American women have always gone pioneering with their men. They came over on the Mayflower; they went West in the prairie schooners; and now they are learning from observation and experience much of what it takes to carry out the oath they took "to protect and defend the United States of America against all its enemies whomsoever."

I am well assured that the only way they can withstand this strenuous experience is by developing the resources within themselves. First among these are the religious resources. Chaplains of all faiths are at hand to help them—not only in spiritual matters, but often in very practical matters, too. For the chaplain—not being in the chain of command—has many privileges; and frequently acts as a safety valve for all kinds of problems. Both officers and enlisted personnel are glad to avail themselves of his services.

Though military service is a strange and strenuous experience, the crucible of this war is showing up a pretty fine generation. There is nothing wrong with the crew of this ship; the men and women of the military services are working splendidly together; and are becoming something of a mutual admiration society.

I had an example of this fellowship as I was traveling to one of our big camps last winter. A very young boy in a marine uniform stopped by my chair and said: "You're Colonel Streeter, aren't you?" And when I said, "Yes," he said, "Do you mind if I talk with you a minute?" Now this lad was obviously homesick, and since I had been a mother for a good many years before I was a colonel, I said, "Sit down and tell me all about it."

Well, it seems he was having rather a tough time having just bilged out of officer training school. But he didn't want to talk about his troubles; he just wanted to tell me how fine he thought my girls were—particularly one of our recruiting sergeants in New York. He ended by saying "You know, I can't seem to take much interest in civilian girls any more. But your girls understand what it means to be a marine."

They do, indeed; and I believe this sharing of a common experience will be a very great source of strength to our country. Its young men and young women are standing side by side in our defense; and though we may regret the fate which lays such a heavy burden on this generation, they are not sorry for themselves. They are no more defeatists than your own Mr. Justice Holmes who, after serving throughout the Civil War and being wounded three times, was still able to say:

"The generation that carried on the war has been set apart by its experience. Through our great good fortune, in our youth our hearts were touched with fire. It was given to us to learn at the outset that life is a profound and passionate thing. * * * But above all we have learned that * * * the one and only success it is man's to command is to bring to his work a mighty heart."

The men and women in the services do have "mighty hearts" and you have a right to be proud of them, for they are your own children. You have probably observed that this war is being fought without slogans. It is a longer and harder war than most of us expected, and it requires all the time and effort of the people who are fighting it. They haven't much energy left for talk; and they have learned to value actions more highly than words. Consequently, such an action as your gathering here tonight in this demonstration of unity and good will means much to them. You are giving them encouragement and support; and helping them to preserve that "celestial article, freedom" for which they are working and fighting.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article written by Rabbi J. X. Cohen, chairman of the Commission on Economic Problems of the American Jewish Congress. I have known Rabbi Cohen personally for a relatively short time, but I have had occasion for many years to observe with great admiration the work of himself and his commission on economic problems. When I read this article in the Congress Weekly of the American Jewish Congress, I felt its soundness was such that it was desirable to have it drawn to the attention of the Members of this body:

F. E. P. C.—SYMBOL OF LIBERATION

(By J. X. Cohen, B. S., C. E.)

The day after the battle many sun-bloated bodies grotesquely floated on the shallow tropic sea—dead United States marines. When their landing craft stranded on the uncharted coral reef they had waded waist deep toward death on Tarawa Beach. Machine-gun bullets no longer sprayed upon them; only the slight swell of the untroubled sea gently lapped and swayed them—as bits of decomposing driftwood. In the Signal Corps movie they appeared as nameless dead.

I wrote an item about Lt. Peter G. Lehman for our bulletin. I had known the lad as a child, watched him grow to promising manhood and his father to high honors. I wrote about Peter's several awards for bravery in combat. Between proof sheet and press time news came that he had died in aerial preinvasion maneuvers over England.

Lt. (j. g.) Charles David Pack, only child of members of the Free Synagogue, was a brilliant youth, who resigned his Washington post of achievement and distinction to enter the Navy. Months later from his small vessel he was rushed to a hospital ship, to a New Zealand base, then to a San Diego base hospital. Shortly thereafter his comrades in arms sorrowfully bade him their last farewell; taps sounded as I recited the Kaddish. The heart-rending final three volleys was the amen.

These boys, and thousands of American comrades on a hundred global fronts, died that American freedoms be preserved and enlarged. Have they died in vain?

Once upon a time—it seems so long ago now—America was but the arsenal of democracy. In those days America did all it could to aid the United Nations, "short of war." In those early days, and even in the critical war days that followed, many Americans were denied work in the arsenal plants of democracy. They were barred because of race, or creed, or color.

Imagine the bitter ironies which enter the hearts of certain American soldiers who now serve, and even die, as war heroes in planes, tanks, and ships built in certain American plants which had denied them jobs before they were called to the colors. Will they, too, have served, and died, in vain?

The zero hour for the invasion of Europe is fast approaching. It may even be upon us when these words reach the reader. Life in England, we're told, "is almost unbearably anxious," for the gigantic combined operations will form the crucial test for western civilization. Will Festung Europa hold firm, or will civilization get a new lease on life when the zero hour comes? But on the civilian front we are long past the zero hour. The home-front battle for the values of peace has long been raging. It is a battle to preserve and enlarge American freedoms. It will not count for much in history's ledger if the men and women in our services, fighting on many military fronts to protect human liberty, will return—many of them maimed in body and mind; others only as memories in broken hearts—to find liberty limited by race, or creed, or color.

At English bases, and elsewhere, our boys are grimly training for the deadly days when they are to sweep forward to victory with their United Nations comrades in arms. At home we, too, must unite with neighbors to prevent enemy propaganda and blind bigotry weakening us through false fractions of race, creed, and color. America's heroes, from the days of the founding fathers to the present bloody hour, must not have died in vain.

They will have died in vain if fascism takes root in America. The imported seed is sown, has been nurtured by Nazi propaganda, is well fertilized by native subversive influences. A test for the reality of American freedom, for proving that fascism has not attained rootage, is the survival of the President's Fair Employment Practice Committee, now under grievous attack by certain political and industrial blocks. The F. E. P. C. has become a symbol of liberation; its survival will be one of the keys to the character of post-war America.

We will need the F. E. P. C. during the demobilization period, which will be measured in years rather than months. Wisdom will have to control the rate of return from military life to civilian activity. It should also certainly call for the extension to returned veterans of fair practice in their reemployment. The F. E. P. C., or the equivalent agency, will be the assurance to all veterans that we will keep the promise made to our fighting men and women that the peace will produce an economic order rich with the "four freedoms," available, without distinction, to all Americans. We will need the F. E. P. C. to ameliorate and control the tensions that will surcharge the transition from war to peace in our industrial life. Many industrialists will find this transition lifting them from "the featherbed of cost-plus profit" into the harsh reality of competitive enterprise, tempting some to return perhaps to unwholesome pre-war practices.

The F. E. P. C. is essential to a complete reconversion plan. If it did not exist, the acute problems that will arise when wartime controls are unwound would make its creation inevitable. Though we failed adequately to plan for the war that a few wise men predicted was inevitable, we dare not fail to plan for the demobilization and peace that all men realize is inevitable.

During the reconversion period, and for a while thereafter, what the English called distressed areas will likely spot the American scene. These may include more than the areas near gigantic industrial plants returning to former peace products, requiring months-long periods of retooling. It will certainly include areas near our mushroomed shipyards, our distended aircraft factories, and especially our nonconvertible munitions works. We built all these to operate our present forced-draft economy, the war blowing the bellows.

Many of the workers in these areas will return to their normal status—housewives to their domestic duties; youths to their schooling; the elderly to their deserved leisure. But the bulk of the workers will need the resources of Government, including the F. E. P. C., to assure equitable distribution of the limited employment opportunities available during the transition period.

As I have pointed out in the Menace of Post-War Unemployment (Congress Weekly, December 31, 1943), the pressures produced by mass unemployment during what we hope will be no more than a flash depression will demand the controls of a regulatory body such as the F. E. P. C.

When Abraham Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation he initiated, on a national scale, a code of fair employment practice. This historic document, born in a state of civil war, remained to a considerable degree solely a pattern for action. When Franklin Roosevelt issued his historic Executive order, nearly 3 years ago, creating the F. E. P. C., he enormously accelerated the achievement of fair employment practices and broadened their scope, to the benefit of all previously afflicted by economic discrimination.

The Emancipation Proclamation was resisted by force of arms. The Executive order is being resisted bitterly by bigoted employers and prejudiced politicians, with procedures only malice can devise. Nonetheless, as we approach the third anniversary of Executive Order No. 8802, real progress is discernible.

The F. E. P. C. has accomplished much that is of benefit to the Nation in our hour of international peril. Every minority group in America has been a beneficiary of its efforts to help achieve democracy in our economic life. Industrial, political, and moral values have been created, of permanent merit. But these intrinsic values, now demonstrably achievable, must be protected and preserved; protected from the political bloc which would destroy it, preserved for the enrichment of the peacetime economy of our country. The F. E. P. C., a hard won prewar gain, must not become a wartime political casualty.

The sweep of passionate prejudice now directed against the F. E. P. C. in and out of Congress, is the measure of its effectiveness. The effort to emasculate and destroy its potentialities must be matched, and then surpassed, by the labors of those Americans who place America's ideal, and its world destiny, above parochial and personal prejudice.

In the face of those who would eliminate the F. E. P. C. now functioning under a wartime Presidential order, we must labor to establish its statutory status as an integral element of our post-war national life. We need an authoritative governmental body that will promote equality of employment opportunity, that will assure equality of compensation, and equalize upgrading on personal merit; all these without un-American screening by race, creed, color, or national origin.

The Commission on Economic Discrimination of the American Jewish Congress, a Jewish pioneer at work in this field for nearly 15 years, realizes the acute political problems the President faces in this critical hour. To preserve and even strengthen the F. E. P. C. is certainly one of his ardent hopes. But we realize the very heavy burdens of state, civil and military, national and international, which bear upon him. We know, too, of the cesspool of prejudice whose stench befouls the cloakrooms of Congress, shocking the public whenever it disgracefully spills out upon the floor of Congress. We have stood appalled at the tangled maze of the present complex political interplay. Hence, though strongly we urge the President and his advisers to make firm and lasting the national policy of fair-employment practice which he projected, we do so with a clear understanding of the disabilities and complexities of the moment.

There are times when haste is best made slowly; when the rate of progress is less important than facing the right direction. The right direction for us as American Jews, as for all Americans, has been toward the American policy of equality of opportunity and the American ideal of fair play.

As American Jews, we do not seek a proportional representation in any industrial plant or any field of economic activity. We reject the principle of a quota standard, no matter how high or favoring it may be. We ask only for fair play; for admittance to a job, or rejection, on the basis of capacity to serve. When an employer, seeking to correct an "imbalance" says, as have some, "Hereafter we will add nothing but Jews to our staff to correct the grievous situation you have called to our attention," we declare emphatically that this new proposal is as unfair—and unwanted by us—as the previous Jewish exclusionist policy. We want all men and women judged on their personal merits, without racial or religious test. The American Constitution prohibits the making of a religious test for public office. We hold that truth to be applicable to employment in any field charged with public interest or public concern. That means all areas of employment, except the circumscribed sectors of sectarian and domestic service.

Some find discouragement today in the mustering of the reactionary elements who are attacking the F. E. P. C. as spearhead and symbol for bringing democracy into our economic life. We rather find this attack a sign of progress, a token of achievement. The opposition is no longer indifferent; it is alarmed at the advance made. No progress, no protest; much progress, many protests. That is the social equation being formulated today. Its significance is hopeful for the future.

Indeed, as has been correctly said, "it may well be that the increased volume of opposition to democratic practice in racial matters in America is being stimulated by the very fact of the disintegration of many of the older racial stereotypes, under the stress of war."

A few legislators in Washington appear determined to destroy the F. E. P. C. Theirs is a painfully partisan and grievously misguided attitude. The great body of Congress realizes more clearly that the work of the F. E. P. C. is of fundamental importance. It is hardly necessary to urge upon them that the budgetary request of the F. E. P. C. now pending before Congress merits full grant. They realize that the F. E. P. C. must not only continue its present wartime program but that it also should be converted into an integral peacetime agency of Government.

The imperious demands of wartime production created the F. E. P. C. The equally imperative demands of full-scale peacetime production should force us to maintain all elements of the population as producers as well as consumers. Men will either be allowed to work and produce their keep or else their consumptive power will be governmentally sustained. Our post-war economy will be unable to survive a multitude of unemployed and disadvantaged peoples.

Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell, Chief of the Army Service Forces, recently declared, "There are not going to be any apple sellers on the street corners after this war if we can prevent it." The primary responsibility of the Army, of course, will be the wounded veterans. "It will help them," said General Somervell, who was head of the W. P. A. in New York City during our last post-war depression, "to become self-reliant, self-supporting members of their communities." The Army will have the cooperation of the Veterans' Administration, the Selective Service, the civil service, and the United States Employment Service.

This admirably conceived program is fine for the wounded veterans, whose number may run into many hundred thousands. Surely the men fortunate enough to come through unscathed, numbering seven millions, will when demobilized deserve similar consideration. They will include about half a million Jewish soldiers, sailors, flyers, and marines, about 1,000,000 Negroes, and a very large number of other minority groups who had been subjected, as peacetime civilians, to employment disabilities because of race, creed, or color.

To assure the successful rehabilitation and reintegration of these nonwounded veterans the F. E. P. C. must be added to the list of governmental agencies above enumerated. In fact, the F. E. P. C. may even be found essential to round out the Government program for rehabilitation of the wounded veterans. In any event the continuance of the F. E. P. C. is so clearly indicated one would feel restrained in belaboring the point if the opposition were not so vociferous and so strongly entrenched. It is therefore essential that we make clear the need of the democratic principle, upon which the F. E. P. C. is based, for our peacetime national economic well-being.

Our wartime economy has demonstrated that the only limit to our productive capacity is manpower. Economists have declared "manpower sets the only upper limit to what the United States can do." To deny ourselves the use of available manpower now—as do plants at present guilty of discrimination—is treason to the war effort. This the F. E. P. C. is effectively laboring to reduce.

To deny ourselves available manpower, through discrimination, during the critical days of conversion to peace production, will be treason to the better America for which our men are fighting. We will need the F. E. P. C., or its Congress created counterpart, to counteract this evil practice, to protect our fighting men when they seek to reenter productive civilian life. More than that, we will need all their productive capacity, all their manpower, to help build that amazingly generous producer-consumer economy which the war production schedules have demonstrated America can achieve.

They are being achieved today through inter-racial, inter-faith, inter-group cooperation on all production fronts. Our men and women at work are taking their cue from our men and women on all fighting fronts.

Those who would deny continuance to the F. E. P. C. would deny fundamental American ideals. They would betray the men and women whose lives are being freely given on our battlefronts. Whether consciously or not, they would promote race hatred and anti-Semitism. Race hatred and anti-Semitism are "blood brothers of fascism." D-day for fascism is swiftly approaching. Festung Europa is reeling under the devastating preparatory blows of our bombers. Fascism, at bitter, bloody cost to us in the lives of American youth, will certainly be destroyed. With the help of the United Nations, it surely will be extirpated from Europe. It must find no rootage in America. Here, too, it must be destroyed. To that holy end we must again, in Lincoln's solemn adjuration, "highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom."

Jury Trial in Property Condemnation Cases

REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMIE L. WHITTEN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in S. 919, providing jury trials in cases where land is taken by the Federal Government, including lands taken for flood control. We were able to pass this bill in the House during the Seventy-seventh Congress, only to have it defeated in the other body. S. 919 has now passed the Senate and we should lose no time in passing it here.

In pressing for passage of this bill providing jury trial of cases where the Government seeks to condemn the property of the landowner for flood control I am impelled by the desire to see that the landowner in these cases may be able to get fair and reasonable pay for his lands if taken from him by force.

It comes close home to me, for in my district large areas were taken by the Government on appraisals and reports of commissioners, and in many instances the landowner has been forced to see his home, his land, and his all taken for an inadequate price.

When I was elected to Congress the Government was putting into operation reservoir flood-control plans, including Sardis and Arkabutla Reservoirs; the lands had been taken and steps made to flood great areas of fertile lands over the protest of the landowners.

In some few cases commissioners' hearings had been had, but payment had not been made. I made trip after trip to the War Department in an effort to secure an increase in price. The War Department, as it seems always to do, would not question the decision of its appraisers. In many cases they claimed the landowners had willingly signed options. Of course, we know that if they did it was because they were faced with condemnation in a commissioner's court. As stated, the bill providing for jury trial passed the House only to fail to pass the Senate. These cases were finally determined, leaving no way to compensate the owner for the real value of his property.

In one instance a whole town was moved. One of the finest small towns in Mississippi, Coldwater, with beautiful homes, old shade trees, and a history in which its inhabitants rightfully took pride, had the property of its citizens over their protest taken at the price of the War Department, with no chance for a jury to determine its value.

Under authority granted it in 1938, 3 years before I became a Member of this body, the War Department plans to further expand its flood-control projects in that area. Of course, the people affected are seriously disturbed, and rightfully so. They sent me thousands of protests, which I placed before the War Department and the President in company with representatives from Water Valley and Enid, Miss. Additional protests were made to the President and to the War Department on the use of manpower and materials during this war emergency for such purpose.

Finally on this basis construction was held up for the duration of the war. The War Department still insists that these dams at Enid and Coffeeville must be built.

The only chance which these citizens have to prevent this construction is that no appropriation for their construction be made. I have assured them that their every protest will be filed with the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a member, and every argument and all evidence against the construction presented. What the chances to protect them are I do not know. If the appropriation cannot be held up they will face the same situation as faced the people in the Sardis and Arkabutla areas in spite of all help.

One of these proposed projects, the Enid Dam, if constructed will take a wide and fertile area of land which normally produces a bale of cotton to the acre. Should the project go through practically all the trade areas of Enid, a small town in my home county, will be taken and the trade of this little town lost. It will also cut deeply into the trade area of Water Valley, one of the most prosperous towns in our section and will cause many of the best citizens of the community to have to abandon their homes.

Another project, the Grenada Dam, if the War Department secures an appropriation, will take a great part of the lands in the Yalobusha and Schuna Valleys, lands of great fertility and production. It will wipe away most of the trade area of Coffeeville, a fine, historic town, and an old established trade center. Waters will be backed to the very limits and into this town. Taxes will be lost and the outstanding bonds placed on the remaining lands. These projects have been held up for the duration of the war, but with the authority already granted in 1938 and the War Department determined, no one can say what the future holds.

For over 2 years I have worked persistently to get some relief for the landowners in the Arkabutla and Sardis area. I have tried to get some hearing and some consideration for them. The Senate failed to pass the jury trial bill, the War Department refused to do anything, and the committees of Congress cannot go behind the decision of the commissioner's court. S. 919 should be passed so that the property owner would have an opportunity to secure the real value of his property.

There is another very unfair result from the construction of the Arkabutla and Sardis Reservoirs before-mentioned Many thousands of acres of land were taken off the tax rolls. In Panola, De Soto, Lafayette, and Marshall Counties particularly, did this work a great hardship. The various supervisors' districts had outstanding indebtedness as well as the various school districts and other taxing districts. The Federal Government did not pay off any of such bonds. This meant that these bonds were placed on the lands remaining in these districts and thereby the tax rate increased. This action has seriously crippled local government and makes it nearly impossible for them to operate.

In Benton, Tippah, and Marshall, Union, and Yalobusha Counties lands were taken for other Federal purposes, all before I became a Member of this body. In none of those cases were any of the outstanding bonds paid off and a tremendous hardship has been placed on the county governments and on the people.

Sometime ago I introduced a bill providing that in all those cases the Federal Government would be required to pay off a share of the bonds outstanding of any taxing district in which it took lands in the same proportion that the value of the lands taken had to the lands in such taxing district.

This bill is now before the Public Lands Committee, and with the support it has I believe it should be and will be enacted into law.

I sincerely trust that the House of Representatives will pass S. 919 and H. R. 4515, which I have discussed. Give to the people and to local government the rights to which they are entitled.

If the American citizen is guaranteed the right of trial by jury when charged with a criminal offense; if individuals in a suit at common law where the amount in controversy is $20 or more are guaranteed a jury trial; if the individual landowner who has his property taken for an Army camp, a naval base, or for the erection of a post office or other Federal buildings has the right of trial by jury to fix his damages or compensation, how can there be any excuse for refusing such right of jury trial to his neighbor who has his property taken not to further the war effort but to improve other lands? To refuse to such individuals the right to a jury trial is to deny to them equal rights under the law. I cannot believe the membership of this House believes in such unfair treatment.

I do not know what the future holds, but I do know that in removing a man from his home many things aside from the simple sales value of the lands must be considered. The fact that he has become sentimentally attached to the lands, that he knows his neighbors, he has his church connection, his family are buried in the nearby cemetery, his children know the other children in the school, and that it has been the home of his father, his mother, and his forefathers all endear the old home to him.

Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!

These are matters that jurors with like feeling and like surroundings will consider, matters that Government appraisers and commissioners may not see and they are matters that in the eventual long run the Government should allow to be paid.

In other words, being elected by these people and living as we do in a land of government of the people, by the people, and for the people, I feel that I would be remiss in my duty should I not make the strongest fight possible for the interest of these, my people, and do all within my power to save for them the thing most dear to them, their homes.

Sewell Avery Versus the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including the third of the series of articles appearing in the Chicago Sun under the title of "Sewell Avery Versus the People." This article, which appeared in the May 17, 1944, issue, is entitled "Ward Sit-Down Strike Against Labor Peace Told in W. L. B. Records," and is as follows:

WARD SIT-DOWN STRIKE AGAINST LABOR PEACE TOLD IN W. L. B. RECORDS

(Third of a series)

WASHINGTON, May 16.—Records of the National War Labor Board and of Federal courts in the District of Columbia make it plain that Sewell Lee Avery and his Montgomery Ward & Co., are on a sit-down strike against the Government's program for labor-management peace on a cooperative basis.

One of the best illustrations can be drawn from the record of the W. L. B. hearing conducted here on January 20 in connection with the dispute at Ward's Hummer Manufacturing Co., subsidiary in Springfield, Ill. The hearing developed a union charge that Avery's firm had declared it would not comply with the W. L. B.'s directive in the case unless it were compelled to do so.

John A. Barr, Avery's labor relations counsel who represented the company at this hearing, did not bother to deny the charge when it was made by H. A. Schrader, spokesman for the International Association of Machinists (A. F. of L.). Referring to meetings between the Hummer management and the union, Schrader told the board:

"* * * The company in these conferences had told the union that they would absolutely not comply with the National Labor Board directive, they would have to be compelled to comply. * * *"

That unchallenged statement explains why Avery and Wards have more disputed cases pending before the W. L. B. than any other American company or corporation.

It also explains the tactics by which Avery and Montgomery Ward have kept cases before the Board for more than 2 years. These time-consuming tactics have cost the American people thousands of dollars in direct governmental expenditures — the exact amount cannot be determined—and much in the way of lowered morale.

Delay in settlement of labor cases causes unrest, brings on strike threats and spreads the germ of disaffection throughout the country.

Take, for example, the eight Montgomery Ward cases, out of 22 pending, in which the W. L. B. has issued final directives. These cases came to Washington from all sections of the Nation—Denver, Detroit, New York, Portland, Oreg., St. Paul, Minn., Oakland, Calif., San Rafael, Calif., Springfield, Ill., as well as Chicago. They involved approximately 7,000 of the men and women who last year helped Avery to net a cool $20,677,098 profit for his company, on net sales of $595,932,821.

Three of the eight cases have been before the W. L. B. since 1942, the remainder since the spring of 1943. But the origin of the disputes, in most instances, goes back much further, to the days when Avery defied the National Recovery Administration and the National Labor Relations Board.

While these eight cases have ground slowly toward final decision, Ward's attorneys have been burbling Avery's assertions of the illegality of Government action and his protestations of a fundamental friendship toward unionism, like a broken phonograph record.

And when the W. L. B. was able finally to reach a decision in these eight cases, Avery's attorneys hurried into Federal courts of the District of Columbia seeking injunctions to prevent enforcement of five of the decisions. These suits are still pending.

In the other three cases the W. L. B. decisions have been of such recent date that the company as yet has not indicated what its course will be. But the Avery reliance on the delay which can be generated through the courts is not likely to be overlooked, officials believe.

As Avery's legal labor expert, Barr, observed at the W. L. B. hearing on January 20 in the Hummer case:

"Let's remember that the courts are established by the law and not by the people."

The list of the eight cases reveals the motive behind Avery's sit-down strike—his implacable determination not to grant union security to the employees of Montgomery Ward and unwillingness to extend to them the arbitration rights enjoyed by two-thirds of American industry.

The case came to the W. L. B. on June 2, 1942, after the Rt. Rev. Francis J. Haas, now bishop of Grand Rapids, Mich., acting as Federal conciliator, had been rebuffed by Avery in attempts to bring the company into agreement with the United Mail Order, Warehouse, and Retail Employees Union (C. I. O.).

The union won a partial victory in the first round, a 5-cent-an-hour increase in wages—a third of what it had asked—after unanimous action of an investigating panel had been ratified by the W. L. B.

Ward's accepted that, but when the panel came up with an unanimous O. K. of union security, arbitration, and seniority rights, the company's lawyers went into action. They challenged the Board's jurisdiction, on the ground the company was not in war production. The Board, nevertheless, took jurisdiction on June 26, 1942, ruling that Ward's was engaged in work "which contributes to effective prosecution of the war."

At that point, Sewell Avery had the choice of accepting the decisions of the Board, set up to deal with wartime labor disputes, or continuing his private war against labor unions. He chose the latter, and continued to insist that everything the Board did was illegal.

He did concede, however, that he would accept the Board's order if directed to do so by the President. President Roosevelt, on November 18, 1942, issued such an order, and Avery negotiated a contract with the union.

But when he sat down to sign it on November 30, the company incorporated a statement that it was being signed under duress and only because the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief in time of war, had expressly ordered that the union security clauses be included.

The union refused to sign a contract containing such a disclaimer, and wired the W. L. B. for support to enforce its original directive. The W. L. B. proposed a liberal compromise, which Avery spurned.

On December 12, the President again directed the company to comply with the Board's order, and Avery yielded. The agreement was finally signed on December 8, for a period of one year.

Thus the pattern of Avery's resistance to the Federal Government was set. When the contract was about to expire, Avery served notice that it was canceling the agreement, and upon its expiration challenged the claims of the union that had represented a majority of Ward employees. From there on the facts leading to the seizure are well known.

The union now is approximately on the position it was on June 2, 1942, again moving into position to get a contract with Ward's.

W. L. B. rulings in the Chicago case were setting precedents for Ward's on the issues involved—seniority, arbitration, wages, union security and the jurisdiction of the W. L. B.

But despite these rulings, which established an over-all policy for Ward employees everywhere, Avery refused to extend the Chicago terms to other Ward plants, with the result that their unions were compelled to come to the W. L. B. to obtain the rights to which the Chicago rulings entitled them.

Virtually identical issues were raised in the joint case of the Denver-Detroit-New York plants which reached the Board on December 15, 1942, the St. Paul case certified on February 13, 1943, the Portland case certified on February 18, 1943, the Oakland case, certified March 26, 1943, the San Rafael case, certified April 19, 1943, and the Hummer case brought before the Board on August 11, 1942.

On the principles established in the Chicago case, the Board began reaching approximately identical conclusions in the new cases, but under the situation which Avery had created, each case had to be handled separately with protracted and costly hearings and with individual opportunities for ingenuity in causing delay.

These delays weighed more heavily on the unions than on Avery and Montgomery Ward, who had originated this form of legal obstructionism.

After hearing the broken Avery phonograph record again and again, the Board's feeling was epitomized by Emil Rieve, a labor member, who broke into one of Barr's circuitous arguments at a hearing early this year to say:

"I am getting a little sick of sitting here and listening to representatives of the company putting on record misleading and lying statements, and they know it, when they called this form of union security a form of closed shop, when they mention arbitration on any issue that the union may raise. They don't say that the company also may raise any issue. They are lying and they know it and I don't think we ought to waste our time with that type of misrepresentation."

Nevertheless, the Board already is in the process of handling 12 other Ward controversies which have been certified on issues that have already been decided.

These involve plants at Cheyenne, Wyo.; Albuquerque, N. Mex.; East St. Louis, Ill.; Washington, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; Trenton, N. J.; Kansas City, Kans.; Pueblo, Colo.; Barre, Vt.; Oakland, Calif.; Menands, N. Y.; and, of course, the still unsettled renewal of the Chicago case.

Avery and Montgomery Ward operate 8 mail-order houses and 631 retail stores and warehouses. If Avery brings cases on each of these units up to the Board 1 by 1 his expensive legal staff need fear no post-war depression.

Flood Damage in Nebraska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce will come to the House shortly by way of conference from the Senate. This bill will include appropriations for our Weather Bureau. Among items in this bill are those which include funds for carrying out the Flash Flood Weather Warning Service, which I sponsored some years ago and over which there has been some discussion. I call the attention of the House to the fact that in my district we have had disastrous floods resulting in great property damage and in many cases loss of life.

One of these disastrous floods occurred in my district and apparently concentrated in my home town of Norfolk, Nebr., early last Friday morning, May 12, resulting in approximately $1,500,000 damage; covering the entire business section and much of the residential section; necessitated the evacuation of 400 persons and resulted in the injury of several people.

I call your attention to this disaster in my home town and district in order to assure Members that their vote in favor of the appropriation for the relief of flood victims, passed only a few days ago, was not only timely but meritorious. I also bring this matter before you in order to urge an unanimity in the passage of appropriations for the Weather Bureau, especially, to continue the Flash Flood Weather Warning Service, which, in my opinion, resulted in the saving of some lives, the saving of some livestock and some property due to advance information of the coming of this flood through the representatives of the Weather Bureau who are engaged in this important work.

The flood at Norfolk, Nebr., and the surrounding territory resulted from heavy rains and the overflowing of the Elkhorn and North Fork Rivers and although certain precautions have been taken in that area by the organization of drainage districts, I feel, Mr. Speaker, that this matter should be brought to the attention of the Committee on Flood Control in order that some invesigation can be made by the Army engineers to give the officials in my district the value of the expert advice of the flood-control organization of our Government so that some development can be started immediately to prevent the recurrence of these floods. Considerable legislation has been passed by this House in connection with flood control in the Missouri River Basin and I feel some investigation should be made immediately in order that similar legislation can be developed for the alleviation of these continued damages done by the floods which occur frequently in the Elkhorn Valley and elsewhere throughout the Third Congressional District of Nebraska. I have taken these matters up with the chairman of the Committee on Flood Control and other Members of the House who have to do with flood control and also with the Army engineers. I feel that the organizations we have set up can be of some assistance to the city, town, county, and State officials so that some immediate action can be initiated in order to assure the people in my district that preventative measures can and will be taken to assure them that similar disastrous floods will be controlled.

The loss at Norfolk, Nebr., will be virtually complete, in my opinion, due to the fact that partically every basement in the business section of the city was flooded and most of the stock stored in the basements were either destroyed or damaged beyond salvaging. I am informed that very little flood damage insurance was carried. From the information given to me from my home town on the morning during the flood, it was not uncommon for residents to see in their yards pounds of coffee, oranges, grapefruit, chick food, telephone poles, oil cans, oil barrels and cans of various products cluttering up their lawns. This indicates the great damage which was done by the flood to necessary foods and supplies in one community.

There were many instances of heroism displayed by the men and women in this flooded area. There were many thrilling rescues. I am sure the House of Representatives will be interested to know that the Red Cross organizations, both the men and women workers, the physicians, the city officials and volunteers worked as a unit in order to safeguard life, health, and saw to the feeding of the evacuated citizens and participated in many other activities in bringing relief and comfort. This was carried out in such a manner as to bring great credit upon those individuals and officials who worked untold hours during a community crisis. I cannot refrain, Mr. Speaker, from complimenting the Federal Communications Commission for granting immediate permission to the Radio Station WJAG at Norfolk, Nebr., for unlimited time to broadcast warnings and information regarding this flood. I am informed through authoritative sources that this radio station, being flooded out at its regular studios, moved its facilities to the location of its transmitting station on higher ground and from that location informed the people throughout the territory of the conditions of the flood and in many cases was responsible in preventing the loss of life and property.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that we should not only continue the Flash Flood Weather Warning Service which was inaugurated in my district but that we should expand it in such way as to make it available to all of the citizens who are affected occasionally by these flash floods in order that they can be given ample warning for the purpose of saving life and property by advance information.

Mr. Speaker, two flood control or flood relief bills have been passed by this House. One is House Joint Resolution 280 which appropriates $15,000,000 to provide assistance to farmers whose property was destroyed or damaged by floods in 1944 in order to enable them to continue farming operations to produce food for the war effort. Another is H. R. 4793 which authorizes appropriations of $12,000,000 to provide for emergency flood-control work made necessary by recent floods. Both of these measures were passed by this body at about the time the communities in my district were being ravaged by the flood waters of the Norfolk and Elkhorn Rivers. Both pieces of legislation will be of valuable assistance to my district. However, this legislation has not yet been passed by the Senate, and I am making these brief remarks in order to call attention of the Congress to the time element involved and the necessity of having this legislation completed and made into law.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation I have referred to should bring temporary relief to my district but it is necessary and should be enacted into law as soon as possible.

My interest also is centered upon some permanent work on the Elkhorn and Northfork Rivers through the Army engineers. I believe a survey should be made as soon as possible in order that this section of my district can be brought into new and proposed permanent flood-control legislation. It is for that reason I have taken the matter up with the Army engineers and also with the Honorable WILL WHITTINGTON, Chairman of the House Committee on Flood Control. I have received sympathetic attention to my requests for a survey and report which I am sure the people in my district who have suffered much as the result of these floods will appreciate.

Address of Vice Admiral Randall Jacobs, United States Navy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Vice Admiral Randall Jacobs, United States Navy, the Chief of Naval Personnel, before the seventh annual dinner of the Massachusetts Council of Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, Boston, Mass., May 11, 1944:

I am glad to be here tonight and to find myself in such distinguished company. As I understand it, your council exists to foster good will among various religious groups. You work to create mutual understanding, convinced that the old enmities, the old hostilities, will dissolve if men of good will only take the trouble to know each other. It is an example that is sorely needed and I wish you continued success. Your meeting tonight is an island of harmony and reasonableness in a cantankerous world. I congratulate you on your intellectual courage in facing an old and troublesome issue with the determination to do something about it. To find Catholics, Protestants, and Jews searching out what they have in common should of course occasion no surprise—it is the kind of conduct we might well expect in any land that pretends to be civilized and emotionally mature. Yet we know this is a relatively new idea. You in this council are giving a demonstration of joint endeavor that can't help but inspire imitation. You are countering the flow of malice and bitterness by putting new and healthier ideas into the national thought-stream.

I am not a psychologist, and would not pretend to know how religious prejudices are born and nourished. I suspect that these old distrusts are deep rooted and have the durability of weeds. Many of us not only protect our prejudices with considerable care but cherish them. Perhaps the best most of us ever do is to admit the other fellow's right to be dead wrong. To displace intolerance, to substitute the spirit of live-and-let-live, will take the efforts of our best minds and most stalwart leaders. It is ironic, of course, that so many of history's ugliest chapters have been written because of religious persecution and in the blood of men who believed themselves exclusively enlightened.

It would be pointless to deny that bitterness over religion still exists in this country and can still be provoked into flame. Archbishop Spellman has remarked with deep concern that bigotry in some ways seems more widespread and virulent now than ever before. No one need be reminded of the disgraceful symptoms. The excitement of war may contribute to this. There is inevitably a lot of loud talk and loose thinking. The atmosphere is highly charged, nerves are worn thin.

We are, nevertheless, making visible progress. We are getting away from the idea—and it has been a tenacious one—that men of different religions must inevitably be natural enemies. We have reached a stage where some of the burning issues of the past seem not only disgraceful but preposterous.

We find it fantastic to read that in one of our most enlightened States a man once could attend Quaker meetings only on pain of having his ears cut off. We read with mingled disgust and amusement how the president of a great college once was compelled to resign on the charge—made with great heat—that he was a Baptist. The State was Massachusetts. The college was Harvard.

But I did not come here tonight to speak in generalities about intolerance and religious persecution. Instead, I thought I would tell you some things that come under my scrutiny as the Chief of Naval Personnel. They concern a side of Navy life that has a direct bearing on the problem in which you are interested. We have a Navy today of about 3,000,000 men and women. The striking truth is that we shall shortly have almost as many craft, of all kinds, as we had officers and men in 1933. Now, 3,000,000 make up a considerable population group. The statisticians need far less than that to get an adequate cross-section of the entire Nation. And this is a diverse group, too, coming from every corner of the country, every conceivable family background. We have men from the most devout and orthodox of homes; we have men of every possible denomination and every conceivable variation of religious beliefs and customs. I thought it might be of real interest to you to hear how this works out, since it is very closely connected with the goals you have set for this council.

There are parents who have wondered, I imagine, whether their son is given the kind of religious services in the Navy that he found at home, services in accordance with his training. Some may have feared men in the service would have to be content with some sore of amalgamated, all-purpose religion that would attempt to fit all faiths. A kind of spiritual emergency ration, in other words, I want to quiet any such fears. There is no such wartime makeshift. On the contrary, I believe many of the home front would be mildly astonished and greatly pleased to see how closely religious life even in the forward action areas corresponds to the same thing at home. No man is ever asked to attend services other than his own; no man is ever invited to alter his allegiance. The Navy chaplains scrupulously respect a man's right to be anything he pleases. That is the whole keynote of the Navy's religious program—respect and deference for the other fellows right to be different.

The Navy does not attempt to compose religious differences; the Navy is not interested in finding some kind of a religious compromise or middle ground. We recognize that differences exist and do our level best to honor them. Chaplains work as hard to provide services for men of other faiths as they do for their own. The Protestant chaplain who finds himself responsible for Catholic and Jewish men makes it a point of honor to provide services for them, as well as for men of his own faith. As an instance of consideration for the other man's views, I might cite the fact that the military ordinariate of the Roman Catholic Church prefers having Catholic chaplains called chaplain rather than father. This is out of consideration for the Protestant boy who might want to talk to a clergyman and yet finds the unfamiliar word "father" a trifle embarrassing. Of course, I might add that the men themselves are likely to solve such problems in much simpler fashion—all the chaplains are likely to be called padre; nor do the men seem much concerned about which chaplain it is who writes letters for them, ministers to the wounded, or gets that pay account straightened out. A shaving kit provided by a Catholic chaplain, they tell me, will cut off Presbyterian whiskers as well as one provided by a Presbyterian.

It isn't always easy to provide services for all three major groups, but the chaplains do their best, and their best is very good. They are versed in all kinds, as I shall mention later. Indeed, our Director of Chaplains, Capt. Robert D. Workman, recently was given an honorary degree of doctor of divinity by the Jewish Institute of Religion, and Captain Workman is a good Presbyterian. Of course, the men themselves are a lot of help when a chaplain gets in a tight spot.

One of our Catholic chaplains found himself in an advance marine base where he had no chance of finding a Protestant chaplain for his Protestant charges. The good father, there in the wilds of Oceania, was perfectly competent to produce a good grade of Protestant church service but he labored under one handicap. The hymns were strange to him, and he worried a little about getting the music started. Fortunately, it turned out he had a couple of good bull-voiced baritones in the crowd who sang so sturdily the chaplain's own halting performance couldn't be heard anyway. But one Sunday morning as the chaplain took his place before the congregation he saw to his dismay that his two song leaders were missing. And to his chagrin, the chaplain could not for the life of him remember how the opening hymn began. He stood there in growing embarrassment. There was a moment of silence. Then a Texas voice sang out a word of encouragement from the rear of the congregation. "That's all right, preacher," the marine called out, "We'll take care of the singing—you just give us hell."

I think you would be stirred by the men's eagerness for church services, and the ingenuity they show in building altars even in the wilderness. It has been said there are no atheists in fox holes. However, that is, we know that church attendance in the Navy is large, even when services must be conducted under conditions of extreme difficulty. Services are held so close to the enemy that the men on watch dare not bow their heads to pray. On many of our fighting ships a prayer is standard preparation for battle. On a famous carrier, with planes warming up on the flight deck, the skipper asked the chaplain to pray over the bull horn. It was a devout prayer, and a humble one, but it was certainly audible. The chaplain's words were amplified so much that men in vessels a mile away could say "Amen."

At times services must be conducted during antiaircraft firing, with the men covering their ears and opening their mouths as the guns speak. Services have been conducted in shipyards, with the chaplain trying to make himself heard above the clamor of riveting machines. Services are conducted with enemy planes all but overhead and enemy submarines hoping to ram home a torpedo any minute. The pews may be ammunition boxes, the pulpit a mess table. One outfit has a set of chimes—made from large caliber antiaircraft shells. Yet you would never doubt the sincerity of this worship, and you would be impressed I think, to see how carefully services in the action areas duplicate services at home. The hymns are the familiar hymns, and I shouldn't wonder but what the sermons are a little familiar, too. There is one difference, and I may as well make a clean breast of it. Aboard ship one familiar Sunday morning feature is missing. We don't take up the collection. I have to report that we get little or no complaint about this omission.

I would not conceal from you that many a chaplain has entered the service troubled deeply about what will happen to his own religious beliefs. Many have wondered whether they can retain their own faith and still minister, as they must, to men of other faiths. I know of an orthodox Rabbi who had grave misgivings on this score. I am proud to say he finished the chaplains' school glowing with enthusiasm. He found not the slightest necessity, he said, for diluting his own convictions. "Not only were differences taken for granted," he said later, "but with the proverbial 57 varieties of religious denominations represented, each group was expected to be different * * * differences were not the exception but the norm. The basic philosophy was harmony, not uniformity. An ideal relationship was cultivated because we all sought to understand and appreciate the spiritual values and religious symbols of our colleagues."

No one in the Chaplain Corps, in other words, need ever compromise his conscience. On the other hand, the men who train at the Chaplains' School in Williamsburg, Va., do learn a great deal about other religious customs. The chaplains live in double rooms there, and they are assigned space not according to their denomination but in the order of reporting for duty. Thus any combination may be found in any room—Catholic and Jew, United Brethren and Unitarian, and so on. Many lasting friendships are made. They learn mutual respect, they learn how to live together in harmony, and if they didn't learn anything else they would learn how to get along without stepping on the other fellow's feelings. They learn to cooperate, as someone has aptly said, without compromise.

I do not pretend to know what the terrible and often inspiring experiences of this war will to the 9,000 clergymen serving as Army and Navy chaplains. That is for deeper minds than mine. I do know that the chaplains are doing a wonderful job and that many a skipper considers his chaplain the single most important officer aboard, for the hope and the strength the chaplain can impart to the men. The way the chaplains are conducting themselves, the bravery and devotion they are showing, is writing a deeply moving chapter of this war. The churches owe them—all churches owe them—a great debt of gratitude. Organized religion couldn't possibly have representatives—I almost said "demonstrators"—whose services are more appreciated, who stand higher in the eyes of the men. They are ministering to our fighting men in the fullest, finest sense of the word "minister." Their help will not soon be forgotten. Along with winning respect they are winning real affection. In one battle, the chaplain and the dentist manned a forward dressing station. The men joked afterward that—for a couple of ill-assorted amateurs—they made a great team. "The dentist patched up the wounds," they said, "and the chaplain prayed that the dentist was doing the right thing."

Just what new wisdom these hundreds of battle-tempered chaplains will bring back with them I don't know, although it is an interesting subject for speculation. They have seen humanity at its worst and at its amazing best, on the invasion beaches, under attack by bombing planes, and in the terrible, clear light of star shells. I think it may give the chaplains a depth of understanding that will greatly enrich our national thinking. And I cannot believe men of their experience ever will lend themselves to the petty bickering of small-minded bigots.

By the same token, I think the officers and men are learning a great deal about the good that is common to all religious faiths. The Methodist from Iowa who forms a firm friendship with a Catholic from Baltimore is going to be hard to convince that Catholics are something sinister. The Catholic from Chicago who flies in the same plane with a Jewish boy from Brooklyn is not going to become a Jew-baiter. I hope "antis" of all kind will find slim pickings among our returning servicemen. They may give us a needed transfusion of good will. You might be interested in a heart-warming episode that took place in the naval training station, Newport, R. I., last winter. Christmas Eve, and Christmas Day, naturally found many men with duties to perform. More than 500 Jewish men stepped in, gave up their free time, to take over the duties of tha^ many of their Christian shipmates, so the Catholics and Protestants might attend Christmas services. The Jewish men in many instances took over 8-hour watches. The suggestion came from a Jewish chaplain, and the men did this voluntarily, simply out of respect for the other man's religion. That is something finer and more concrete than mere negative tolerance.

The years ahead may very well be the most portentous in our history. We need all our national strength, we need cool heads and calm judgment. It is encouraging to see a group like yours, searching for the things which may unify us, so we may go forward as one Nation, indivisible.

A year ago you had as your guest the late Frank Knox, a former resident of Boston who always had a warm spot in his heart for this city. He is lost to us now. I know you share my sadness at his passing. Frank Knox was a man to whom patriotism was something more than a pleasant emotion. Every ounce of his energy, every bit of his ability, was his country's to command. There were no "ifs" or "buts" about it, he made no selfish reservations, he held nothing back. He was no summer patriot, no part-time American. He was an American who really worked at it. The country could use more of his fine spirit.

The Montgomery Ward Seizure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, the hundreds of letters I have received from my district protesting the seizure of Montgomery Ward are clear evidence that the people of this country are fully aware of the threat to our constitutional liberties inherent in such an arbitrary, dictatorial abuse of wartime powers. The people of the Nation well realize that over and beyond the immediate implications of this unwarranted action is the danger that in similar fashion could all our freedoms be abridged and no one be protected from enforced submission to a dictatorial will.

For this reason it is essential that Congress thoroughly investigate the Montgomery Ward seizure and clarify completely the powers which have been given to the Chief Executive in the interest of speedy prosecution of the war. Such an investigation should make clear that there has been no delegation of power which would warrant such total disregard of our constitutional guaranties. I know that the American people are ready and willing to undergo any suffering and privation necessary to bring this war to a speedy conclusion, but I know also that they will not silently submit to defiance of the republican principles our boys are giving their very lives to defend.

I should like to call to the attention of the Members of Congress the following editorial from the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel. It seems to me that this editorial points up the most important question involved in the Montgomery Ward affair; that is, the preservation of the Constitution, which, in turn, means the preservation of the three independent branches of our Government. Surely, when the Attorney General suggests that "The court should not substitute its judgment for that of the Executive," he is making an unequivocal demand that we disregard forever the Constitution of the United States.

The editorial follows:

IT IS HAPPENING HERE

Today, this Nation is perilously close to the end of its period of existence as a representative Republic.

The scheme by which this may be accomplished is emerging, and the shape of it is becoming clear, as the struggle between the new forces of autocracy and those of the Republic reaches a tense climax in the neighboring city of Chicago.

If you doubt that, you have only to watch what is transpiring.

Adolf Hitler has his Himmler.

Mussolini had his roving castor-oil squadrons.

Lenin had his Trotsky and his Stalin.

When the initial phase of the battle of Montgomery Ward's was ended the other day with the military coup d'etat, President Roosevelt sent down to Chicago the man who is in the Cabinet as Attorney General of the United States.

It could be that Mr. Biddle has had, all along, the conviction that he was writhing in the womb of destiny, and that one day his time would come.

At least, something was a-borning in Chicago, and Mr. Biddle was there. This was to be his hour.

What he had to say at the hearing before the Federal district judge leaves no further doubt about what the Washington oligarchy intends to do.

And what it intends to do, it will do—unless the Nation's people, who have been drugged with fake promises and phony talk and poisonous theories for the last decade, rise up in some new-found wrath and seize the Government back into their own hands, where it belongs.

Mr. Biddle is more candid than his superior. He minces no words.

The scheme is clear in his own mind, and he knows where he's going—and how.

"Particularly in time of war," said the Attorney General, "the court should not substitute its judgment for that of the Executive."

He was addressing Federal Judge Holly. He was telling Judge Holly that he no longer had jurisdiction. That the war had transcended all civil rights guarantied by the American Constitution.

He was telling him that the courts, in time of war, should be powerless; that they must subjugate their will to the will of the President.

This is Mr. Biddle's own construction.

He knows the Constitution grants no such authority; that it makes no provision for a fuehrer who is to be supreme in time of war.

He knows that for America to concede such a point would be to admit that the Constitution was a scrap of paper. He knows that the courts were created by the Constitution to protect the people against just such men as Mr. Biddle and Mr. Roosevelt and all the others of the oligarchy.

He knows it, but apparently doesn't care.

Listen again:

"The President," said Biddle, "has a great constitutional reserve of power. * * * No business or property is immune to his order."

Mr. Biddle has forgotten which constitution he's talking about.

Germany has a constitution, too. So does Russia. So did Italy.

And under them, Mr. Hitler and Mr. Stalin have (and Mr. Mussolini did have) a great "reserve of constitutional power"—a reserve backed by the bayonets of their armies.

Our own American Constitution says, clearly, that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Note, also, Mr. Biddle's final sentence above: "No business or property is immune to his order."

The Attorney General is not only placing his own construction on the laws which Congress has passed. He is trying to make his own laws, and trusting that somehow he can make them stick.

So, no business or property is safe from confiscation by any platoon of soldiers, acting on Presidential order. Mr. Biddle says so, and if we agree to this construction of the law, it is so.

That, of course, is government by Executive fiat.

It is government, not by law, but by the bayonet.

Let's look further.

Mr. Biddle says that the President had a right to seize the Montgomery Ward store because: The War Labor Disputes Act does not specifically forbid him to do so; and, that Congress intended to include retail stores among those businesses which could be seized by the President, but neglected to do so.

Such reasoning as this is so specious, so asinine, and yet smacks so much of the reasoning of European dictators that it is as frightening as it is unbelievable.

By such vicious standards, the President can do anything that no law specifically forbids him to do. That covers a lot of territory; it covers enough that the President could, on the basis of it, take dictatorial control of the whole country at his whim.

Mr. Biddle's prattle about what Congress intended to do exposes the New Deal mind for what it is—a mind warped to the will of the leader who considers that both the judicial and legislative branches of our Government should be, and indeed are, subsidiary to the Chief Executive.

Mr. Biddle would at once be lawmaker and judge. He would make the laws that are expedient, and he would interpret those that are already passed, to suit himself and the leader. (The German word for leader is fuehrer.)

He would put words into the mouths of the people's Congress and read into a law an intent that is clearly not present, and obviously never intended to be present.

Mr. Roosevelt has reached the place where he thinks his word is the law, and feels the time has come to put his belief to the test. Mr. Biddle in the last few tumultuous days has been doing the spade work.

He is now standing by for destiny.

In Memoriam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein In Memoriam written by Maj. Manfred A. Pakas, a resident of my congressional district:

IN MEMORIAM

(By Major Pakas)

On May 30 America celebrates Memorial Day, the day set apart when Americans pay tribute to the illustrious dead who sacrified their all that this Nation might live.

Reverently, gratefully, we decorate the graves of those who gave their last full measure of devotion that the people of the United States might enjoy peace, security, freedom, and the pursuit of happiness.

We cannot hold the rights of liberty unless we accept the responsibilities of liberty. We cannot exercise the privileges of freedom unless we assume the obligations of freedom.

These priceless inheritances must be safeguarded zealously—held inviolate for future generations. We, the living, are trustees charged by the dead with the sacred duty of preserving and protecting our precious liberty. This glorious birthright must pass on, untarnished and intact, to the world of tomorrow.

Americans and all who have declared their intention of becoming citizens, emulate the noble example of those we honor on Memorial Day. Solemnly resolve to dedicate your loyalty to the perpetuation of our country and its institutions.

Pronounce proudly your allegiance to the United States.

Renounce absolutely fealty to any other government.

Denounce unequivocally any invasion of the rights and privileges we sacredly cherish.

In memory of the debt we owe, let us consecrate our lives anew to the sublime task of carrying the torch our forefathers kindled to shed the light of liberty amidst the darkness of a war-torn world.

"To you from failing hands we throw
The torch; be yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields."

Legion G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting here an address of Hon. HARRY P. JEFFREY of Ohio, delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System on a Nation-wide hook-up, at Washington, D. C., on May 16, 1944.

The address follows:

Several weeks ago I received a letter from a soldier in a far-away land. In substance he wrote: "We have been hearing about this G. I. bill of rights for veterans. But what is it? What will it do for us?" More recently I received a letter from a mother asking the same questions.

Today in most homes throughout this broad land there is a vacant chair at the dining-room table. These represent a youth or a man and in some cases a girl, a son, a husband or daughter, who have forsaken family and fireside in the defense of their country. Some day, and please God it may be soon, the young manhood and womanhood of America will return. And so I would like to talk especially to those who are fighting our battles for us and to their parents, wives and families.

The purpose of this G. I. bill of rights is to enable the returning veteran to help himself. It proposes to help him back to school, to a job, to the ownership of a home or a farm. The need arises the day he is mustered out. This measure, it is hoped, will bridge the gap between separation from service and the return to a place in the home community.

The inspiration for this comprehensive measure was furnished by the American Legion. It is endorsed both by the Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

What does the bill provide? Our first duty is to the disabled veteran. The injured, the maimed, and the sick must be our first consideration. The very first title of the bill seeks to insure such care. The Senate bill authorized $500,000,000 for the construction of additional hospital facilities. The House bill threw out this restriction. It inserted—and I quote—"such sums as may be necessary." No less can or should be done.

The bill also authorizes the Army and Navy to turn over to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs all hospital buildings, equipment, and supplies no longer needed.

Equally important, the Veterans' Administration is declared an essential war agency, entitled to priorities second only to the Army and Navy both for personnel and materials. Such priority status is needed for the building of hospitals and, perhaps even more, to staff them with doctors, nurses, and attendants.

Next after the country's obligation to the disabled is that to young men and women whose schooling was interrupted by war service and to those in need of a refresher or retraining course to enable them to pick up the tools of civilian employment.

In the judgment of many this education title is the most important section of the bill—important alike to the servicemen and to the country as a whole. Give our returning veterans the opportunity to finish their educations or equip themselves to follow a trade or a business, and the problem of readjustment to civilian life will be measurably solved.

The G. I. bill provides for 1 year of education for every veteran who served at least 3 months and whose education was interrupted or impeded by service. In addition, every veteran who satisfactorily completes this year of work in a college, university, or training school is entitled to receive additional education for a period equal to his period of service but not exceeding 3 additional years.

Many servicemen may not wish to return to school for more education. Many of these, however, will be in need of a retraining or refresher course for their former trade or business. For these the bill very wisely provides a year of training. During this period of training they may better equip themselves for farming, radio, airplane, and automotive work or in whatever field they may desire.

While these veterans are receiving education or training the Government will pay tuition fees to the school of their choice up to $500 for each school year. In addition it will give them an allowance of $50 per month if single and $75 to the veteran with dependents. The Veterans' Administration estimates that perhaps 1 out of every 10 will seek additional education or technical training. If we have twelve to fifteen million returning veterans, more than a million will be afforded the finest type of preparation for self-help, will be helped to bridge the gap with permanent benefit to themselves.

Many returning servicemen will not need or desire additional training, but they will want to establish a home, buy a farm, or engage in business. For them the bill provides loans.

As reported to the House the measure provides that the Government, through the Veterans' Administration shall guarantee one-half of a loan or loans up to $1,500 made to a veteran for the purchase or repair of a home, or the purchase of a farm, or to enable a man to engage in a business of his own. It is hoped that this guarantee will take the place of a down payment. In addition the Government will pay the interest on the amount guaranteed for the first year.

The procedure is simple. The veteran makes application to his local bank or other lending agency. If the Administrator of Veterans Affairs finds the loan appears practicable, the guarantee is made. This system does not place the Government in further competition with private lending agencies, but on the contrary should serve as a stimulant to private enterprise. It does help the veteran become the owner of his home, farm, or business.

To many returning veterans the need for a job will be of paramount importance. Even though the Selective Service Act assures the man his former job, standing alone this is insufficient. Some types and places of employment will no longer exist. In many cases new skills will have been developed in the individual as well as maturity and qualities of leadership. In these cases the old job is not the answer. The bill establishes in the Veterans' Administration full responsibility for job counseling and employment placement.

Under this section of the bill the Administrator of Veterans Affairs is directed to place a representative in every State to work with the public employment service of that State. These men and women have fought for the right to work in a free land. It is our duty as a nation and the responsibility of this service to assist in securing suitable employment without delay.

There has been considerable discussion concerning unemployment compensation for veterans, particularly as to the number of weeks the returning veteran should be entitled to receive it. Also, there has been criticism of the payment of any unemployment compensation, with the suggestion that all returning service men and women should receive 6 months' base pay whether or not employed.

It is the opinion of many that the question of adjusted compensation or a bonus, as it has been termed by some, should not be considered at this time. The war is still in progress. No one can say how many men and women will see service. Likewise no one can accurately forecast the financial condition of the Government 2 or 3 years hence. Finally the returning veterans themselves should have a voice in determining this important question which so vitally affects the economy of the Nation and their own welfare.

But it is only just that the man and woman who has served this country in uniform should be entitled to receive compensation if he is unable to obtain suitable employment on his return. Those who have remained at home and worked in factories and elsewhere have had an opportunity to establish unemployment benefits for themselves under existing law. The serviceman has been denied this right. For his service to his country he should not be penalized but rewarded. I am satisfied that as finally passed this measure will provide that the returning soldier if qualified will receive unemployment compensation and will not be a subject of charity while looking for a job. A grateful Nation can do no less.

This is not an adjusted-compensation or bonus measure. And it provides that the value of all benefits received by a veteran under it shall be deducted from any amount which may hereafter be authorized for payment to him as adjusted compensation.

What will it cost? The best available estimate is that of the Veterans' Administration based upon fifteen million returning veterans. That estimate for the entire period of time that the bill will operate is $6,000,000,000.

This is the G. I. bill of rights. It is not a law yet but has passed the Senate and is scheduled to be voted on in the House on Thursday. It is in no sense a reward. The military service of the manhood and womanhood of America is not for sale. The bill is, we hope, a bridge over which the returning soldier and sailor may pass to his normal, rightful place in his home community.

Even as they fought for freedom and will have preserved it, so in the years to come will the destiny of America remain in their hands. Ours is a Republic. We pledge allegiance to the flag they have followed and to them the redemption of an obligation, that they may be better able to hold aloft, in peace as in war, the torch of human freedom and liberty.

Americans All

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, when the history of a country is written, usually long years after the dust of the moving-wagon wheels of progress has died down on peaceful settled valleys, that history is the narration of the total progress of an indivisible nation. The Nation does not move forward or register its influence on our world and times, by races, religions, sections, or political parties. There is no color line in the front lines nor in the graves.

In the light of this fact, common honesty should impel us in the daily and contemporary record of events to embrace each act of devotion and heroism in our common effort, without suppression or disparagement by reason of race or religion. I am pleased, therefore, to note in the daily newspapers a frank recognition of the soldierly qualities of those Americans of the Negro race who are meeting on a plane of equality the test of valor and patriotism.

Mr. Speaker, the Negro race in America has done much in the past century with what it has had to do with. Its members have helped themselves as much as they have been helped. From the days of Booker T. Washington they have rightly placed emphasis on education as the door to opportunity. To those who desire to bring up the average of our whole citizenry rather than emphasize their claim to excellence on the deprivation of the Negro of the common opportunity we all cherish, I commend an editorial on the United Negro College Fund Campaign, which appeared in the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star, May 15, 1944, as follows:

COLLEGE APPEAL

The best indication of what American Negroes wish to do in the future probably is to be found in the record of what they have done in the recent past. No other group in the whole history of the world may be said to have accomplished so much in so short a while. There is no need to cite statistics to prove the increase of health, wealth, culture, constructive idealism, and cooperation among colored citizens of the United States within the lifespan of living observers. It is a fact which is part of the experience of every thoughtful individual.

But the end, of course, is not yet. On the contrary, a new chapter in the history of Negro progress is opening, and convincing evidence of its power and vitality may be discovered in the United Negro College fund campaign which currently is going on. Twenty-seven leading institutions of learning have pooled their interests so that a single appeal may be made for all. Walter Hoving is chairman of the drive, John D. Rockefeller, jr., chairman of the advisory committee, and the Reverend Dr. Anson Phelps Stokes a member of the executive committee. Such names insure the efficiency as well as the high social character of the endeavor. The goal is a relatively small sum—only one and a half million dollars.

Ten or twenty times that amount usefully could be spent to develop the facilities of education for which hundreds of thousands of young Negro men and women, boys and girls, are reaching out. Less than half of the potential student body is being accommodated under prevailing conditions. Yet it requires no argument that if Negro youth is to be trained in American principles of responsible self-dependency and integrity, the task cannot be left to the grade schools exclusively. There must be adequate provision for the cultivation of the instinct of self-improvement in the upper levels of academic endeavor. A casual visit to Hampton, Tuskegee, Morehouse, or Fisk will suffice to convince any doubter. The work of these and other institutions of the same general class is outstanding, and its benefits are not limited to Negroes. It influences the entire Nation to the profit of every constituent element.

Headquarters for the campaign are at 38 East Fifty-seventh Street, New York City.

Price-Control Week

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to note that the Honorable John Cashmore, my esteemed friend and president of the Borough of Brooklyn, has proclaimed the week of May 17 to 24, 1944, as price-control week.

The inflationary spiral will become even more dangerous unless there is earnest cooperation between the people and the Government. It avails us little to collar and punish offenders of price control who happen to be the sellers unless we likewise instill into the heads of the guilty purchasers the enormity of their crimes. The observance of a price-control week as indicated by the foresight and wisdom of Borough President John Cashmore should do much to make the good citizenry of Brooklyn conscious of their obligations in this regard.

I want to congratulate Borough President John Cashmore. Being a good loyal Democrat of my borough and a lifelong resident therein and imbued with the fine traditions of that bailiwick, he could do no less.

I herewith set forth his proclamation:

PROCLAMATION

Whereas an effective price-control program is an integral part of a successful war effort, essential for the health and welfare of the people, for a strong and stable economy, and for high war production; and

Whereas the Office of Price Administration, in the face of many difficulties, has effected great savings for the consumers of our Nation; and

Whereas the Emergency Price Control Act, to be effective in its objectives, requires the understanding and support of every individual citizen and the participation of all in the campaign against all efforts to undermine it;

Now, therefore, I, John Cashmore, president of the Borough of Brooklyn, do hereby declare the week of May 17 to May 24, 1944, Price Control Week.

I urge the citizens of Brooklyn to devote that week to the educating of the public to the significance of price control in the war effort and to the need of active participation in the fight against the black market.

Let all groups unite to strengthen the war against inflation. Let the people of Brooklyn carry an understanding of the importance of price control and the O. P. A. into the homes of our borough, to the end that our national stabilization program be continued in the interests of winning the war.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Borough of Brooklyn to be affixed.

JOHN CASHMORE,
President, Borough of Brooklyn.

Attest:

LLOYD I. HERZKA,
Secretary to the President.

The Constitution—Guaranty of the Rights and Privileges of the Individual

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. BUCKLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a very able address delivered by Miss Daphne Pitt on the subject The Constitution—Guaranty of the Rights and Privileges of the Individual. This oration won first prize at the Bronx County oratorical contest held in our county on March 31, 1944. I had the pleasure of hearing it delivered by Miss Pitt at the monthly meeting of the Grand Street Boys Association, of which I am a member, an April 11, 1944.

The address follows:

THE CONSTITUTION—GUARANTEE OF THE RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES OF THE INDIVIDUAL

One hundred and fifty-six years ago our Constitution came into being. One hundred and fifty-six years since the growth of an idea and an ideal in the minds, and in the hearts, and in the souls of great men striving to establish an even greater Nation.

Men of imagination? Yes.

Men of faith and belief? By all means.

Men of intelligence? Definitely.

Men of foresight? That is a question.

Perhaps when we today refer to them in our debates and discussions as men of foresight we actually mean men of high hope. Perhaps I sound a bit cynical in saying this, but if I do, it is because of human obstinacy and lack of enough imagination to believe that such a marvelous gift of deliberate foresight could possibly have been granted to any mortal man.

For instance, how could those inspired founders of our democracy, intelligent, and imaginative as they were, know of the dire need that we today would have for such as the Bill of Rights. And yet, what would we in this country be without such a document?

That is not a hard question to answer. Heaven forbid, we would be another Japan, another Germany, any other irresponsible, tyrannical, totalitarian power, and I probably wouldn't be here talking to you under these auspices, and in this fashion.

But call it what you will—call it foresight or necessity—call it chance or fate—call it high destiny, if you will * * * they gave us our Bill of Rights. That is the important fact—now, today, for you and for me.

And what about us? Do we owe anything in return? Wait, I'm not talking about payment to a dead past, nor tribute to dead men, nor loyalty to outmoded traditions and ideals. The past is still—thank God—very much alive; and the men—the men of that unforgettable past will never die.

But as for the Constitution that is our responsibility: to keep its spirit alive; to put teeth into its mandates; to uphold its ideals in all our attitudes and all our acts, in all our contacts with all our fellowmen of all colors, all stations, and all creeds; in the very thoughts we think, in the very sentiments we express, and in the very air we breathe. That is our bounden obligation.

Some doubt the fiber, the lastingness, the resourcefulness of such a document. To the scorner and the doubter, to the scoffer and the maligner, I say that only lack of faith in man's dignity can dampen its ardor, humble its spirit, or degrade it to base uses.

You see, our Constitution is a glorious compound made of dreams and stark realities. It is made of material such as freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of the press; the kind of material that bars the way to dictator and destroyer—to any who would tear down all that has been built of the blood and the sweat and the tears of the people of this Nation.

It is made of the material that makes us realize that this is our country, "of the people, by the people, and for the people," and that, by and large, it still is the most wonderful place in all this world of ours for common man.

It is made of all the countless and nameless longings and strivings, prayers, and hopes that are the essence of the American dream.

It embraces within itself all those precious, priceless things which are being threatened by dark waves and storms of reaction and hate breaking in on us from the pits of savagery and barbarism abroad.

It is the battlement here at home, erected by us to combat the perils that face us the moment we begin to listen to the cheap rabble-rouser using the privilege of free speech to destroy free speech. The moment we begin reading the hate-mongering newspapers using the privilege of the free press for the very destruction of that free press, the moment we begin to support subversive organizations using the privileges of freedom of assembly for the base purpose of setting us against one another, or the moment we begin to tolerate any abuse of our privileges, by any party, or any faction, no matter what its guise or proffer, then we face the consequence of forfeiting our precious liberties of having them blown to the four winds.

Does that seem far-fetched?

If it does, then I know that the full significance of the Constitution is not completely understood. And if that is the case, I fail to see that poor words such as mine can play any but a very minor role in attempting to remedy it.

If you still are dubious, stop for a moment, cross the oceans, look upon the totalitarian states there found, get the full picture of black shirts and of brown shirts, of pillage, of plunder, of rape, of murder; regard the young, deprived of their youth, cheated of their birthright, fed upon the doctrine of hate; ponder the vision of human beings like you, and like me, beaten, starved, tortured; and why? Why? Because of the monstrous myth of race superiority.

Think, think about all this; then I beg of you, turn away quickly—some sights sicken the soul. Return with me to America, my country, your country, and what do you see there?

You see a beautiful lady standing proudly at the gateway to the new world, torch held high to light the way for those unfortunates who have lived in darkness so long. You hear her vibrant spirit in the throb of every American heartbeat; you know that she is the spirit of our American world, Liberty.

And then you realize more than ever before, that behind that spirit is a ghostly host, a timeless heritage, a code of duly constituted law, a way of life—yours to cherish, yours to defend, yours to preserve—the Constitution of the United States of America.

Hon. James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the REC-

ORD, I include the following newspaper items:

[From the Boston Post of April 22, 1944]

FARLEY CALLS IT GOLD BRICK—BLASTS NEW YORK STATE SOLDIER VOTE LAW

NEW YORK, April 21.—James A. Farley, State Democratic chairman, tonight called the New York State soldier vote law a goldbrick law and urged Gov. Thomas E. Dewey to call a special session of the legislature to remove its obvious defects.

Farley spoke over the same CBS State-wide network on which Dewey, a week ago, reviewed his administration, and termed the State war ballot "a simple, workable formula for soldier voting."

[From the Boston Post of April 19, 1944]

UNSOLICITED

It was not that James A. Farley was unanimously reelected as chairman of the New York State democratic committee, despite the efforts of the O'Connell machine in Albany to drive him out, that was so surprising. But the fact that Mr. Farley did not ask for a single vote, or in no way campaigned for reelection, makes his selection an outstanding event. But New Yorkers know Jim Farley. They value his worth to the party. That he was again selected as State leader is a glowing tribute to his ability and his honesty.

[From the Hampshire Gazette, Northampton, Mass., of May 5, 1944]

James A. Farley, a rugged American himself, pays a nice tribute to Americans in general for their soundness of character in this war both at the front and at home, after their careless and pleasure-loving ways in peacetime. Let us hope that the attitude taken at this time will be carried into peace and into the years that follow so that America may never again be found as weak as she was in 1914 and in 1939. Both weaknesses had something to do with our getting into both wars.

Address to the Alumni of Providence College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me to the alumni of Providence College, Sunday, May 7, 1944, at Providence College, Providence, R. I.:

The occasion of a communion breakfast is memorable in anyone's life. The opportunity and privilege to receive our Divine Lord into our souls is a tremendous thing in itself, and I am deeply grateful for the graces and blessings that I have received this morning. I had thought that my first day in the halls of Congress was a great one in my life, but, gentlemen, it is no empty phrase when I tell you that today is an even bigger one. Providence College means so much to all of us, and I trust you will believe that I am sincerely grateful for the privilege and honor you have accorded me. Many of you gentlemen here this morning represent pioneers in the foundation of this great Dominican institution. We can all be thankful to Almighty God that there is such an institution of learning. Extraordinary graces and blessings have been bestowed on the college spiritually, intellectually, and financially. Extraordinary success has enriched the lives of many of you professionally, socially, and financially. As you have grown into maturity, so has your alma mater grown. Today she opens her arms to welcome back the oldest and the youngest of her sons, not as a test of their loyalty to her; rather as a manifestation of their faith in God. We all appreciate the fact it is not everywhere in the world that such an expression of faith is possible.

I know only too well it has been the popular style to lampoon the system of education such as prevails here at the college. I am well aware that it has been the accepted thing to scoff at that philosophy which has answered the basic question in man's heart, which tells men who and what he is, from whence he came, whither is his ultimate goal.

It is not only popular but is considered the mark of genuine intelligence, to deny the existence of objective truth. When we insist that truth is eternal, that there is a moral law, given to His creatures by God, that this same moral law applies as well to nations as to individual men, we have been ridiculed as being steeped in medieval superstition. The popular philosophy of our day has been termed utilitarianism or realism, and we are admonished to be practical and cease our day-dreaming.

In our time we have witnessed the growth of this realism, we have seen its tenets become the policies of nations. We have seen the world immersed in a bath of blood because men found it easy to justify their conduct on the ground of expediency.

In Germany and Japan there rose to power men motivated by this doctrine of expediency. To them there was no truth as a changeless thing, to them truth was a tool, a weapon. To them there was no falsehood, no treachery. These things were only instruments to be used in advancing the purpose of the almighty state, a purpose declared by those men alone, not by the people for whom the state was created.

Here was conduct, by the leaders of great nations, as immoral as any to be found in the pages of history. Immoral, that is, if our beliefs, learned at the feet of the noble men who are followers of the great Aquinas, are correct, and the pragmatists wrong. But if we permit ourselves to subscribe to the "practical" doctrines of the extreme realists, then we should doff our caps and pay humble tribute to these disciples of expediency. Surely they applied their energies, with vigor and violence, to the task at hand. Their plan was brilliantly conceived, its execution flawless, and hardhearted realism should have won for them honorary degrees from the great universities of our critics.

This great land of ours—founded on the dignity of man and subscribing to the morality of nations—was brought into being by men who were motivated by principles as much removed from the theories of materialists as is the dark of night from the noonday sun. Certain truths, they declared, were self-evident. They affirmed the existence of God; they affirmed the dignity—the inviolability—of human nature and the rights that belong to that dignity; they affirmed the primary purpose of government to be the protection of a person in the exercise of those rights; they affirmed the right of the people to determine for themselves the form of government they deem best suited to their needs.

Fortified as we are this morning—with the grace of God—there can be no better time to consider our place in this Nation of ours—in a land to which the pagan, irreligious world has flung her challenge of contempt and ridicule. There is no better time than now to determine honestly what contribution we can make toward the safeguarding of those rights and principles to which we lay claim.

In God's good time—we have all prayed this morning that day is not far distant—the tumult and the shouting will have died. The princes and the kings will have departed, and the little people of the world will stand in awe at the great conclave of peacemakers. The giants will again assemble, and the mothers and fathers of the future generation of men and boys will stand and wait, in silent prayer, that from this meeting will come, in truth, the peace and security for which they have cried aloud to their God. When the bombed and shocked people of Europe and Asia come to dig their cities out of the rubble created by the inventive genius of man, when soldiers lay aside the brilliantly constructed instruments of death and destruction—human nature being what it is—it may be too much to expect that there will be a laying aside of the ambitions of men and nations.

It may be that in that day—when men no longer fear the aggression of their enemies—they will learn to fear the suggestions of so-called friends, still poisoned by selfishness.

Once before, in our time, we witnessed men and nations, who had been motivated by lofty principles—who called on Almighty God to award victory to their arms—turn in time of peace to power politics—and an abortive attempt to provide for their own security through the execution of selfish compacts.

I know it is popular to sneer at democracy in action—that one who attests his faith in representative government receives a cynical smile. But I do know this—the future security of the people of America lies within reach of each individual, the winning of that security calls for the untiring effort of every individual. If we will have peace—peace it will be. If we will have agreements, compacts, cartels, and all the lock, stock, and barrel of self-seeking international relations, that we will have.

One of the most powerful injunctions—one of the most important contributions to society—was written by St. Paul in three words—"Be a man." He recognized the full scope and power of the dignity of man. He recognized fully the tremendous power potentially held within the limits of the human intellect and will. He evaluated correctly man's position in the divine plan.

Would to God the thundering voice of St. Paul would echo and reecho across the land today.

Be a man in the fulfillment of your nature; know and use the power and the glory and the dignity of your being. Live in the full stature of your manhood—in justice, in honesty, and in truth. Enjoy the privileges of manhood, but be awake to the responsibility, the obligations, imposed by that manhood. Reach for the stars like a man—not for the earth like a dog.

Yes, the alumni of Providence College are attending today a communion breakfast—would to God that the Providence College men scattered across the world could be with us this morning to share our happiness.

Here the philosophy of St. Thomas taught young men to live—a system of philosophy became a philosophy of life. If it wasn't just routine teaching—if the principles received here were true—then lives were made fuller and richer, and immature boys were fashioned into worth-while Catholic men; and Providence College men—in a PT boat in the South Pacific—in an LCI in the Mediterranean—or a flying fortress over Europe—have something upon which to pin their faith and hope for the future.

This morning at this communion breakfast we should rededicate our lives to God and determine, as individual men, as part of a great Nation, to accept the tremendous responsibilities placed in our hands, live according to our teachings, live American according to America's principles—be men—the kind of men God created us to be.

The Great Game of Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Frank R. Kent, from the Washington Evening Star:

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS—VENEER OF IDEALISM USED FOR 12 YEARS IN ADMINISTRATION "POLITICS," SAYS WRITER

(By Frank R. Kent)

One of the interesting things about this administration is the extraordinary manner in which for 12 years it has managed to camouflage the most sordid and practical kind of politics with a false and glittering veneer of idealism. For the purpose of reelecting the President, this twice has proven an exceedingly effective combination. As he reaches for a fourth term it is still the main dependence.

For example, the present propaganda is based on the assumption that Mr. Roosevelt is the only man capable of assuring victory for the United Nations; that no other is fit to be trusted to make the peace or handle the post-war problems; that to "change horses" in 1944 would invite calamity; that only knowledge of these things and the overwhelming demand of the people could persuade the President to forgo his personal desire to "lay down the burden" and spend 4 more years in the White House. Essentially, these are the same arguments used to promote the third-term effort.

However well they may go with the gullible, there was not then—and there is not now—anything in the record to sustain these arguments, and they have been pretty well refuted by the facts. The real refutation, however, comes from their source—the White House aides who devise and distribute them. Obviously, if they believed them they would rely upon them. But they do not rely upon them at all—less this time, in fact, than in the third-term "draft."

NEVER WAS A "DRAFT"

It wasn't a "draft" then and it isn't a "draft" now. The "draft" and the "overwhelming demand" were clearly manipulted in 1940 and they are being manipulated now. This is not to say there is no genuine sentiment for Mr. Roosevelt; it is to say that the sentiment would be insufficient and ineffectual unless heavily stimulated and worked up.

It was Governor Dewey who, 2 years ago, said that no man was ever 'drafted" for the Presidency without conniving in the draft. Undoubtedly, Mr. Dewey is conniving in his own "draft," but no more than Mr. Roosevelt is conniving in his.

One difference is that Mr. Roosevelt has vastly more power to bring about a draft than Mr. Dewey—and to make it seem real. So long as he is in the White House, the great weight of the Federal machine is sufficient to insure any number of renominations for the President. It prevents any formidable candidate from arising within the party. It keeps down real convention competition.

Thus for the renomination this year, as in 1940, reliance is not upon altruistic arguments and public sentiment, though that is the pretense, but upon the powerful Federal machine with which, through patronage, are linked the big city bosses such as Hague, of New Jersey, the O'Connells, of Albany, Laughlin, of Tammany, Kelly, of Chicago, and others.

SAME TALK OF SACRIFICE

Barring bad health, through these instruments the fourth nomination will be obtained. But, both before and after, the same altruistic arguments will be used, the same talk about sacrifice will be maintained and the credulous, though perhaps diminished in numbers this time, will be deluded. Much can be done with these arguments, because administration publicity advantages are great. But by no means can enough be done to elect Mr. Roosevelt a fourth time. The reliance for that is not upon argument, but upon certain concrete political assets totally impervious to argument.

First, there are the 3,000,000 civilian Federal employees whose hope of staying on the pay roll is tied up with the Roosevelt candidacy; second, there is the C. I. O. with its huge campaign funds, its all-out for Roosevelt declarations, its country-wide organization, and its leaders who are recognized as having the major part in the management of the fourth-term campaign; third, there are the American Labor Party in New York, the Communists, who themselves will have no Presidential candidate this time, and other of the radical groups; fourth, there is the great Negro vote in the pivotal northern and border States, the bulk of which has been Mr. Roosevelt's twice.

Unquestionably, the most important of the four is the Negro vote. This is the biggest single voting group in the country. Should Mr. Roosevelt lose much of his previous support from it, his chances would be greatly diminished. Signs that it is slipping disturb the White House politicians more than anything else.

Evidence of this is given in the almost frantic efforts being made by the left-wing press and administration politicians to convince Negro leaders that Governor Dewey is a wicked man who will betray them if elected President. It is rather a degraded performance, but typical.

President Presents Gold Star to Lt. Comdr. Edward H. O'Hare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the late Lt. Comdr. Edward Henry O'Hare has again been recognized by the President who presented this outstanding flyer with the Gold Star in recognition of his distinguished service.

As it is known, Lieutenant Commander O'Hare was presented with the Congressional Medal of Honor as a result of destroying five Japanese planes in a single action February 20, 1942, which saved his carrier from destruction. Lieutenant Commander O'Hare was shot down trying to break up an attack of 30 to 40 torpedo planes against a United States carrier task force on November 27, 1943. This latest citation is a result of operations October 5, 1943, against Japanese forces at Wake Island.

Mr. Speaker, Lieutenant Commander O'Hare was my personal friend. I appointed him to the Naval Academy and under the permission granted me, I include as part of my remarks the citation. It follows:

The President of the United States takes pleasure in presenting the Gold Star in lieu of the second Distinguished Flying Cross to Lt. Comdr. Edward Henry O'Hare, United States Navy, for service as set forth in the following citation:

"For heroism and extraordinary achievement in aerial combat as commander of Fighting Squadron Six during operations against enemy Japanese forces at Wake Island on October 5, 1943. Sighting three hostile fighters south of the island, Lieutenant Commander O'Hare overtook the planes and singlehandedly destroyed one while his unit accounted for the other two, pursuing the stricken planes down to the runway on Wake Island where, in the face of terrific Japanese antiaircraft fire, two twin-engined bombers and a fourth fighter were destroyed on the ground. Continuing his daring tactics, Lieutenant Commander O'Hare intercepted a third hostile bomber, closing for the attack, and leaving the enemy a crippled and vulnerable target for final destruction by another plane of his unit. His inspiring leadership and gallant fighting spirit under the most perilous conditions reflect great credit upon Lieutenant Commander O'Hare, his command, and the United States naval service."

For the President,

JAMES FORRESTAL,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Education of Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following telegram from Hon. Leverett Saltonstall, Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which is dated May 17:

BOSTON, MASS., May 17, 1944.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
House Office Building:

On May 8 wired you regarding the educational features of the G. I. bill of rights, and also joined with executive committee of Governors Conference in a telegram. I am anxious that the bill provide that actual education of veterans be in the hands of State educational organizations and institutions. I certainly oppose the creation of any new Federal bureaucracy, and aside from wanting it made clear that the States are to control the veterans' education, I am entirely in favor of the G. I. bill of rights.

LEVERETT SALTONSTALL,
Governor of Massachusetts.

State Taxation of Interstate Airplanes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PERCY PRIEST
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the House to an editorial appearing in the Washington Post for May 18, 1944, discussing the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Northwest Airlines against the State of Minnesota, decided May 15, 1944. This decision makes possible the imposition by the States of burdensome multiple taxation upon the aircraft of interstate air lines.

The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee attempted to deal with this problem in advance in the Lea aviation bill, H. R. 3420, but so far the pressure of railroad and steamship interests have prevented consideration of this bill by the House.

The Post editorial follows:

TAX ON AIRPLANES

It is not surprising that the Supreme Court divided 5 to 4 in deciding the rather baffling Northwest Airlines case on Monday. That case took to the Court for the first time the question of constitutional limitations on the power of the States to tax airplanes. The Court searched all the precedents and apparently found no doctrine that could be applied to vehicles of the air with full satisfaction. So it split four ways. While Justices Jackson and Black agreed with Justices Frankfurter, Douglas, and Murphy in the final disposition of the case, they wrote separate concurring opinions. Chief Justice Stone and Justices Roberts, Reed, and Rutledge dissented.

The effect of the decision is to permit Minnesota to tax all the planes operated by Northwest Airlines in several States. Justice Frankfurter reasoned that Minnesota is the company's domicile and may therefore tax all of its property operating out of that State. "It is not a charge laid for engaging in interstate commerce," he wrote, "or upon air lines specifically; it is not aimed by indirection against interstate commerce or measured by such commerce." So the Court permitted this tax to stand for the time being until Congress steps in and makes more definite rules for the taxation of interstate commerce by air.

In our opinion, the nub of the whole matter is contained in this sentence from Justice Jackson's concurring opinion: "It seems more than likely that no solution of the competition among States to tax this transportation agency can be devised by the judicial process without legislative help." That is certainly an invitation to Congress to step in and straighten out the mess, as could be done by a reconsideration of the pigeonholed Lea bill. Obviously, individual States cannot be permitted to tax airplane companies operating out of their borders at will. That would create chaos in aviation. Yet the courts are naturally reluctant to step in and establish special rules to govern this delicate problem of taxing air transport.

We hope, then, that the decision will revive interest in the Lea bill. Congress must deal with the whole problem of regulating air transportation, of which the taxes are an intricate part. Certainly it should not postpone action any longer than is necessary to get a comprehensive view of what ought to be done.

Soldier Ballot Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, some time ago I wrote to Hon. Chauncey B. Hammond, member of the New York State Senate, outlining to him the provisions of the Federal soldier ballot law and asking him to reply and explain the provisions of the soldier vote law enacted by the Legislature of New York State.

Because of the extensive interest displayed when this topic was being considered by the Congress, it seems advisable that the people be informed as to the provisions of both acts so that they will know what steps are to be taken in order to cast their ballots.

Accordingly, under leave to extend my remarks, I am having my letter and Senator Hammond's reply inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1944.

Hon. CHAUNCEY B. HAMMOND,
Member, New York State Senate,
Albany, N. Y.

DEAR SENATOR: Widespread national interest was evident when the question of the soldier ballot was pending in the Congress and now that a Federal soldier ballot law has been enacted, as well as a State soldier ballot law, I deem it advisable that we explain to our constituents the provisions of each so that they, in turn, will be in a position to advise their relatives and loved ones who are in the service. Therefore, I am taking the liberty of communicating to you my understanding of the Federal law with the hope that you will reply by explaining the provisions of the State law and its relationship to the Federal law.

The Federal law as to duty outside the United States affects members of the armed forces, merchant marine, and persons serving with the American Red Cross, Society of Friends, Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots, and the United Service Organizations. It applies to them only if the Governor has certified prior to July 15 that the State has made no provision for State absentee ballot and that use of the Federal ballot is authorized by the State laws or if the Governor, prior to July 15, has certified that the use of the Federal ballot is authorized by State law and if (the Governor not having certified the existence of a State absentee ballot) the individual soldier states in his oath that prior to September 1 he made application for a State absentee ballot but as of October 1 had not received it.

The Federal law as to duty inside the United States applies only to members of the armed forces. It applies to them only if the Governor has certified prior to July 15 that the State has made no provision for State absentee ballot and that use of the Federal ballot is authorized by the State laws.

Since New York has recently enacted a State absentee ballot law, it would appear that the Federal ballot is not only unnecessary but its use not authorized. Therefore, it seems appropriate that you outline to me the provisions of the State law and the steps which a soldier must take in order to obtain and cast his ballot.

In addition, the Federal law provides for the establishment of a Federal War Ballot Commission and makes available the facilities of the War and Navy Departments for transmission and delivery of the State ballot procedures.

I am sure you will agree with me that the opportunity to vote by our men and women in the services should be extended to as large a number as possible and that the ballot include all public officers. Your explanation of the procedure for them to follow in obtaining and casting their ballot will be most helpful in accomplishing this objective.

Sincerely yours,

W. STERLING COLE,
Member of Congress.

THE SENATE,
STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, May 16, 1944.

Hon. W. STERLING COLE,
Representative in Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have not replied to your letter with regard to the soldier vote at an earlier date as I desired to await any possible ruling of the State war-ballot commission. I think the arrangements are now all set up to follow the law. The matter of the ballot is covered by the constitution of the State of New York. It provides that every citizen of the age of 21 or over who has been a resident of the State for 1 year, of the county for 4 months, and of the election district 30 days shall be entitled to vote in the election district of which he or she shall at the time be a resident, and not elsewhere, for all officers that are or may thereafter be elected by the people. It also provides that in time of war no elector in the actual military service of the State or of the United States, in the Army or Navy thereof, shall be deprived of his or her vote by reason of his or her absence from such election district.

The State constitution therefore plainly provides that every citizen in the armed services who is eligible to vote shall be given the right to vote not only for President, Vice President, and Members of the Congress but for every candidate in his or her district to the lowest town officer. Under the State ballot law any man or woman in the armed forces who would be entitled to vote if he or she were home will be entitled to vote in the coming election for every office to be filled if he or she desires to vote. To receive a ballot all that is necessary is for such member of the armed forces to ask for one. Any one of the following methods will insure the mailing of a war ballot to those in the service: (1) Fill out and mail to the secretary of state or to the State war-ballot commission at Albany, N. Y., the post-card form distributed by the Federal Government; or (2) fill out and mail the post-card form of application provided by the State war-ballot commission. This application form will be sent to every member of the armed forces whose name and military address is furnished to the war-ballot commission or the secretary of state; or (3) write a letter to some immediate member of the family indicating a desire to have a war ballot, giving home and military address. This letter turned over to the secretary of state or to the war-ballot commission will bring a war ballot to the applicant; or (4) register personally with the election board in the county of residence. This, of course, can only be done by those who reach home on a furlough or otherwise.

You are correct in your assumption that the Federal law will not operate in New York State as the State has provided a method and set up the mechanics for voting. Furthermore any ballot that does not provide members of the armed forces opportunity to vote for every candidate running in his or her election district would not follow the State Constitution and would quite likely be invalid in this State. Ballots received by voters wherever located will contain proper instructions both as to manner of voting and as to the return of the ballot in the envelope provided for that purpose.

As it is the purpose of the State war-ballot law to give every eligible member of the armed forces who desires to vote an opportunity to do so it would seem advisable that some member of the family here at home write to the member of the family in the armed forces advising him or her to make application for a war ballot in one of the four methods stated above, being sure to give his or her military and home address. It should be urged upon all members of the armed forces who receive a ballot on application that this ballot be voted and mailed back in the envelope provided immediately upon receipt so that it may be distributed to reach his or her election district in time to be counted.

I have not recited herein the mechanics and the dates for handling the war ballots as this would be of no particular interest to the voter. The essential interest to the voter is to make the application for the ballot and the rest will follow in due course.

Sincerely yours,

CHAUNCEY B. HAMMOND.

Others in the Service Should Be Entitled to Mustering-Out Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, it is not always possible for Congress to deeply penetrate the future with its eyes and see at a glance all of the problems and injustices that might arise in connection with any one piece of legislation. However, this body has through the decades been very fair-minded, and where wrongs have been done or where unfair omissions have been made it usually took appropriate action.

There are many citizens who feel that we have done an injustice in denying mustering-out pay to the servicemen over 38 years of age who voluntarily applied for release to return to war plants or to the farm. I believe their complaint is full worthy of our serious consideration, since both our War and Navy Departments have held that most of these men are not desirable as soldiers at this stage of the fighting.

Many of these men were inspired by a patriotic fervor to enlist or serve in our armed forces. Some feeling that they would surely be drafted anyway, they wanted to get in the branch of service to their liking so they enlisted after selling their business, their home, their automobile, or other possession of considerable monetary value, or gave up a good job in war industry.

Then came deferments for farm men so that the farm man over 38 would not have been called at all had he remained at home. Then came word from the Army and Navy that they did not want any more men over 38, so the man who awaited his call from his draft board and kept right on working and living at home with his family, experienced no interruption in his life.

With the new policy of confining draft quotas to younger men, there became a shortage in many defense plants. Soldiers over 38 years of age who could show that they had a job waiting for them at a bench in a defense plant were told they were eligible for release. Some of them had served over a year. Many of them felt that they would be of far greater assistance in the war effort on the farm, at the lathe, or at the throttle, or in the laboratory, or in hundreds of other vital key war positions, so they applied for release, presenting a statement from their former or prospective employer.

Then Congress passed the mustering-out pay law, but this group of men were denied the right to participate. Of course, there are thousands in this over-age group still in the Army. When the Army life proves too strenuous for some of them, they are given a medical discharge, and draw mustering-out pay. The over-age man who acted in good faith and returned to war industry with an honorable discharge gets no mustering-out pay whatever to assist him in his multitude of adjustments incidental to the return to civilian life.

As an example of how some of these veterans feel about this situation, I desire to incorporate in my remarks a letter I have received from a man in this group, whose name I shall omit for obvious reasons. It reads as follows:

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

Veterans of this war, over 38, who requested a discharge to accept employment in an essential industry, shall not be eligible for the mustering-out pay, says the law.

Will the lawmakers who drew up this distinction between veterans please explain why they should not be eligible?

What have they done to be excluded in this law? Is it merely because they spoke up and asked for their honorable discharge?

When a man has served from 6 to 12 months he needs a vacation to readjust himself to civilian life before going back to work, even if he did request his discharge for that purpose.

For veterans over 38 who requested a discharge it would have been quite an easy matter to get a disability discharge, but who would know that a disability discharge was so much better than an honorable discharge.

Many veterans in this over-38 group who requested a discharge served a year or more. Some were good soldiers who also served in the First World War.

The most unfair part of this law is the fact that everybody who received a disability discharge is eligible. That is, those who admittedly had their disabilities prior to entering the service, and not contracted while in the service. Those who made a practice of complaining to the Army doctor (most likely exaggerated) and were useless to the Army. Yes, if you had gotten a disability discharge, giving for reason such as poor eyesight, hard of hearing, flat feet, high blood pressure, or rheumatism, etc., you would be all right for the mustering-out pay. But an honorable discharge—no use, if you asked for it, regardless of merit.

Some in this group of veterans were handed a disability discharge the day after they arrived in camp. I know of one case where the serviceman was not in service long enough to receive his uniform. He had passed his physical, but 4 days after he was sworn in he received a letter saying he could not be accepted for service on account of high blood pressure.

He was not in the service long enough to get into uniform, but he was in long enough to get his mustering-out pay.

It is understood that individual cases cannot be considered, but there must be thousands who have received disability discharge (for disabilities that they had before entering service) shortly after they arrived at training center, and sent home, being unfit for hard training.

With due respect, but why favor them? They also go back to civilian work just as well as those who requested a discharge for that purpose.

They wave their mustering-out checks under our nose and give us the horse-laugh.

We may be no heroes, but we did spend many sleepless nights guarding Government property.

We ask no charity—only a fair deal.

When men who served less than 1 month, and were handed a disability discharge can get it (because they did not ask for their discharge) and men who served 1 year cannot get it, merely because they asked for a discharge, then something is wrong somewhere. Is merit and length of time served totally ignored in ths law?

Action speaks louder than words—or doesn't it? A fair law should have been to the contrary.

I urge all veterans of this war, over 38, who requested a discharge, and feel unjustified about the mustering-out-pay law to do something about it. We are scattered all over the country and we cannot very well form a bonus march to Washington. But you can write a letter to the House Veterans' Committee, Washington 25, D. C., or to the American Legion, asking them to sponsor an amendment to this unfair law. Maybe an amendment of the mustering-out law could be written into the so-called "G. I. bill of rights" now pending in Congress.

If we do nothing about it—nobody else will. So let's fight for our rights, using words for ammunition.

DISAPPOINTED VET.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope the House Committee on Military Affairs will give this matter serious consideration at an early date.

Hon. Everett Dirksen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. ELMER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. ELMER. Mr. Speaker, the friends of EVERETT DIRKSEN, in this House, who are backing him for Vice President, have faith in his ability and integrity, and in the ultimate judgment of the people to realize his fitness for this great public office. His broad experience as a Member of Congress for 12 years qualifies him in a peculiar way and would form a much needed connection between the executive and lawmaking branches of the Government. The people will have a complete freedom from fear that his elevation to the Presidency might be a calamity to the country.

Great Test

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein an editorial which appeared in a recent edition of the Lawrence Evening Tribune, Lawrence, Mass.:

GREAT TEST

The greatest test lies immediately ahead. The war program shaped for the next few months will put America to a test far beyond any that has yet developed during this terrible world conflict.

The American fighting forces are now facing the greatest battle of all time, the invasion of the European fortress. Hundreds of thousands of carefully trained men are just waiting for the signal to go.

The activity of the armies in Italy, the marvelous exploits of the Air Forces, and the work of the Navy constitute a great prelude to the invasion leading up to the unconditional surrender of Germany. The strain leading up to this test is indeed severe but proves that those great American heroes of 1944 are worthy of their ancestry. They are living up to every American tradition of courage, bravery, and stanch manhood.

Those brave young men of the Army, Navy, and Air Forces are well cared for as far as food, clothing, shelter, medical care, and entertainment are concerned. The best in all those lines is provided on the best standard possible under existing conditions in every theater of war the world over. There is one thing, however, that neither the United States Government nor the executives of all the warring branches can do for those in the armed forces and that is keep up the line of communication between them and their homes and home communities. That is something that must be done by their families, friends, neighbors, and community officials.

Never since this horrible war started was the demand for morale building greater. There is no better builder of morale for the men away from home than letters from home. Gifts, foodstuffs, and goodies are splendid but are definitely secondary to letters. The day that a man answers mail call and gets none is a bad day for him. Even if it is only a few lines or a card it means much to him and lightens the burden that he is bearing for those at home. No matter how many letters we write in a day or a week, no matter how our fingers get cramped from pen or pencil it is nothing compared to what those heroes are doing for us.

A letter received recently at this office suggested the sending of pictures either with letters or separately. That constitutes a splendid idea or suggestion. Pictures of members of the family or of scenes around the home or neighborhood mean so much to those lads that they should be sent as frequently as possible.

Those in uniform are meeting the demands of this greatest test as perfectly as is humanly possible. Those at home should face the test, too, and do their part comparably well. There must be no strikes or suspension of operations in war-production works. The approaching Fifth War Loan drive should go over with a bang that will resound throughout the world. Appeals for cooperation in all activities in the support of the war effort must be responded to unanimously, wholeheartedly, and patriotically. And all should resolve to write letters and cards and send pictures to our fighting men without let-up until the day that they are homeward bound.

House Joint Resolution 149

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under eave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution passed by the Federal Bar Association of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, favoring the passage of House Joint Resolution 149, introduced by Representative REED, of Illinois, to increase the salaries of the judges of the United States district courts from the present level of $10,000 to $15,000:

Whereas the Federal Bar Association of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut has urged and advocated an increase in the salaries of United States district court judges for the past decade and has repeatedly petitioned the Judiciary Committees of the House and Senate for legislation permitting an increase; and

Whereas there has been introduced in Congress by Congressman REED of Illinois, House Joint Resolution 149 to increase the salaries of judges of the United States district courts from $10,000 to $15,000 per annum; and

Whereas the salaries received by the judges at the present time are the lowest paid to any judges in comparable judicial office in the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut; and

Whereas State judges receive as high as $25,000 per annum; and

Whereas it is contrary to public policy that the judiciary be underpaid; and

Whereas the jurisdiction of the Federal courts is more comprehensive than that of any of State courts, and includes criminal, admiralty, bankruptcy, patent, copyright, civil, and equity matters; and

Whereas members of this association who practice extensively in Federal courts as well as in State courts believe that the caliber and ability of the Federal judges in these districts is equal to that of the highest State judicial officers; and

Whereas in the future the position, by reason of its meager salary, will not continue to attract able and competent men, to the detriment of the public interest; and

Whereas the present salaries after income tax do not allow the judges sufficient to maintain themselves adequately and in a manner compatible with their position or to properly support their families: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this association unequivocally endorses House Joint Resolution 149 and urges that similar action be taken by all other bar associations; and be it further

Resolved, That the president of this association appoint a committee of nine members to wait upon Congress, to attend any hearings before appropriate committees of the House and of the Senate, to urge all Senators and Congressmen to vote in favor of the bill; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be mailed to Henry P. Chandler, Administrator of United States Courts, Attorney General Biddle, to the President of the United States, and to all Members of the Congress.

"Swoose" Thinks WASP Program Smells of Some Kind of Racket

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial by Ruth Sarles from the Washington Daily News, May 18, 1944:

"SWOOSE" THINKS WASP PROGRAM SMELLS OF SOME KIND OF RACKET

(By Ruth Sarles)

"Guess I'm just a swoose." It was Dick Goodrich, of St. Cloud, Minn., speaking. Dick is an instructor in the Civil Aeronautics Administration War Training Service program. He has 1,300 hours' flying time. He's due to be thrown in the ash can along with 5,000 other instructors by September unless the Army and Congress decide to make some use of his flight experience on noncombat duty.

Since he and his friends don't see much chance of that happening, after the way they've been kicked around, he came to Washington to find out why.

HE WEARS UNIFORM

Here's why Dick thinks he's neither a swan nor a goose:

He wears the Army uniform and carries an official-looking card saying he's a member of the Enlisted Reserve Corps. He's 1–C, which means he's in the Army. His draft board considers him in the Army, and doesn't bother with him. He couldn't take a Navy commission, junior grade, that was offered him because he's in the Army.

Yet, apparently he isn't in the Army. Because he doesn't have any Army privileges, he is refused U. S. O. privileges, and an M. P. in Milwaukee picked him up and told him he had no right to wear the uniform. When Dick explained, the M. P. said, "There's nothing in our manual that describes a guy like you. I'll run you in if I see you around here again." When he was in training he got board and room only, not the Army private's pay of $50 a month. And the little shack where he and five others lived was so badly heated that the boys stole coal from a W. P. A. project to keep warm.

Tired of his on-the-fence situation, Dick has asked for his release because he thinks he can do something else more useful to the war effort. But there may be a snag; maybe he can't get a private job because he's still I–C in the Army. That means unemployment insurance at $80 a month.

TALK ABOUT HARDSHIP

Dick says he speaks for a lot of his friends in the same position when he talks about hardship. "Many of them have lost their homes and cars and sent their wives and children to live with relatives."

Dick joined up in July 1942. He was III–A, a pre-Pearl Harbor father. But he had a brother on Bataan, and he knew how to fly and had a private pilot's license. He gave up his job; his wife took a job; they farmed out his 2-year-old youngster with a relative; he started training under the C. A. A.-W. T. S. program with only board and room. His wife sent him $5 a month for spending money when she could.

The training was to be for 6 months. By that time they would be washed-out pilots or service pilots. But at the end of 6 months the boys didn't get the commission they had been led to believe they'd get. So they took another course, and another. Each time they were told, "Take this one more course and the Army will want you." So he trained for 13 months. There didn't seem to be any chance to get out.

Finally he started instructing and was kept at it for 9 months. "The first training the Army cadets got we gave them," he said, "and one of my students got a decoration in combat."

But the Army says it has plenty of flyers, Dick, since the pilot attrition has been less than expected. What if they just can't use you and the 11,000 others, including the trainees?

"Then why are they training women—the WASPS—Women's Air Service Pilots—for noncombat flying with only 35 hours when they had 5,000 instructors averaging 1,000 hours?" he wanted to know. "If the Army has pilots running out of its ears, why is the Army Air Forces running a full-page ad, as it did this week in Collier's, to recruit boys of 17 in the Civil Air Patrol, auxiliary of the Army Air Forces? It's the same issue that has an article on why I support Roosevelt.

"We could release for combat duty the men of combat age now instructing.

CAN FLY ANYTHING

"They say we haven't had the hours in the 'hot' planes, training that the 35-hour WASPS are getting. We take issue with the statement that we can't qualify because we've flown only light planes. Any of us who has had 205 hours in the air can take a 10-hour check-out and fly any plane there is. I know I'm old for a pilot (he's 32), but I know I'm as good a pilot as a 20-year-old girl with 50 hours."

There's a bill before the House that if passed would commission Dick and the rest of the C. A. A.-trained men. But it's attached to the bill to militarize the WASPS which the Army supports, and some interested Members of Congress fear that no matter what kind of bill they pass the Army will somehow set the requirements so high the men can't qualify.

Anyhow, Dick isn't supposed to talk to his Congressman about it. Notices have recently gone up on training center bulletin boards telling them they are not to contact their legislators about any matter except soldier relief.

"We are not asking for anything except that the Government make good on its promise. They might at least give us a military record or put us on active duty for 1 day, so we'd have the rights of a soldier.

"What I'm really here for is to find out what the people who run the Army and Congress and the whole United States have against us. I want to know how they can allow this situation to go on, and welch on the Government's agreement to us, whether it's from lack of information or something deeper. I don't know much about politics, but from where I sit it smells like a racket of some kind."

Frank J. Hogan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Washington Evening Star. It is a tribute to one of the most distinguished and prominent members of the bar whose life should certainly be an inspiration to every member of the legal profession:

FRANK J. HOGAN

When Alexis de Tocqueville in 1835 declared that "the profession of the law is the only aristocracy that can exist in a democracy without doing violence to its nature," he anticipated the achievement and the position of Frank J. Hogan. No other employment would have given him the opportunities, the occasions, and the successes that he developed. Certainly, his talents were such as to have indicated that he would not fail in any career to which he might have chosen to devote them; but the work for which nature seemed to have intended him was that of an advocate, a courtroom pleader, a defender of defendants, an appellant for appellants.

To see Mr. Hogan in action was to witness a magnificent performance. He was a master of the arts of inquiry and persuasion. The skill with which he cross-examined was a legend. His comprehension of legal logic rarely has been equaled by any contemporary. He dealt with evidence as a mathematician deals with figures or a chemist with the natural elements. The function of justice in the world, as he conceived it, was philosophical, if not religious. At the climax of a case his audience invariably would sit in a rapt silence such as would characterize the listeners of an inspired prophet.

Yet Mr. Hogan was no fanatic. The native sweetness and charity of his heart influenced his mind in the interest of an equitable attitude toward the vast majority of humanity. He was generous to a fault. His patience was monumental. It was on that account possibly that he so profoundly admired Shakespeare's doctrine of inclusive mercy. Let it be said without reservation that his celebrated wit even at the sharpest was not cynical, never mean, in no sense mocking. He loved life, valued all classes of people, helped many, hurt very few—and those not by intention. Some trace of his youth stayed with him to the end. He never quite ceased to be a boy.

Mr. Hogan will be remembered not for what he wrote nor for what he said nor even for what he did. It will be for his personality that he will be recalled by later generations. Young lawyers who glimpsed him only in passing will tell of him to attorneys still their junior, and so, as in the instances of Rufus Choate and Sir Edward Marshall Hall, he will continue to be an instructive force for generations. His presidency of the District Bar Association and of the American Bar Association have assured his place in the formal history of the law. More important, however, is the continuance of the grand traditions of patriotism, service, fellow feeling, and good will to which he contributed himself throughout his days.

United States Coast Guard Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address which I delivered Sunday, May 14, 1944, over Stations WSOO, Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., and WMAM, Marinette, Wis.:

Ladies and gentlemen, last week I had a very novel and interesting experience in visiting the United States Coast Guard Academy at New London, Conn., as a member of the official Board of Visitors of that academy. All of our four service schools have these boards of visitors—the members of which are appointed by the respective chairmen of the committees handling their legislation and the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Vice President of the United States who, of course, serves as President of the Senate.

In our party leaving Washington Friday morning were three Members of the Senate and six Members of the House of Representatives. There were in addition from Coast Guard headquarters here, two rear admirals and one captain and his aide. The Coast Guard Academy among our several service schools is unique in that it has connected with its organization, in addition to the Board of Visitors, an advisory committee composed of outstanding educators in the United States.

When we arrived at New London, after 8 hours on a very hot train, we were met by four members of this advisory committee. Leaving the train, we were taken to the Academy by boat. It has been my pleasure in the past to be on the campus of the Military Academy at West Point and the Naval Academy at Annapolis—both of which are beautiful and, to say the least, marvelous institutions. I am frank to say, however, that the view from the water of the United States Coast Guard Academy on the hillside at New London literally took my breath away. It is indeed fully comparable in beauty, although much less in size, to our famous Military and Naval Academies.

The United States Coast Guard is the oldest naval establishment in our Government. Its history dates back to the commissioning of the 10 cutters authorized by the first United States Congress in the act approved August 4, 1790. That was 9 years before the United States Navy, as such, was ever heard of. The Coast Guard has remained steadfast to its appointed duty throughout all of these years.

The history of the service has been marked by two consolidations of the services engaged in promoting safety and security at sea, the original purpose for which the Coast Guard was organized. The first of these was the amalgamation of the Revenue Cutter Service with the Life Saving Service as the Coast Guard in 1915. The second was the consolidation of the Lighthouse Service with the Coast Guard in 1939. Both consolidations have contributed materially to the effectiveness of the Coast Guard's operations in time of peace.

The United States Navy was organized in 1799. In time of peace the Coast Guard serves under the United States Treasury. In time of war—under the Navy. It has never failed its mission to either branch of our Government. The Coast Guard Academy at New London is designed to furnish officers for this great branch of our armed forces. Due to the highly specialized type of work performed by the Coast Guard Service, neither our Army nor Navy schools were found satisfactory to provide the officers for this specialized service and thus in 1876 the Congress established a separate Coast Guard school at New Bedford, Mass. This school was moved to Baltimore, Md., in 1900 and finally to New London, Conn., in 1910. The Coast Guard Academy which I visited was built in 1933 and it is a great institution—believe me—at which you and I would love to have our boys in attendance. The traditions of the Coast Guard are based on the ability of officers and men in seamanship.

Appointments as cadets are offered to young men standing highest in a Nation-wide competitive examination held in May of each year which is open to all who are able to meet the prescribed standards. The mental requirements are in general those required for admission to a high-grade engineering college, or, I should have said, the very highest grade of engineering college. The figures show that on the average for the past 10 years approximately 2,500 boys file applications to take the examinations for admission to the United States Coast Guard Academy. Of these approximately 500—or 20 percent—succeed in passing the rigid entrance examinations in mathematics and English. Of these 500 approximately 150 are selected based upon their scholastic attainments in the test and their superior physical qualifications. Thus it is perfectly easy to see that the United States Coast Guard in picking 150 of an initial application of 2,500 is theoretically and practically accepting only the "cream of the crop," and those are the type boys who I saw passing in review as the cadet battalion at the lowering of the colors at retreat shortly after my arrival at New London. Their marching technique and their smartness under orders in small-arms drill is fully comparable with and not surpassed by either the midshipmen at Annapolis or the cadets at West Point.

The United States Coast Guard Academy at New London occupies approximately 45 acres situated on the west bank of the Thames River. The principal buildings, which are of Colonial Georgian architecture—including the cadet barracks and mess hall for 312 cadets; an administrative building; a library containing more than 17,000 volumes; a completely equipped hospital with X-ray and dental laboratories; an academic building housing classrooms and physics, chemistry, electrical, and radio laboratories; an engineering laboratory which contains a complete marine boiler and engine plant; also in this laboratory are a number of various types of engineering units which are completely torn down in cross section so that the students can visually study each and every part of the essential driving elements of any ship afloat or in the air; a lecture hall and engineering shop, a large armory and gymnasium with swimming pool in the basement; and numerous buildings of lesser importance. The insufficient playing fields include a football stadium and tennis courts. On the river front are a wharf, boathouse, and a field with ramps for seaplanes.

But this Coast Guard Academy is obviously deficient in certain things. It is obviously deficient in the number of small sailing craft to provide these boys with the necessary training in seamanship they require and which they can attain only by being on their own in their leisure hours, in a sailing craft. Secondly, it is deficient in the fact that there is not sufficient athletic equipment and space to permit those who do not make the varsity team or the scrub team to have all of the opportunities and the facilities that they desire or need to properly condition their bodies. Those are the problems to be solved by legislative authorization for which the Board of Visitors was created, and to learn of which we make our annual inspection.

The worst deficiency, however, at the Coast Guard Academy is the need for a chapel. What I cannot understand is this. That an academy built way back in the thirties and on which the public has spent something like $2,500,000, should have been built or even conceived in the first place without ample chapel facilities having been provided in the initial construction. Our Board of Visitors appointed a special committee to study this problem and to introduce legislation to see to it that adequate chapel facilities—church-like in appearance and atmosphere—should be made available at the earliest possible opportunity—and, incidentally, ladies and gentlemen, this will give you as big a kick as it gave me—we had before us in our meeting the student cadet commander of the cadet corps and asked him for his recommendations as to what he thought the boys needed at that school—the very first thing he told us was—they needed a chapel, they needed greater opportunity to meet with their Maker in a churchlike atmosphere; and I thought that was a fine spirit from a fine man and I wish you could have seen this young fellow because he is outstanding and the type boy that you and I would love to call our son.

While we were at New London overnight, the Board of Visitors and the advisory committee were all quartered in the homes of the various officers who serve as instructors at this great institution. After a review of the cadet battalion on Saturday, each of us was escorted by cadets from our own State into the main mess hall for lunch. I was very glad to find seven boys from our State of Michigan in the mess hall and with whom I was privileged to have lunch. My escorts were Cadet (2d cl.) C. R. Howard, of Detroit, and Cadet (3d cl.) C. I. Foss, of Pontiac. I was glad to have seated at our table Cadet (2d cl.) R. L. Kallin, of Escanaba, and Cadet (3d cl.) W. Schweinsberg, Jr., of Marquette.

All of these boys were disturbed by the fact that too few of our boys from the Great Lakes area are seen in the academy and that probably is due to the fact that they do not appreciate what a great institution the United States Coast Guard is nor what a great school they have at New London. As of May 1 this year, there are, for instance, 47 students from New York State, 33 from California, and only 7 from Michigan. Wake up, Michigan—appreciate what you have, and you kids there in Michigan come in there and join the Coast Guard—the greatest and the oldest branch of our armed navies there is afloat today.

And by the way, before I close—what about you girls? They are commissioning SPARS up there at New London after an 8 weeks' course. There are now approximately 60 of those girls at New London and they put on a close-order drill that made all of us sit up and take notice. The SPARS are being trained mainly to do office work, but their drilling is par excellence, believe you me. On our way back to Washington, Representative JOHN D. MCWILLIAMS, of Connecticut, and myself dropped off in New York for a few hours to see the new Coast Guard musical comedy entitled "Tars and Spars" playing at the Strand Theater. That show is scheduled to appear in Detroit sometime in July. If you get an opportunity to see it, folks, please go because I know it will tickle you pink.

It is an outstanding presentation full of the finest music produced by boys who have been in action on the coasts of Africa, Sicily, and Salerno in Italy. The star of the show is none other than Victor Mature, the famous motion picture and stage star, who, on combat duty with the Coast Guard, was within 300 yards of the famous Coast Guard cutter Escanaba when she was torpedoed and sunk in a space of 19 seconds. The whole show is an outstanding performance. It is designed primarily to increase the enlistments in the SPARS branch. Girls, you can serve your country by enlisting in the SPARS or in the WAVES or in the WAC's and relieve an able-bodied man for active combat duty at a time when his services are most needed by Uncle Sam.

Indeed the entire trip was the most enjoyable inspection trip it has been my privilege to make since coming to Congress. It is a distinct honor and privilege to serve as a member of the Board of Visitors of the United States Coast Guard Academy, the mission of which is "To graduate young men with sound bodies, stout hearts, and alert minds, with a liking for the sea and its lore, and with that high sense of honor, loyalty, and obedience which goes with trained initiative and leadership; well grounded in seamanship, the sciences, and the amenities, and strong in the resolve to be worthy of the traditions of commissioned officers of the United States Coast Guard in the service of their country and humanity." The academy's motto, "Scientiae cedit mare" (the sea yields to knowledge).

In closing, I sincerely hope that more of our boys from the Great Lakes area will become interested in the Coast Guard and, above all, in putting forth the necessary competitive effort to qualify for admission to this outstanding educational institution dedicated to knowledge of the sea and the defense of our beloved country. If any young man would like descriptive literature on the United States Coast Guard Academy, same is available upon request at my office.

School-Lunch Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LA VERN R. DILWEG

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. DILWEG. Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying to me to note that the Senate added an amendment to the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill for 1945 providing an appropriation to carry on a program commonly known as the school-lunch program.

The House Appropriations Committee, in the first instance, made no appropriation in the appropriation bill submitted by the Committee on Agriculture for the purpose of conducting this program, and it was my personal belief at that time, and is now, that conservation by eliminating this worth-while project was false economy.

I am firmly convinced that malnutrition is our greatest producer of ill health. I say, provide good meals for our children now and avoid physical defects later. I respectfully urge every Member of the House to give due consideration to this plan and expend funds for our children now which will pay incalculable dividends later. I am including in my extension of remarks an outline of the school-lunch program and how it operates:

THE SCHOOL-LUNCH PROGRAM AND HOW IT OPERATES

I. Who is entitled to participate in the school-lunch and milk program?

Every boy and girl in America of school and pre-school age.

II. What agencies are eligible to operate a program?

A. Schools:

1. Public.

2. Parochial (Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, etc.).

B. Welfare centers.

C. Nursery schools.

III. What is a school lunch?

There are three types:

Type A (9 cents): A complete lunch providing one-third to one-half of the day's nutritive requirements and consisting of at least: (1) One-half pint of milk as a beverage; (2) 2 ounces of meat or fish, or 1 egg or 2 ounces of cheese, or one-half cup of dried peas, beans, or soybeans, or one-fourth cup of peanut butter; (3) 1 cup of vegetables or fruit, or one-half cup of each; (4) 2 slices of bread or 2 muffins or other hot bread, made of whole grain or enriched flour or cereal; (5) 2 teaspoons of butter or oleomargarine with added vitamin A.

Type A (7 cents): Same as above except without milk.

Type B (6 cents): A lunch less adequate nutritionally and consisting of (1) one-half pint of milk as a beverage; (2) 1 ounce of meat or fish, or one-half of an egg, or 1 ounce of cheese, or one-fourth cup of dried peas, beans, soybeans, or two tablespoons of peanut butter; (3) one-half cup of vegetables or fruit; (4) two slices of bread or two muffins or other hot bread, made of whole grain or enriched flour or cereal; (5) one teaspoon of butter or oleomargarine with added vitamin A.

Type B (4 cents): Same as above except without milk.

Type C (2 cents): One-half pint of fluid milk.

IV. Is the school-lunch program served without charge?

No; except in cases where the child cannot afford to pay. Children who cannot pay are not embarrassed. No distinction or discrimination is made by the sponsor. In all about 10 percent of the participants are served free.

The price of milk to the child is served at about a maximum of 2 cents per half pint.

The type B lunch is served at a cost of 5 cents to the child.

The type A lunch is served at a cost of 10 to 20 cents to the child. In most cases the child, the community, or local sponsor pays more than 50 percent of the cost of the lunch.

V. How much does the Government pay for each type of lunch?

Type A: Complete meal with milk, 9 cents.

Type A: Complete meal without milk, 7 cents.

Type B: Light lunch with milk, 6 cents.

Type B: Light lunch without milk, 4 cents.

Type C: Milk only, 2 cents.

State participation in Illinois is 2 cents for a type A lunch. In the type C lunch a subsidy of 1 cent is added to the Government aid.

VI. Is this program intended to be solely a Federal-aid program?

No; with additional States enacting legislation, the program is taking on a Federal-State-and-community sponsorship, with each sharing the expenses.

VII. Is there regimentation in evidence?

No; each sponsor handles his own program. The school principal or lunchroom manager buys the food from the local meat and grocery store and submits a claim for approval to the county superintendent of schools, or the State superintendent of public instruction in States where the State is participating. In States where appropriations have not yet been authorized by State legislatures the claim is sent to the supervisor of the local department of agriculture.

VIII. Are there prescribed menus the agencies must use?

No; the Department of Agriculture sends out monthly bulletins with suggested low-cost menus for well-balanced meals filled with vitamin content. However, the lunch must conform to nutritional standards prescribed by the Department of Agriculture. The sponsor is given a widespread choice of foods that are considered nutritious.

IX. Does the Government provide for the cost of labor?

No; the Government subsidy provides only money for food. The community's local sponsor, or the child's payment, defrays labor costs. In some communities the P. T. A. and other organizations prepare and serve lunches on a voluntary basis. The responsibility for preparation and serving is placed on the local agency and not on the Government.

X. How many schools now participate in this program?

About 30,000 schools, totaling nearly 5,000,000 children. In Illinois 1,600 schools, with an enrollment of more than 600,000 participate.

XI. Are children forced to participate in the program?

No; children may or may not participate, according to their own wishes. However, in schools where formerly less than 10 percent of the children bought milk at 5 cents per bottle, nearly every child now receives the milk at a cost of 2 cents or less under the Federal school-lunch programs.

XII. Are surplus foods used in the lunch program?

Yes; when they are available. After the war all surplus foods, particularly those in warehouses, can be placed to good use through school-lunch channels under the supervision of the United States Department of Agriculture.

XIII. To what extent will the lunch program develop in America?

Because it is health insurance it is expected every child in America will soon receive the benefit of school lunches. It is just as important as learning the A B C's to have a strong body and a sound mind. In the depression the program kept children from being hungry; now it serves to prevent children from being undernourished.

XIV. What do parents in general think about the program?

A tremendous amount of inquiries has been made by parents as to how to prepare food for home use that the children have learned to eat at school. A wider spread diet is also in evidence in the homes of children who eat school lunches. In areas where only pork and starches were used before now there is a great demand for lamb, veal, fowl, beef and assorted vegetables.

XV. What is the motive behind the program?

Strong and healthy future citizens.

With the steady increase each day of mothers in war work it is most important that the Government cooperate to assure each school child that his health will not be neglected.

Federal-State and community participation is now resulting in community cooking schools to teach American housewives the necessity and responsibility of the use of more healthful foods.

XVI. Why can't the entire cost of the school-lunch program be borne by the local community?

Even though the economic structure in the Nation has in the main increased, there are still many millions of wage earners who have received little or no pay raises whatsoever. This is especially true in certain sections of the country. The white-collar man has perhaps suffered more than anyone else in this regard.

XVII. Is it not possible that the State should assume the entire cost of this program?

This will take time. The program is now operating with State aid in cooperation with the Government in 26 States. Because the mechanism is not set up to continue the program, without Federal assistance more than half of the agencies receiving these benefits would be eliminated. Work is being done along these lines for State and community aid.

XVIII. What agency is best prepared to carry on this program?

The Department of Agriculture is best fitted to carry on this program because that Department specializes in food itself and also because it would avoid duplication if the program is assigned to another department. This is especially true in the case of the handling of surplus foods when they will be available in greater quantities in the future.

In summing up the school-lunch program in general, it is imperative to the health of our children that House bill 4278, which calls for at least a temporary set up, should be passed.

Calling F. D. R. Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PERCY PRIEST
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I desire to include here an editorial from the Nashville Tennesseean, of May 16, 1944, entitled "Calling F. D. R. Again."

It is my belief that the editorial which follows expresses the sentiment of a vast majority of the American people in these crucial and critical days:

CALLING F. D. R. AGAIN

The emphatic action of Democratic State conventions and of Democratic voters in the election of delegates to the forthcoming National Democratic Convention already have cinched the fact—which, furthermore, has never really been in question—that Franklin D. Roosevelt for a fourth term is the choice of the Democrats of America by an overwhelming majority.

The President, if he shall be a candidate, will be nominated by the convention in Chicago on the first ballot, and there is no doubt but that the nomination will be by acclamation.

This newspaper fervently hopes that Mr. Roosevelt will accept the honor and the service that is offered him by his fellow Democrats; that he will take up the nomination in the spirit of duty; that in this spirit he will accede to the unmistakable call of his country that he continue another 4 years in the White House to guide the Nation wisely through the war to victory, and through the hazards that threaten the establishment of a lasting peace afterward, the public welfare requiring it.

The Tennesseean appreciates, as does the vast majority of Americans, that in the past 12 years Mr. Roosevelt has given to his country a service of devotion that entitles him to the peace and rest which he may choose. Whether or not he continues at the post a: which destiny and the will of the people have placed him, his chapter in history as one of the greatest of the Presidents of the United States and one of the great world leaders of his day is secure.

This newspaper shares with most Americans the conviction, nevertheless, that Mr. Roosevelt, because of the singular experience he possesses in dealing with the momentous problems that have been brought to our Nation and to the world by war, because of the quality of his vision toward the future, because of his manifest and unwavering humanitarianism, and because of the high confidence and affection he holds in the hearts of the people, is the citizen best found to administer and protect the affairs of the Nation in the decisive years immeditately before us.

We see nowhere on the contemporary scene a figure more capable of coping with the duties and powers of the American Presidency, and certainly none in whom so great a popular trust reposes.

The Democratic Party is making no mistake in displaying its all-but-unanimous choice for Mr. Roosevelt even though the President has not indicated a willingness to accept the nomination again. To have made any other choice would have shown the party to be without understanding of the desires of the American people. And it is because the party speaks not only for the political organization, but for men and women of America in all walks of life, that Mr. Roosevelt should deeply consider the compulsion of the popular claim upon him which the proffered nomination expresses.

The common yeople of the United States have neither forgotten their affection for the man who led the Nation out of the economic and spiritual distress of its greatest depression nor their esteem for the patriot and statesman who so clearly understood the national jeopardy in the rise of totalitarian aggression in the world and ceaselessly strove to prepare America to defend its security. Unquestionably it is their judgment that their welfare best will be assured, at home and abroad, by the Presidential guidance with which they are familiar. And there could be no happier outcome of the American political question in 1944 than that Mr. Roosevelt should bow to the people's bidding to continue to serve.

There is hardly a family in the United States that does not have a son or a father or a cousin or an uncle in the armed forces, or a daughter or sister in the WAC's, the WAVES, the SPARS, the Nurse Corps, or the Red Cross. These are defendants of the Nation in the greatest military force America has ever built—and the President is their Commander in Chief. With the really crucial days of the war now arriving, it is impossible to imagine that the Commander will leave his command—or that the Nation would not uphold the Commander.

Cooperation of Air and Surface Carriers for National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly pointed out the policy of the Civil Aeronautics Board in opposition to transportation by water in connection with the use of airplanes. The efforts of surface carriers to secure necessary permits to use air transportation in connection with water transportation by merchant marine ships are of the prime importance in the national defense and in the promotion of foreign trade for this country.

Decisions have been made by the Board which I conceive to be wholly incorrect and are serving effectually to establish a situation which is wholly inconsistent with a correct national post-war military policy. As a member of the Post-war Military Policy Committee, I wrote recently to the chairman of that committee calling for certain material which I conceive to be essential to a correct military policy. I am a member of that committee, and I believe that the information is very necessary and desire the fullest information possible concerning the effect of the present and future policies of the present Civil Aeronautics Board on the future military policy of the United States. The letter which I wrote Chairman WOODRUM, and which I have sent to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1944.

Hon. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM,
Chairman, Special Committee on Post-war Military Policy, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CLIFF: In connection with our study of post-war military problems, I think that there should be submitted by the Navy to our committee a comprehensive survey of the needs of merchant marine as well as Navy ships during the post-war period and the volume of tonnage with different types that will be required for an adequate Navy. It is possible that the volume of merchant marine tonnage required as an auxiliary would vary as to different programs of the Navy, for example, assuming a Navy size (X) covering combatant ships and auxiliaries permanently going with and belonging to such a combatant Navy there would be required a merchant marine of size (A); for a Navy size (Y), a merchant marine size (B) would be required; and for a Navy size (Z), a merchant marine size (C) would be required, etc.

From a national defense angle there is a direct relationship between the Navy and the merchant marine and it is believed the General Board of the Navy could give our committee valuable advice regarding the post-war requirements and the relative sizes of both.

Anticipating that we will maintain our present naval strength, how large a merchant marine should be maintained to meet any emergency? That is, for every million tons of naval ships, how many tons of merchant shipping will be required as an auxiliary to meet such an emergency?

Yours very sincerely,

S. O. BLAND.

There are many applications pending before the Civil Aeronautics Board. It seems to me that the Board ignores all ideas of national defense and pursues a policy devoted to monopolistic protection for air transportation and a policy which ignores the importance of air transportation connected with ships in the defense of the country. The legalistic construction placed upon existing statutes by the Civil Aeronautics Board gives evidence that it feels that it is responsible only for the promotion of air transportation, while the course of the present war shows that all agencies must cooperate and be used cooperatively for the defense of the country.

The endeavor of surface carriers to engage in air transportation has aroused serious controversy as a result of the decision of the Civil Aeronautics Board in a case wherein the American Export Lines, Inc., sought to obtain the approval of the Civil Aeronautics Board under section 408 (b) of the Civil Aeronautics Board of 1938, as amended, of its control over American Export Airlines. The underlying principle of this decision has made it difficult, if not impossible, for steamship companies to enter the field of operation. The recent introduction into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of a letter from the Pacific American Steamship Association to the Honorable CLARENCE F. LEA, chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, appearing in the Appendix of the RECORD at page A1786 and the reply thereto by the Honorable LYLE H. BOREN appearing in the Appendix of the RECORD at page A2161 may give rise to unnecessary confusion as to the present effect of the rulings of the Civil Aeronautics Board relative to the participation of the maritime industry in aviation. There is no possible doubt as to the present attitude of the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Mr. Harllee Branch, member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, on November 11, 1943, stated:

The Board has determined that the provisions of the Civil Aeronautics Act rigidly restrict the participation of the older forms of transportation in the air transport field, and this determination is amply supported by well-established congressional policy.

George C. Neil, general counsel of the Civil Aeronautics Board, in the Georgetown Law Journal, May 1943, on Some Phases of Air Transport Regulation, said:

The American Export case (decided by Civil Aeronautics Board) may lead to the exclusion with few exceptions of surface carriers from the air transport field.

The Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, as amended, contains the following proviso which is the essential part of the issue presently effecting the American merchant marine in its endeavor to obtain rights to enter the field of aviation. Section 408 (b) of the act provides in part:

Unless * * * the Authority finds that the consolidation * * * or acquisition of control will not be consistent with the public interest or that the conditions of this section will not be fulfilled, it shall by order, approve such consolidation * * * or acquisition of control, upon such terms and conditions as it shall find to be just and reasonable and with such modifications as it may prescribe: Provided, That the Authority shall not approve any consolidation * * * or acquisition of control which would result in creating a monopoly or monopolies and thereby restrain competition or jeopardize another air carrier not a party to the consolidation * * * or acquisition of control: Provided further, That * * * the Authority shall not enter such an order of approval unless it finds that the transaction proposed will promote the public interest by enabling such carrier other than an air carrier to use aircraft to public advantage in its operation and will not restrain competition.

On August 23, 1943, the Civil Aeronautics Board in the matter of the application of the Boston & Maine Railroad and Maine Central R. R. Co. with respect to their interest in Northeast Airlines, Inc., under section 408 of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, as amended, stated:

The provisions of section 408 carry into the Civil Aeronautics Act a well-established national policy that the various forms of transportation should be mutually independent. That this has long been the prevailing congressional intent is conclusively established by the legislative background of the various transportation acts and by the language of the Civil Aeronautics Act itself. We are convinced that a construction of this act which rigidly limits the participation of other forms of transportation in the air-transport field is in harmony with the intent of Congress, and is necessary to attain a full and sound development of our national air-transportation system.

Congressional action clearly indicates a conclusion that the public interest requires that the various forms of transportation be kept distinct, so that each can operate in its own sphere independently of the others. We must therefore scrutinize carefully each situation in which there exists a relationship between an air carrier and another common carrier in order to determine, first, if there has been an acquisition of control within the meaning of the act; and if so, whether such acquisition would be consistent with the public interest and in accord with the provisions of section 408 (b).

On January 26, 1944, L. Welch Pogue, Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board, in testifying before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives, on House Resolution 52, a resolution authorizing investigation of the national defense program as it relates to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, said:

Since we were told by the court that we had to apply the second proviso of section 408, we looked to see what construction a similar section in the Motor Carrier Act had received when Congress enacted it again in the Civil Aeronautics Act. The broad general policy that that construction had laid down was that this proviso was quite a strict proviso and required the services which were to be controlled to be auxiliary and supplementary to the surface carrier operations. We felt bound by that general policy that Congress had laid down.

Mr. Pogue further stated, in discussing the growth of air travel and the problems of maintaining a strong American merchant marine if shipping companies are not allowed to compete in aviation in foreign commerce:

To the extent that passenger business does take to the air the large investments in the steamship passenger vessels will have to be written off one way or the other. That is one of the prices we have to pay for what you call progress and that writing off will have to take place regardless of whether or not the steamships are in the air business. * * * We have to apply the proviso in all cases. We are doing it. I want to be frank and make it clear that we are not in favor of changing the law or removing the restrictions now that it has gone that far.

Mr. Pogue, in answer to a question, stated at this hearing that he presently did not think the policy of Congress should be changed from either the standpoint of the merchant marine or the security of our country because he thought that the most vigorous development and growth of foreign air transportation would result from a continuance of the present policy adopted by the Civil Aeronautics Board by retaining the restrictive proviso which is now in the law because in the over-all picture the development of aviation would be better served if it were left to independent air companies although not to new companies necessarily.

Admiral Land, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, has stated:

The decisions of the Civil Aeronautics Board appear to overlook the problem of control of air lines as one affecting the position of the United States in world trade. Progress is a fact and world changes demand administrative genius unhampered by local convention or rule. America is to Persia or China or Russia but a far-off place to be reached quickly for its wealth and opportunity. Persia, China, and Russia must be actualities to America. These places are reached now by our merchant marine. American commerce, its development and growth, must not be stinted and thwarted by any administrative ruling which would say to the maritime industry in effect, "You cannot have new rights, new hopes, new ambitions. What was good enough for father is good enough for you." Such is not the spirit of America—yesterday, today, and will not be tomorrow. I believe that there should exist equal opportunity in the air for all, under progressive constructive governmental regulations, whose objectives are a prosperous and secure foreign trade as well as domestic commerce, national defense as well as international greatness, preclusion of the merchant marine from aeronautics stifles these objectives.

Mr. Speaker, the language of the official representatives of the Civil Aeronautics Board is clear. Can there be any doubt that the attitude of this governmental agency is one of restriction against and limitation upon steamship company participation in aeronautics.

Disenfranchisement by order of an admittedly partial, prejudiced, Civil Aeronautics Board is neither a fitting nor just reward for the magnificent maritime contribution toward ultimate American victory.

I Am an American Day, May 21

REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, May 21, is the day set aside by Presidential proclamation as the day the Nation, with soul-stirring democratic ceremonies, recognizes all American citizens who have either attained their majority or become naturalized during the past year.

On that day, throughout the length and breadth of our glorious land, thousands of our citizens will take the oath of allegiance, with proper and solemn observances.

In effect, our founding fathers speak to these new members of the grandest fraternity of free men and women ever established on this earth, saying: "You are now Americans. As Americans, you acquire certain unalienable rights, among them, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. As Americans, you also assume certain responsibilities coequal with these rights: among them, your full share of the day's burden, true tolerance, and patriotism, complete and unqualified. As Americans, you enter upon a proud heritage of hope and opportunity and freedom, bought with bloodshed and sacrifice and toil and tears. See, then, that you bear yourselves toward your fellow Americans, toward your city, your State, and your country, in all things whatsoever so that the spirit of Jefferson may rejoice and the soul of Lincoln be gladdened. Welcome, new Americans, and God preserve, protect, and prosper you."

Never, in our entire history as a nation, has the privilege of being or becoming an American citizen carried with it greater duties and greater responsibilities. Our country is now engaged in a titanic struggle against the most ruthless and treacherous tyranny the world has ever known. Thousands upon thousands of our new citizens, shoulder to shoulder with their native-born brothers and sisters, are fighting and falling heroically on all the far-flung fields of battle; every beach head, from Tarawa to Anzio, has been enriched with their blood and their courage; the dangerous seas and the desperate skies have resounded with their deeds and their deaths. In common with their brothers-in-arms, on the war front and the home front, in the savage assault of some hell-defended hill or in the grinding toil of farm and factory, these new Americans are dedicating their lives, day and night, to the eternal principles of liberty and equality and justice, to the "four freedoms" of the Atlantic Charter, freedom of speech and freedom of conscienee, freedom from want and freedom from fear.

In this momentous hour, it is especially fitting that all Americans, as loyal and patriotic citizens of this great Republic, should meet together to reaffirm our allegiance to Old Glory that waves over one Nation indivisible and to the ideals for which that Nation stands. It is indeed incumbent upon each and every one of us to rededicate ourselves with all our strength, with all our hearts and souls, under God, to the tremendous task of victory and the long labor of peace.

Commissioner of Indian Affairs

REMARKS

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this brief time in order to read to the House a letter I have written to the Secretary of the Interior concerning the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which, in my judgment, disqualifies him for the office he now holds. I, therefore, feel justified in respectfully demanding that the Commissioner be removed from office. The letter giving one of the high spots of the evidence furnished me by the Comptroller General is as follows:

MAY 18, 1944.

Hon. HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On May 8 I addressed a communication to you advising that your Commissioner of Indian Affairs had testified before the Interior Subcommittee on Appropriations, of which I have the honor of being chairman, with reference to the use of Government funds in establishing a so-called legal residence in the State of Nevada during last summer.

Members of the committee had understood from his rambling testimony that the Commissioner claimed to be on active duty the entire 42 days required to establish a legal residence in the State of Nevada. Today I have been furnished with a statement of the travel performed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs prepared by the Comptroller General of the United States. According to the records before me, as certified by the Comptroller General, the Commissioner drew per diem of $6 per day for a total of 27 days, from July 6, the day he left Washington, D. C., to secure his divorce, until and including August 4, 1943. The Comptroller General's letter further discloses that he stopped over in Chicago for 2 days between July 6 and 8 and took up residence in Nevada on July 11. The pretext that he was on active duty "inspecting Indian reservations" for a total of 27 days during this time, for which he received $6 per diem, is, of course, absurd. Also, the fact that he immediately upon arrival in Carson City took annual and sick leave is further convincing evidence that the only purpose of the trip was to secure a divorce at Government expense.

In my previous letter to you concerning this matter I mentioned other reprehensible conduct on the part of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and indicated that my committee is strongly of the opinion that the Commissioner is unfit for the position he holds and has lost the confidence of the Members of Congress, the Indians, and others who know of his general inefficiency. To say that he is a weak administrator is indeed to be charitable. He should be immediately removed from office.

May I express the hope that you not further ignore this matter but that you immediately investigate the things referred to. I am enclosing herwith a copy of some of the information I have received from the Comptroller General as to the expenditure of Government funds by the Commissioner.

In addition to the above facts, gleaned from the record of the Comptroller General, permit me to remind you that the over-burdened taxpayers of the United States paid all of the expenses of transportation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs by train and otherwise to and from his sojourn to Nevada in order that he might establish his residence for the aforementioned purpose.

Sincerely yours,

JED JOHNSON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Interior Department Appropriations.

Measure Your Congressman by These Three Tests

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article by Robert Lasch, which appeared in the Chicago Sun of May 15, 1944:

MEASURE YOUR CONGRESSMAN BY THESE THREE TESTS

It is a fascinating thing to study the voting record of your Congressman. The rhetoric and oratory that normally clothe him fall away, and he stands naked and revealed before you. Here he is, the essence of him, enshrined in ayes and nays. Here is the sum of his past behavior, and here the best index of his future behavior.

Different people measure their Congressmen in different ways. A farmer may look at the votes on farm measures, a worker at the labor issues, and so on. This year, for average citizens with no strong group affiliations, the best test is a triple one.

AN ISOLATIONIST?

First I'd want to know how my Congressman voted on issues of foreign policy. The House had three such issues before it during the past 2 years—extension of the Trade Agreement Act, the Fulbright resolution for a peace organization, and the United Nations relief authorization. A man who stood against these three measures, or against two of the three, has branded himself an isolationist, and unfit, in my opinion, to sit in a Congress which may make the peace.

Since foreign policy is not the only great issue before us, I'd also want to know how my Congressman voted on economic questions, and particularly on inflation control. A man who did not stand up for effective price control during the war is not one I'd want to trust with the critical economic problems of the post-war transition.

Finally, to get a clue toward his general outlook on democracy and civil rights, I'd look up my Congressman's record on pertinent questions in that field. The most pertinent of all is the soldier-vote bill. A second is the Dies committee, which has hounded decent people for years because they had liberal convictions. A third is the anti-poll-tax bill. I'd want my Congressman to be right on at least two of these three measures. Above all I'd want him to be right on the soldier vote. For if he was unwilling to give the servicemen free and simple access to a ballot, what might he not do in a future test of democratic rights?

DEMOCRATS VOTED RIGHT

You may like the six Democratic Congressmen from Chicago or not, but the fact is that their voting records in these three test areas are uniformly good. Representatives DAWSON, GORDON, GORSKI, O'BRIEN, ROWAN, and SABATH all went down the line for a foreign policy of international cooperation. They supported effective price control at every opportunity. They opposed the Dies Committee and supported the Federal ballot for soldiers.

House Resolution No. 547

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, the Indianapolis Star, one of the great newspapers of America, published by Eugene C. Pulliam, approves House Resolution No. 547, which I have introduced, which provides for a nonpartisan congressional investigation of the Federal bureaucracy and unconstitutional trends of Government. The Star's opinion of this proposal was expressed in an editorial, which I present for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

CURB BUREAUCRACY'S MENACE

Representative LUDLOW has introduced in the House of Representatives a resolution asking Congress for official recognition of the menace of bureaucracy. He proposes to take the bull by the horns. There has been a lot of talk about the baleful effects of bureaucracy, but talk without action accomplishes nothing. He calls on Congress to do something, and do it now.

Mr. LUDLOW'S resolution would authorize the Judiciary Committee of the House to make an investigation of "bureaucracy" and the "unconstitutional trends of government" and report its findings to the present Congress. "The number of alphabetical agencies has outgrown the number of regular departments of government 10 to 1," the resolution states, and threatens "the form and mold of our government."

The purpose of his resolution, Mr. LUDLOW declared, "Is to take the first step to bring our Government back within the bounds of the Constitution and keep it there." He does not start with any false notions of the critical state of affairs. He recognizes that, in following the development of bureaucracy, we are out of bounds and running wild.

Representative LUDLOW does undertake to salve some official consciences regarding the growth of bureaucracy by the suggestion that "many of these aberrations are due to the exigencies of war and the unusual character of the times through which we have been passing." We were well on the way, however, long before the war.

Mr. LUDLOW voices the hope that corrective measures may be undertaken in a spirit of cooperation and "free from the sordid dictates of politics." That is optimism carried to the *n*th degree.

Unfortunately not all who might be expected to lend assistance have Mr. LUDLOW'S candor. Some do not concede there is any deviation from the Constitution. Others admit there has been, but contend the Constitution should be interpreted to cover what they are doing.

He thinks the investigation should have the support of every Democrat and Republican in Congress. He is right. It should be a patriotic, nonpartisan survey made to determine just what is the situation and what should be done. The task should be the responsibility and obligation of new dealers as well as of Democrats and Republicans, all Americans together.

Tonnage Output Under Program of Maritime Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from Admiral Vickery, of the Maritime Commission, showing tonnage output under the Maritime Commission's program through April 1944. The information shown on the chart is similar to the information contained in the letter and for this reason the chart is omitted.

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., May 13, 1944.

The Honorable S. O. BLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives.

DEAR JUDGE BLAND: Believing it will be of interest to you, I am enclosing a chart showing tonnage output under the Maritime Commission's program through April 1944.

During April, United States merchant shipyards delivered 154 ships, the total deadweight of which was 1,593,691 tons. This exceeded March deliveries, and the total for the first 4 months of this year, 5,709,642 tons, surpassed the 5,360,712 tons completed during the corresponding period in 1943. Merchant shipyard output from December 7, 1941, through April 30, 1944, aggregated 3,215 ships of 33,130,175 tons, or more than half the estimated world tonnage at the time of Pearl Harbor.

Ship-production rates, however, are now governed principally by manpower, the supply of which is diminishing. This limitation has already forced some revision of ship-delivery schedules, and accordingly the Commission is concentrating upon the types of vessels most urgently needed in order to avoid or minimize delays in their construction. As a result, more fast cargo ships, standard tankers, and transports were delivered last month than ever before.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

H. L. VICKERY, Commissioner.

The G. I. Bill of Rights Worthy Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of S. 1767, the G. I. bill of rights. It has been given thorough consideration by various groups interested in veterans' legislation and by the Appropriation Committees of the Senate and of the House. It has many features of great interest to them to know that we are thinking of their welfare while they are fighting on the battlefields of the world.

All American citizens want every possible consideration shown these disabled, in mind and in body, as a result of this war. The facilities available to the veterans of the last war will be likewise available to those of this World War. The 100,000 hospital beds of the Veterans' Bureau will be immediately available when they are needed, and in addition to this, 100,000 additional hospital beds will be available under this bill by loan from the Army and the Navy to the Veterans' Administration. If the hospital load is heavier than this—additional hospital facilities will have to be built. This bill gives the Veterans' Administration full authority to build the additional facilities which may be needed from time to time, subject only to the necessary appropriations available.

The new hospitals to be built when needed should be made of permanent material, and they should be as fine as engineers can devise and money can buy. They should be built throughout the length and breadth of the land where they are needed, and in locating them, reference should be made to the climate, geographical advantages and general environment.

The statutes which are presently available to disabled veterans of World War No. 1 should likewise immediately be made available to veterans of World War No. 2. These statutes will give pensions to our disabled ranging from $10 to $250 per month, depending upon the nature and the extent of the disability.

After the last war our governmental agencies were not so constituted as to begin promptly to function. Many disabled veterans filed their applications timely, but found to their misfortune that no action was promptly taken. A great "log jam" of applications from veterans, all disabled, had paralyzed the hands of the Veterans' Administration.

The fact that this bill gives the Veterans' Administration a priority on personnel, second only to the Army and Navy, is our guaranty that this distressing situation will not repeat itself. The further fact that Congress is proceeding at an early date to enact necessary enabling laws is further guaranty that our Government will act promptly this time, and that this situation will not repeat itself.

More than 5,000 veterans monthly are moving through the Veterans' Administration hospitals at the present time. Already over 40,000 have been hospitalized, and the number is constantly increasing. It was testified at the House hearings on this bill that the peak load of disabilities may not come for 25 years after the war, and at that time it may reach a total of 1,250,000 men and women veterans who have disabilities of some character. This is an enormous number but whatever the number may be, it is our obligation as citizens of a grateful Nation to make sure that these disabled veterans are properly cared for.

I am also greatly interested in the advantages this bill gives veterans to carry on their education and to learn an avocation or profession. Some people will say that it is too early to pass a bill of this kind. I do not agree with this conclusion. Many servicemen have already been discharged. We should have the machinery set up to give them hospitalization and educational advantages as quickly as possible. We must do everything possible to minimize the time lag between the time when a serviceman is discharged and the time when he can take his proper place in civilian life. The educational features of this bill have been well worked out. I am glad some of the amendments suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] have been agreed to. I think the compromise is a fair one. Other improvements will no doubt be made in the bill in conference.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel that this legislation is fair and certainly it is timely. The least we can do is to do justice to returning servicemen. The early passage of this bill will enable the Veterans' Administration to be preparing for the big job that it will have. I am glad that they are to be able to get an early start. I hope the legislation passes without a dissenting vote.

I Am an American Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 22, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include my remarks made in Detroit on Sunday, May 21, 1944, on I Am an American Day:

The human race all over the world has fought for freedom and liberty. It was in America, however, that the greatest victory for the common man was achieved. Our Constitution, our form of government, our principles of democracy represent the greatest achievement in the peoples' struggle for liberty and freedom. Here to America have come the persecuted and downtrodden of every race and creed and nationality, from every corner of the world, to be fused together in the great American crucible. Out of this vast mass of diverse nationalities and peoples from all over the world has emerged the greatest miracle of the world—an American. The skeptics could never comprehend that it was possible to throw into this crucible, this melting pot, the United States of America, these various peoples from all over the world and have anything else but a Babylonia of confusion.

But the people who thirsted and hungered for freedom and liberty have proven to the world that they can be melted and molded and stand forever united in their struggle to preserve democracy and the principles of Americanism. These Americans have shown to the world that they can build not only spiritual fortresses but physical fortresses as well to defend their liberties from all threats. Freedom of speech, press, assembly, and religion are sacred principles for all of us and no enemy must infringe on these God-given liberties.

We have had five major wars in our history. We are engaged in our sixth great struggle for American ideals of freedom. This war has a meaning far beyond its causes or its origins. It started as a struggle of powerful groups for political mastery and military supremacy. It has grown into a struggle to make sure who shall build the future. It is a struggle of minds, as well as men and machines. Into this struggle have been poured all the problems that touch us most vitally—race, religion, politics, economics—the very subsistence of entire peoples.

It is not enough that professors, economists, and politicians understand American principles and American ideals. It is the duty of every American citizen to be informed, to be well read, to have a deep and sincere understanding of America and American ideals and principles. Each and every one of us is duty bound to be intelligently informed and sacredly pledged to the support of the principles of freedom and liberty and to have the sincere conviction that if the universal dissemination of the true American principles is applied that we can guarantee that the chance of new wars occurring in the post-war world will become remote. We must, in other words, become salesmen for Americanism.

The system of the American Government is our great heritage. The democratic spirit is our inheritance. It must be cherished and preserved. This spirit of freedom is inborn, invincible, and ineradicable in the true American.

Americans are good people. America is great because she is good. When America is no longer good, then she will no longer be great. We must speak up for the "four freedoms" for the Atlantic Charter; we must support lowered trade barriers and tariffs, a freer world trade, a better standard of living for all of the people. We cannot become isolationists and remain aloof from the world.

In 1831, 113 years ago, a brilliant Frenchman toured the United States. Our country was still very young then. The name of this Frenchman was De Tocqueville. On his return to France he wrote the following:

"During my journey throughout America I sought for the secret of the genius and the greatness of America; I sought for her genius and greatness and growth and glory in her rich soils, in her rich mines, her great forests, her fallow fields, her ample rivers and noble harbors; but I did not discover it there. I further sought for the reason for her growth and her glory and her genius and her greatness, and I found it in her matchless Constitution; I found it in her schools, churches, and homes, ablaze with righteousness. It was there in her Constitution, in her homes, in her schools, in her churches that I found the true secret of the source of America's genius and greatness."

Dictators and militarists come and go. But America—democracy, our great Constitution, our form of government—stands firm and solid. On this day let us solemnly reaffirm: "I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all." Let us pray and give thanks to the Lord for His blessings. Let us humbly give thanks for our privilege and inheritance—"I am an American."

C. A. A. Flyers To Forestall Attempt To Set Physical Limit Too High

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial from the May 19, 1944, issue of the Washington Daily News, written by Ruth Sarles:

C. A. A. FLYERS TO FORESTALL ATTEMPT TO SET PHYSICAL LIMIT TOO HIGH

(By Ruth Sarles)

Congressional supporters of men non-combat flyers grounded through abandonment of the Civil Aeronautics Administration War Training Service program will move to forestall an expected attempt by the War Department to set the physical requirements so high the men cannot qualify, it was learned today.

This plan came to light yesterday, along with the report that the Army Air Forces will apply their "brush-off" regulation (No. 50–7) to the C. A. A.-W. T. S. men, revising them to set the qualifications beyond the men's reach. This regulation specifying requirements for Army flyers is reported to be a flexible one, used in some cases to keep men out, and in others to get them in, and can be changed overnight.

IN AMENDMENT

The congressional move will take the form of an amendment to the bill militarizing the WASPS (Women Air Service Pilots) and the C. A. A.-W. T. S. men, expected to reach the House floor next week. The amendment will provide that the men shall not be required to meet different standards than those required at the time of enlistment in the Reserve Corps.

In the background of the congressional move was a case at a southern training center where a group of C. A. A.-W. T. S. men, passed by Army doctors in September 1943, were rejected for physical reasons the following February. In the 5-month interim, apparently, some of them had developed flat feet, too much height, and other defects that could not possibly have developed within 5 months.

MOOT QUESTION

Gen. H. H. "Hap" Arnold, Chief of the Army Air Forces, appeared yesterday before a closed session of the Ramspeck civil service investigating committee, it was reported, for the purpose of "calming down" the impending committee report on the WASPS, said to recommend complete abandonment of the WASPS. The women fliers' program has been under fire on the ground that there is no need to train women fliers with as little as 35 hours' flying time for ferrying and other noncombat duty while a pool of around 11,000 CAA-WTS men with from 200 to 2,000 hours is available.

Whether General Arnold's visit to the Ramspeck committee will result in changing the tone of the report is a moot question, since reports of the impression he made vary.

General Arnold was said to have defended the WASP program as he did before the House Military Affairs Committee and assured the committee that the men were getting every break for flying jobs they were qualified to fill.

The committee will meet again to take action on the report submitted by investigators.

The general's testimony came in the face of reports of mounting dissatisfaction among Army officials at high command support of the WASPS. One report from a reliable source says that Army flying officers who have refused to take WASPS at their fields, because they already have enough pilots, are being forced to take them.

ANOTHER WASP DIES

Meanwhile, news of one more WASP death trickled into Washington, bringing the total to 21. Miss M. E. Sharon, Long Beach, Calif., is reported in a Tecumseh, Nebr., paper to have been killed on April 12.

Early reports were confirmed that a contributing factor in the defeat at the primaries of Representative JOHN M. COSTELLO, Democrat, California, was his sponsorship of the bill to militarize the WASPS, with news that grounded unemployed pilots in his district quietly worked against him through friends and families.

Survival of American Free Government and Free Enterprise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Will American Free Government and Free Enterprise Survive?" by Hector M. Aring, member of the Board of Review, the George Washington University Victory Council, Washington, D. C. This is an exceedingly vital and thoughtful article, and I believe it should be of general interest.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILL AMERICAN FREE GOVERNMENT AND FREE ENTERPRISE SURVIVE?

(By Hector M. Aring, member, board of review, the George Washington University Victory Council; vice president, Johns-Manville International Corporation)

Any rational analysis of the question of the survival of free government as we know it in America, meaning government by consent of the governed, necessarily involves an analysis of free enterprise. By free enterprise I mean the orderly process of production and distribution of goods on a properly regulated competitive basis under a system of competitive capitalism.

The first declaration for free government and free enterprise in the United States of America is found in the Declaration of Independence:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Our American system of government would not have survived the vicissitudes through which it has already passed had it not been that our economic system was based on free enterprise. Conversely, free enterprise would never have grown to its present magnitude and efficiency had it not been based upon and protected by free government as expressed in the Bill of Rights.

It is difficult to conceive of free government existing where a controlled enterprise operates. It is not possible to conceive of free enterprise remaining free under conditions where the compulsions of governmental control, as differentiated from proper governmental regulations, are substituted for the compulsions and incentives of free enterprise, initiative, imagination, and courage. Competitive capitalism has persisted in the United States because in the last analysis American public opinion has been unreceptive to the postulates and practices of alternative economic systems.

This Nation was originally founded upon the concept of free agriculture and free industry, operated by men who had cast off the fetters of a foreign tyranny. Free enterprise, motivated by individual initiative, has grown from the right of men to own the land they tilled, the oxen they drove, and the boats they operated on the waterways, up through every gradation of community industry and, finally, into the modern concept of aggregated industries. Regardless of the existence of many large-scale corporate enterprises, it nevertheless remains a fact that the foundation of free government and free enterprise in the United States of America is still in the small, locally owned and operated industries.

Industries employing 500 persons and under give work to 64.8 percent of all the wage-earners of the Nation. They produce 60.6 percent of all the goods and services produced in the Nation.

Free enterprise is the essence of free government because it is the people, the consumers, who are constantly exercising in their choice of goods and services that high degree of selectivity which in turn constitutes both a compulsion and an incentive for competitive enterprises constantly to strive to produce better goods and services and to reduce costs and prices. Such a constant, discriminating selectivity could not possibly be exercised by any government, no matter how able and efficient the heads of governmental bureaus might be. It was precisely through such wise compulsion and incentive that the American free enterprise system was forced and encouraged to experiment, to study, to strive for better quality and more efficient methods until we reached that state of productive efficiency which has enabled American industry to overcome in about 3 years the concentrated efforts and all of the skill in war preparation exercised in Germany for 12 years under Hitler; in Italy for 20 years under Mussolini; and in Japan for 40 years under the War Lords.

Economic democracy is inseparable from political democracy. Our free Government is always under the same system of discriminating selectivity because every 2 years the people choose all of their Representatives and a third of their Senators, and every 4 years select their President. Such frequent elections also characterize State, county, and local governments. The people's privileges under the Bill of Rights have enabled them to exercise the same degree of criticism, the same degree of acceptance or rejection, the same degree of approval or disapproval of the acts and policies of their public servants that they have exercised in their selection of goods and services produced by their industries. Those compulsions, and those compulsions alone, operated to inspire and build our great system of American free government, as they operated to inspire and build our great system of free enterprise in this Nation; and those two great systems plus the rich, natural resources with which this Nation was blessed, compose that bounteous heritage which has come down to us from our ancestors, not as our absolute possession for this generation alone but as our trust for the generations to follow us.

Thomas Jefferson saw this fact clearly and expressed it in these words:

"Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread. * * *

"Private enterprise manages * * * much better (than the Government) all the concerns to which it is equal. * * *

"Dependence begets subservience and venality, suffocates the term of virtue, and prepares fit tools for the designs of ambition."

Lincoln declared on July 1, 1854, that—

"The legitimate object of government is to do for the community of people whatever they need to have done, but cannot do at all, or cannot so well do, for themselves, in their separate and individual capacities. In all that the people can individually do as well for themselves, government ought not to interfere."

President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, when Governor of the State of New York, voiced this same fundamental concept of free government and free enterprise when he said in 1930:

"As a matter of fact and law, the governing rights of the States are all of those which have not been surrendered to the National Government by the Constitution or its amendments. * * * In the matter of a great number of * * * vital problems of government, such as the conduct of public utilities, of banks, of insurance, of business, of agriculture, of education, of social welfare, and of a dozen other important features—Washington must not be encouraged to interfere.

"The proper relations between the Government of the United States and the governments of the separate States thereof depend entirely, in their legal aspects, on what powers have been voluntarily ceded to the central Government by these States themselves. What these powers of government are is contained in our Federal Constitution either by direct language, by judicial interpretation thereof during many years, or by implication so plain as to have been recognized by the people generally.

"The preservation of this 'home rule' by the States is not a cry of jealous commonwealths seeking their own aggrandizement at the expense of sister States. It is a fundamental necessity if we are to remain a truly united country. * * *

"The doctrine of regulation and legislation by 'master minds,' in whose judgment and will all the people may gladly and quietly acquiesce, has been too glaringly apparent at Washington during these last 10 years. Were it possible to find 'master minds' so unselfish, so willing to decide unhesitatingly against their own personal interests or private prejudices, men almost God-like in their ability to hold the scales of justice with an even hand, such a government might be to the interest of the country, but there are non such on our political horizon, and we cannot expect a complete reversal of all the teachings of history."

It is conceivable that we could win the conflict at arms in which we are now engaged, and lose the peace which must sometime follow. All of the sacrifices of blood and treasure we are making to protect our American system of free government and free enterprise could be rendered futile, and worse than futile, if we were to lose our liberty and our free government; if the Bill of Rights were to be impaired; if free enterprise were to become throttled by the deadening hand of bureaucracy. The peace could be lost precisely through those shackles referred to by President Roosevelt when he said:

"We have built up new instruments of public power. In the hands of a people's government, this power is wholesome and proper. But in the hands of political puppets of an economic autocracy such power would provide shackles for the liberties of the people. Give them their way and they will take the course of every autocracy of the past—power for themselves, enslavement for the public."

Free government can survive only through the survival of the free enterprise system. The free enterprise system can best operate only in an expanding post-war economy. An expanding economy can be achieved only in steadily increased production, constantly improved quality of products, under ever increasing efficiency of production methods resulting in decreased prices to the consumers. Such an expanding economy rests not upon a premise of limitation of opportunity for some, but upon a basis of equal opportunity for all. Free enterprise can succeed under proper governmental regulation; but is bound to fail under governmental domination and competition. Prosperity and security in this Nation lie in free enterprise fairly conducted.

American business is generally honest and law-abiding. It must be preserved and encouraged. The dishonest element should be controlled without penalizing the honest.

The task which will confront us when war ceases will be far greater, both in magnitude and difficulty, than any we have ever been called upon to meet in our history as a Nation.

The war alleviated temporarily our great problem of unemployment which had not been solved throughout the years of the depression, despite the tremendous expenditures of public funds. When peace comes, the task of readjusting the workers of the Nation into jobs will emerge as the greatest problem in our American life.

The capitalistic system will face the most stupendous test in all history. It has been said that free enterprise and unemployment cannot long exist side by side in the same country. The capitalistic system means the right to private property and a right to the reasonable share of the fruits of one's industry.

The free-enterprise system as developed in America has learned to produce on an amazing scale; but, if it does not master the problem of distribution, free enterprise will be supplanted by some other system. Free government cannot survive protracted unemployment of great masses of the people.

During the depression era unemployment brought about unprecedented governmental controls. If there is a post-war depression, the Government will assume more and greater controls. Numerous business leaders have repeatedly sounded these warnings. They see clearly the challenge which will be presented to our free-enterprise system to provide peacetime employment for the millions now engaged in war work.

These spokesmen have insisted that the national welfare will be advanced only in the measure that private employment is provided by the free-enterprise system. If under the capitalistic system we can solve the unemployment problem in the post-war era the result will be not only the elimination of mass unemployment but very much higher standards of living than we have ever known.

If under the free-enterprise system we fail to meet this challenge to solve unemployment through improved production and distribution methods, we will face one of two dangerous developments—mass unemployment and social disorder, or widespread governmental employment with vastly increased governmental controls.

Department of Commerce figures generally accepted by men of business as being fairly accurate show what a stupendous task will confront us:

There are now, if we include those in our armed services, approximately 62,000,000 Americans gainfully employed. In 1940 the total of gainfully employed was about 46,600,000, including some 600,000 in the armed services. There were also unemployed somewhere between 6,000,000 and 9,000,000 workers.

Not all of the present labor force will be seeking post-war work. Many women will go back to their housekeeping; older workers will retire; many younger workers may return to school. Nevertheless, the Department of Commerce experts estimate that the total number of those who will be seeking work after the war (assuming the war will be ended by 1946) will be about 59,500,000. Assuming that two and a half million men will remain in the armed services, we will face the necessity of providing some 57,000,000 jobs.

Full employment, as Brookings Institution has pointed out, does not imply complete employment. There are always chronic unemployables; workers moving from one job to another; seasonal lay-offs; illness, technological changes, etc., which prevent complete employment. These causes result in from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 workers being idle at any given time in a so-called full-employment economy like ours.

The Baruch report on post-war readjustment policies recently issued points out the difficulties of the readjustment. It will be comparable with nothing ever experienced in this Nation. The report reminds us that America will emerge from the war with the greatest opportunities any people ever had. It agrees that a post-war depression is not inevitable. Half the world will need rebuilding. Enormous demands, accumulating during the war, will be added to the pre-war demands, awaiting satisfaction. Much depends on the settlement of the peace. If it inspires people with hope—not fear—for the future there will be plenty of work for all willing hands.

There are certain rules which must be strictly observed if the problem of employment, production, and distribution is to be solved. The free-enterprise system must include low-interest financing so small units of business, which constitute the very foundation of the free-enterprise system, can find capital for reconverting to civilian activities and participation in post-war production and distribution of goods and services. To the end that the widest distribution of such goods and services may be achieved, a system of low-cost financing of installment and other credits must be instituted. Business, large and small, must be conducted on a fair and freely competitive basis.

Whether free government and free enterprise shall survive and prosper in America depends not alone on statesmen and business leaders, but upon the people themselves. John Stuart Mill stated this fact explicitly and well thus:

"A people may prefer a free government, but if from indolence, or carelessness, or cowardice, or want of public spirit, they are unequal to the exertions necessary for preserving it; if they will not fight for it when it is directly attacked; if they can be deluded by the artifices used to cheat them out of it; if, by momentary discouragement or temporary panic or a fit of enthusiasm for an individual, they can be induced to lay their liberties at the feet of even a great man or trust him with powers which enable him to subvert their institutions—in all these cases they are more or less unfit for liberty; and though it may be for their good to have had it even for a short time, they are unlikely long to enjoy it."

Down through history many men have forseen the dangers which beset free government and free enterprise.

The question confronting us today is whether or not the signs of the times indicate clearly enough for us to reach a conclusion that these processes of disintegration and ruin are actually at work in our Nation and in our time.

There are those, and they are many, who believe the signs of the times do indicate an exceedingly dangerous trend in the direction of those forces which inevitably would disintegrate and ruin our free Government, our free enterprise system and lose the peace for us after the war is won.

There are others, and they, too, are many, who have a profound faith in the wisdom of the people. There does seem to be some intuitive perception on the part of the people which even propaganda and misinformation cannot effectually destroy. Lincoln was profoundly convinced of it!

I share that profound faith in the intuitive perception of the people. There have been periods throughout all history, and there have been periods within the life of our own Nation, when hope seemed gone, when all seemed lost, when a sense of utter futility and a state of chaos appeared imminent; and yet in every case that inherent perceptive wisdom on the part of the people has triumphed. Were that not so, there would be no free government anywhere on the globe today.

Although the progress of man toward higher spiritual and cultural achievements has seemed at times in the past to have been slowed down or temporarily to have ceased, looking backward down the vista of history we can perceive that this was not so. Slowed it may have been, stopped it never was. The present is the proof of that.

Knowledge always brings enlightenment. Enlightenment always brings an insistent and irrepressible demand for liberty. The demand for liberty eventuates in free government and free enterprise.

The printing press, education, the radio, the telephone, the railroad, the modern steamship, the airplane—all these have broadened and deepened the contacts, the experience, and the thinking of the masses.

Where, in the past, only the sparks of enlightenment glimmered here and there, today the great torch of knowledge lights up the way to liberty for the world. As education and enlightenment spread, the demand for liberty grows, and will continue to grow. No power on earth can stamp out that knowledge which makes men free.

Therefore, it seems clear that within our own hands in this generation rests the answer to this problem: Will American free government and free enterprise survive? I believe they will survive.

Sewell Avery Against the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, permission having been granted, I am inserting in the RECORD the fourth of a series of articles appearing in the May 18, 1944, issue of the Chicago Sun, entitled "Sewell Avery Against the People—Ward's Fights O. P. A. as Well as Labor, Court Records Show."

It is as follows:

SEWELL AVERY VERSUS THE PEOPLE—WARD'S FIGHTS O. P. A. AS WELL AS LABOR, COURT RECORDS SHOW

(By Thomas F. Reynolds and Charley O. Gridley)

WASHINGTON, May 17.—Sewell Avery, who is making a last-ditch fight against measures which protect his workers, is waging an equally bitter battle against wartime price controls that protect the millions of customers who buy his goods.

In an advertising campaign that cost him half a million dollars, Avery has set himself up as a self-styled champion of freedom and American traditions.

But these advertisements have made no mention of the fact that the Federal Government had to go into court twice to compel his Montgomery Ward & Co. to obey the price-control law by which Congress has sought to protect this country from a disastrous inflation.

Neither did the advertisements mention that Avery currently is applying his formula of litigation to price-control regulations. They did not mention that he now is trying to escape from a Federal injunction in the circuit court of appeals and in the Emergency Court of Appeals, is attempting to invalidate a regulation designed to hold down the prices of essential clothing.

While the Avery formula of obstruction and litigation has tied the War Labor Board into a knot and has thus far defeated efforts of Ward employees to win union security, it is not, however, working so well in the Federal courts.

The mail-order Napoleon may have met his Waterloo in the person of United States District Judge John P. Barnes, a Republican appointed by President Hoover, and who now sits on the Federal bench at Chicago.

Upon complaints filed by the Office of Price Administration, Barnes has issued two injunctions which compel Avery to comply with price controls first in his multimillion dollar mail-order business, and finally in the more than 600 retail outlets which Ward's operates across the country. These injunctions were:

First. December 21, 1942.—Barnes issued a permanent injunction restraining Ward's from selling any articles or commodities at prices in excess of general maximum price regulations established by the O. P. A. This injunction followed O. P. A. charges that Ward's had exceeded ceiling prices on 434 items in its fall and winter catalogs 1942–43.

Second, October 6, 1943.—Barnes restrained Ward's from continued violation of an O. P. A. regulation which prevents retailers from abandoning sales of low-price clothing and outerwear and concentrating on high-priced lines to skim the cream of wartime high wages. Barnes made this injunction so broad that it covered every phase of price control except those regulations to which he had previously bound Avery's company in the first injunctions.

In his decision in the second case, the Federal jurist excoriated Ward's from the bench in a manner seldom heard in a Federal court of justice.

Avery's attorneys, according to Barnes, had not denied the violations of which they were accused. Instead, they based their defense on the contention that the Government lawyers could not prove the violations—because Ward's sales records in retail outlets made such proof impossible.

His denunciation was in support of O. P. A. Regulation No. 330—the order which prevents retailers from abandoning low-priced lines to the detriment of the customer who has limited funds.

"The court is satisfied that the defendant has violated Regulation 330," the 63-year-old jurist told Avery's attorney, Stuart S. Ball, in an oral decision from the bench. "And it is further satisfied that the defendant has not made any attempt to comply with that regulation.

"When this matter first came on, counsel for the defendant asked and was granted an opportunity to answer the charges of the plaintiff and when * * * the matter came on to be heard * * * the court gathered * * * that the defendant did not deny that it had done what the plaintiff (the Government) charged it had done, but that it did deny that the plaintiff could prove that it had done what the plaintiff charged, and the court has not changed its mind about the attitude of the defendant to this moment.

"The attitude of the defendant has been, generally speaking, not that it did not do what it is charged to have done, but that the plaintiff has not proved and cannot prove that it did do those things.

"Basing the conclusions the court is about to express upon the affidavits which have been filed, upon the evidence produced here in open court, and what has been said and done in the case, the court is satisfied that the defendant has not made any attempt to comply with Regulation 330."

In bringing the action against Avery's company, the Government had asserted that the issues were much greater than the mere violations by Ward's—that, in fact, the issue was the welfare of the people of the United States and the success of their war effort. An affidavit filed as a Government exhibit by Joseph Forer, Chief of the Apparel Enforcement Section in the O. P. A., asserted:

"The defendant's violations will, if permitted to continue, cause immediate and irreparable injury to our national economy, to our war effort, and to numerous consumers who purchase garments, and will enhance and promote inflation and inflationary practices, and stimulate and encourage, by reason of defendant's prominence as a retailer, violations of maximum price regulations by other sellers."

It is the injunction in this case from which Avery now is trying to escape. His appeal to the Chicago Circuit Court of Appeals now is pending and may be called up for action in the next few weeks.

But even before the injunction had been handed down, Avery's attorneys had launched a frontal attack on Regulation 330 by attacking the validity of the measures before the O. P. A.

This challenge was filed with Prentiss M. Brown, the then Price Administrator, on April 19, 1943, and was overruled by Brown on May 20 of that year. Avery's attorneys promptly took the challenge into the Emergency Court of Appeals, where it still is pending.

The Government's case against Avery for violating the low-priced-line order was based upon specific instances of alleged violations in 25 cities—Burlington, Vt.; Burlingame, Calif.; Kansas City, Mo.; Bismarck, S. Dak.; Sacramento, Calif.; Des Moines, Iowa; Sioux City, Iowa; Batavia, N. Y.; Westchester, Pa.; Brattleboro, Va.; Lewiston, Pa.; Trenton, N. J.; Bluefield, Va.; Courtlandt, N. Y.; Staunton, Va.; Kingsport, Tenn.; Santa Rosa, Calif.; Salem, Oreg.; Corvallis, Oreg.; Reno, Nev.; Clinton, Iowa; Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Fremont, Nebr.; Greeley, Colo.; and La Grange, Ill.

The violations ranged from a dollar over the maximum permissible charge for outerwear to a maximum overcharge of $18.02 per item.

A typical instance as charged by the O. P. A. was at Ward's retail outlet in Salem where the highest priced Ward line of women's coats in March 1942, was $24.75. The Government investigation showed that in March 1943, the same store had a price of $38 for their top line of women's coats which, under Regulation 330, represented an overcharge of $13.25 an item.

In defending Ward's in a losing battle, Ball attempted to prove that Ward records were so incomplete in retail outlets that neither the Government nor the company could say definitely what had been charged for specific items in the previous year.

His defense caused the Government attorney, John F. Mainierre, to exclaim that "it is obvious that they (Ward's) are trying to hide behind these wholly inadequate store records" and prompted the judge to issue his critial decision at conclusion of the case.

The initial O. P. A. case against Avery found the mail-order magnate in a position where he had little defense. His prices were listed in a catalog and in bold black type contradicted arguments that they were not violations of O. P. A. ceilings.

In its complaint and request for an injunction in Barnes' Federal Court, the Government charged 434 items were priced above proper ceilings, with violations ranging from 1 cent to slightly over $1 per item.

The Government charges revolved around a miscellany of items such as could be mustered only by the big Montgomery Ward catalogue, which is Sewell Avery's pride. These included shipping bags, window shades, tables, pillows, kitchen cabinets, yard goods, rayon hose, men's hose, runproof panties, umbrellas, turkish towels, crepe robes, house coats, dish towels, angora yarn, men's sport shirts, men's sweaters, wall and floor lamps, mittens and many more items.

This catalogue had been distributed to more than 4,000,000 customers when the O. P. A. slapped the injunction suit against Ward's and called the company on its prices.

Avery's defense was that he had filed 17,000 listed item prices with the O. P. A. as his catalogue went to press and that there were unavoidable errors which his lawyers sought to describe as minor.

"This is a suit which should never have been brought," the lawyers declared for Avery, who is rapidly establishing a new all-time record for litigation against Federal laws and regulations.

When Barnes had examined the evidence, however, he found that there had been 728 items in Ward's catalogue over the O. P. A. ceiling.

He noted that Ward's issued price reduction orders to its mail-order houses to bring the prices into line, but specifically pointed out that this order was issued by Avery's company on November 4, 1942, when the O. P. A. had Ward's on the carpet—"subsequent to the filing of the complaint in this cause and to the service upon the defendant of notice of a motion for a preliminary injunction herein," as Barnes put it.

"Seven hundred and twenty-eight items were priced in defendant's Chicago catalog No. 137 for fall and winter 1942–43, at prices in excess of the maximum prices theretofore determined and reported by the defendant under said section, 140 of said 728 commodities were reduced in price during the summer of 1942, 118 other commodities of said 728 commodities were subsequently covered by price regulation other than the general maximum price regulation; of the remaining 469 commodities of said 728 commodities, 343 were sold at prices not in excess of 2 percent over the maximum price theretofore as computed and reported by the defendant under the provisions of said section," Barnes said in his decision.

"The defendant has made one or more sales during the period August 4 to November 4, 1942, from its Chicago catalog * * * for fall and winter 1942–43 of substantially every one of the commodities, goods, or items listed or described in exhibit A hereof (the list of alleged overcharges) at the prices listed therefor in said catalog. * * * Defendant's sales from its Chicago mail-order house for August and September 1942 aggregated millions of dollars."

Barnes entered a temporary injunction against Ward's in this case on December 3, 1942, and when the company declined to contest the case further, made the injunction permanent 18 days later.

Almost a year later, Ball, Avery's counsel, was arguing the second Ward case before Barnes, and the judge mentioned that Wards had been in his court once before on an O. P. A. issue.

Ball attempted to pass off the first O. P. A. injunction as a minor matter where the company made a few technical errors.

"The circumstance of the first case was a case of inadvertence which, I think, the court was familiar with," said Avery's attorney.

"I am thoroughly familiar with that," said Barnes, "and there was no shadow of a defense made to the case in the pleadings."

The judge liked that statement so well, he repeated it:

"I am thoroughly familiar with it, and there was not a shadow of a defense in the pleadings in the first case."

Three-Mile Doctrine Menace to Pacific Coast

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, some years ago, the operations of Japanese fishermen in Bering Sea threatened to deplete and eventually exhaust an important part of the Alaska salmon fisheries. That action was possible by reason of the 3-mile-limit doctrine, never an accepted part of international law.

The war affords us a singular opportunity to forever renounce that doctrine and to protect our national fisheries against invasion by citizens of other nations.

It therefore gives me pleasure to invite the attention of the House to the following illuminating editorial by the able and eminent Dr. Joseph Walter Bingham, formerly of Stanford University, renowned for his knowledge and exposition of the law of nations, which appeared in the Log, a leading Pacific coast shipping magazine, annual edition, July 1943:

THREE-MILE DOCTRINE MENACE TO PACIFIC COAST—NATIONAL DEFENSE AND SAFETY IS INVOLVED IN EXTENSION OF OUR SEAWARD JURISDICTION—UNITED STATES CONTROL OF MICRONESIA IMPERATIVE

(By Joseph Walter Bingham)

PALO ALTO, CALIF.—A war such as the one in which we now are engaged never results merely in military victory or defeat with expenditure of lives and wealth. It always has enduring economic, social, and political consequences in the peacetime life of mankind. Against the wastage and suffering of war can be credited the very considerable benefits in accelerated progress in many phases of human affairs which are the consequences of modern war. To applied science, to medical practice, to industry, to invention, to education, to technical training, to politics and public spirit, to development of resources, the pressures of modern war bring an acceleration of specialized progress which often entails permanent advantages in social life. These pressures also often accelerate enduring changes in the relative industrial and commercial importance of communities, of geographical regions, and of financial interests.

Thus, one of the evident consequences of this war is the increased importance of the Pacific coast in the industrial and commercial life of the country. That this stimulated growth is not a temporary war phenomenon, but will have lasting consequences of significance to our national destiny should be clear to anyone who is aware of the underlying revolutionary forces and the stirring developments which are changing rapidly the life of the world. Mention of only one of these revolutionary forces and developments may suffice to illustrate this meaning—the airplane and progress in its use for rapid transit over the entire face of the globe.

IMPORTANCE OF WESTERN STATES UNDERESTIMATED

It is an interesting fact of our history that continually people east of the Mississippi, and especially the eastern statesmen and politicians who have directed our domestic and international policies, have underemphasized the political and social importance of the West and its significance to the destiny of the United States. Similarly their interests in the Far East and indeed in the whole Pacific Basin until recently has been casual and spotty.

During the past quarter of a century the great majority of the American people believed that our practical interests in the Orient were of such slight consequence that we should willingly sacrifice them for the sake of peace. The sentiment for freeing the Philippines grew steadily for a similar reason. Our people believed that the Philippines could not be defended in case of war with Japan and that the chances of such a war would be diminished greatly if we terminated our responsibility for their protection.

Even on the Pacific coast many vigorously asserted that our chief practical interest in the Orient was our trade with Japan, and that the mutual advantages of this trade would keep at peace the two peoples with no important cause for dissension. Consequently, they said, American Pacific policy should be based on sympathetic appreciation of the role of modern civilized Japan in maintaining order along the eastern coasts of Asia—for were not the Chinese a poverty-stricken people given over to banditry and other disorders and corruptions and a natural hotbed for communism; and was not Soviet Russia a great menace to the peace of the Orient and the world?

CONGRESS RESPONSIBLE FOR DEFENSE FAILURE

The Congress responding to dominant popular opinion for 20 years after World War No. 1 blocked the efforts of our military experts to establish sea and air bases in Alaska and the islands of the western Pacific. The last revived effort to fortify Guam in 1939 was nullified by determined opposition in the Congress, for the expressed reason that to fortify Guam "would offend Japan," whose military leaders were loud in their menacing opposition to the proposal. With similar ostrich-like oblivion to manifest portents, instead of insisting on a two-ocean Navy our Government of the decade following the Peace of Versailles, influenced by the pressure of business and property interests for low governmental expenditures and taxes, lent a willing ear to pacifist and foreign suggestions that we sink part of our fleet and keep the rest within limits too small for adequate defense of our interests in all the oceans and along all our extensive coasts.

It has seemed impossible until recently for the eastern statesmen who directed our international affairs to turn their backs on Europe and the Atlantic sufficiently to appreciate the tremendous significance to the future of America of the countries of the Pacific Basin and the consequent strategic business and political importance of the Pacific coast.

To the eastern politician and officeholder, the far West has been an outlying province, mildly interesting as a playground and fabulous producer of food and minerals and, of course, deserving of attention at elections, but otherwise so unimportant socially and politically that it has not been worth while in recent peacetimes to place one real westerner in high influential position in our Washington Government.

When we of the coast think of the West we do not begin at Buffalo and Pittsburgh, nor even at the Mississippi. We think of the territory west of the Rockies; and when we speak of a westerner we do not mean one who was born in the West or spent his boyhood there, but one who has spent his adult business or professional life there and knows and appreciates its problems and prospects.

ALASKA FISHERIES "INVASION" ALARMED CONGRESS

One of the incidents which served to awaken official Washington to the looming political importance of the Pacific Basin was the "invasion" of the salmon fisheries of Bristol Bay, Alaska, in 1935 by the Japanese. This invasion was of far greater significance than the lawyers of eastern States and, at first, even our Department of State, realized.

To eastern lawyers it was only a casual incident affecting limited local business interests—a few corporations and fishermen—and consequently they assumed that the controversy could be compromised easily—that of course the Japanese, fishing only outside our territorial waters, were right legally and nothing should be done in prosecuting our claim which would violate the traditional tenets of international law—among which almost all American lawyers placed unquestioningly the Anglo-American 3-mile limit doctrine. Even the bare value of the American economic interests involved was grossly underestimated in the East. The other more serious implications of the case were quite beyond the knowledge of most eastern lawyers, and amazingly still remain so to many of them.

By the leading ardent opponents of the Japanese, including Miller Freeman, Sr., and Edward W. Allen, of Seattle, Delegate Anthony Dimond, of Alaska, and Benjamin Kizer, of Spokane—although not by all the interested parties to the case—these major serious phases of the invasion were recognized and the necessity of immediate frank abandonment of the 3-mile doctrine by the United States in the interest of national security and protection of declared objectives of our national policy was appreciated and urged upon our Government continuously during the following 7 years. This campaign is unfinished, for the 3-mile doctrine continues to be a menace to our interests, not only in Alaska, but throughout the Pacific Basin and in Latin America. Here are the facts.

JAPAN'S BELIEFS AND AIMS

In the economy of Japan fishing has held a very important place for centuries. The Japanese believe that they are the best fishermen in the world and the designers of their economic and political future claimed that dominance of all profitable fisheries should accrue of right to them. Indeed, the Japanese Government skillfully fostered and supervised the Japanese fishing industry and made it a component part of its scheme of world domination. The invasion of our Bristol Bay salmon fisheries was an important planned campaign in pursuance of this scheme.

Not only was the fishing industry an important part of Japan's economic fabric, but it also was a valuable means of infiltration into the coastal and island countries of the Far East and of the Americas and an aid to Japan's military designs in several ways, including spying.

In the spread of its fishing campaigns to foreign coasts the Japanese have been helped greatly by the Anglo-American international law doctrine limiting coastal State control over fisheries in general to a belt no wider than 3 miles seaward from the coast. This doctrine never has been international law and always has been opposed by the majority of States with any interest in the matter, including France, Russia, Italy, and especially almost all small coastal countries.

Japan, however, adopted this Anglo-American doctine enthusiastically because it was a legal support for her piratical invasions of the valuable coastal fisheries of the world, including those of the Philippines, Mexico, Argentina, Peru, and lately Australia, Canada, and the United States. Consequently, when the Japanese invaded the salmon fisheries of Bristol Bay outside the 3-mile belt of territorial waters in 1935, their Government blandly supported their claim of right to do so under international law by the argument that this accorded with traditional Anglo-American-Japanese doctrine and practice.

THREE-MILE DOCTRINE AIDED JAPAN

In fact, the estoppel of the unbroken diplomatic practice of our Department of State for over a hundred years gave the Japanese an almost unassailable legal defense as long as our Government did not renounce its dogmatic 3-mile doctrine. This was a matter which threatened vital interests of the United States and certain war with Japan independently of the outbreak of World War No. 2, unless we acquiesced in her imperialistic purposes. Fortunately, Japan's enmeshment in strife in Asia at the time of the Bristol Bay episode made it expedient for her to consent to a truce without settlement of the controversy, and she agreed to a temporary withdrawal of her fishing boats from the Alaskan salmon fisheries.

This incident was a piece of luck for us. The danger to our Pacific interests which it signified and emphasized awakened our Government fully to the disastrous mistakes of policy which the political oblivion of the American people had caused us to make since 1918.

Immediately there was a recrudescence of efforts with increased tempo and political support to establish sufficient naval and air bases in Alaskan waters and through the Eastern and Southern Pacific—a movement which Navy officials had favored for many years, but which political opposition always had frustrated. The controlling purposes of our Government now were evident: (1) To prevent the spread of Japan's imperialistic invasions in Asia beyond the danger line of vital American interests, and (2) to delay the inevitable war until our tardy defense preparations in the Pacific were as far along as possible.

Hence, the so-called appeasement incidents. The scrap iron and oil problems were not as simple as complaining commentators believe. They were very complicated in economic and political and strategic factors, and no kibitzer's public criticism of the courses followed which I have read or heard has been fair to the Government or comprehensive of the essential facts.

ENDING FUTURE MENACE

Now that war has come and that the American public at last is awake to the menace in the Pacific, the following points should be emphasized to stimulate and to continue after the war is won our thought and interest concerning the prospect that lies before the Nation in relation to the tremendous future social, economic, and political developments all around the Pacific Basin.

1. We must at once secure our coastal fisheries from destructive invasions by foreigners by extending our jurisdiction and the operation of effective conservation laws as far seaward as necessary. This means abandonment of our traditional 3-mile limit doctrine. In the case of Alaskan waters and those of various other areas of the Pacific, extension of our seaward jurisdiction has more important purposes than protection of fisheries. It involves our national defense and safety. Indeed for this reason we must have full jurisdiction of the eastern part of the Bering Sea.

Also, we must insist on complete control of all Micronesia, now held by Japan, and of many other aeronautic stepping stones in the western and southern Pacific. Air and sea bases throughout these regions are essential to our national safety. One of our most costly diplomatic blunders, due no doubt in largest part to the uninformed state of public opinion, was the failure to insist on American, instead of Japanese, control of Micronesia after the last World War. This blunder was a major cause of our present expenditure of billions of wealth and many lives. If we make the same sort of mistake again, it may prove utterly disastrous.

DEVELOPMENT OF PACIFIC BASIN

2. It should be obvious that the most significant economic, social, and political prospect of the next 100 years is the development of the peoples of the Orient. With their growth in production of wealth, in purchasing power, and in standard of living, these millions will offer the greatest foreign market for American products in the world.

Undoubtedly our trade with South and Central America also will increase; but there are many factors including European competition which make the extent of that increase along the Atlantic coast uncertain. The vast potential markets of Asia, however, are available to us for development on as favorable a basis of competition as our social, political, industrial and business abilities suffice to produce. This is a long-term prospect.

3. Meanwhile the war has given a great impetus to development of our Pacific coast industries and resources and has accelerated the construction and use of public works—especially water power—and means of communication in the northwest which will be of great peacetime importance.

In addition to our traditional mining, timber, agricultural, fishing, and shipping, interests, the war has developed (a) shipbuilding and aircraft organizations with mass-production techniques which, so far as excess post-war capacity is concerned, may turn their managerial and technical abilities to other new manufactures under stimulating visions of American enterprise such as those of Henry Kaiser; (b) great producers of light metals, especially through the use of ample electrical power such as that furnished by Grand Coulee and Bonneville and proposed enlarged and new power plants; (c) inspiring predictions of a great new light metals and plastics age succeeding the age of steel; (d) a new steel plant with many post-war problems of competition to solve; (e) a recently initiated collaboration of the Governments of Canada and the United States in studying the possibilities of developing and populating the vast territories, at present sparsely inhabited, of Pacific Northwest America, in the mutual economic and defense interests of the two countries. (See Miller Freeman Publications, Mining World for May 1943, editorials p. 3, Outline of an International Development Program for the North Pacific Region; p. 6, Pacific North America—Strategic in Peace as in War; p. 12, art. by Dr. R. H. Harrington, The Light Alloy Age.)

FUTURE OF PACIFIC COAST STATES

4. The war has brought a great increase in population, in fundamental developed capital wealth and in financial resources to the Pacific coast and much of this increase will be retained after the war. To what effect it will be retained and used will depend on the will, ingenuity, energy, and fighting qualities of our social, industrial, and political leaders and workers.

No doubt there will be opposition to the maximum development from eastern competitive forces—all those competitive forces of established financial and industrial power which have been concentrated in eastern centers, and which have vested interests in eastern establishments that might be affected detrimentally by the prospective new developments. Ultimately—within the next hundred years—the tide of American commerce and industry will run strongly westward to the Pacific Basin. It is not too optimistic a prediction that midway of the next century the greatest American cities will be the Pacific ports, San Francisco, Seattle, and Los Angeles.

How strongly the flow of industrial and commercial power will run on this coast soon after the close of the war, cannot be forecast with any degree of certainty. There are too many variable human factors in the field of possibilities. But that the war has accelerated the inevitable trend is certain. Henceforth, America must look with prime concern westward over the Pacific—in her best interests and especially in the interest of national security.

Always the American spirit has been associated with a restless movement westward. From Revolutionary days the tide of emigration westward has been unceasing, and it is in the far Western States that one finds preserved the strongest flavor of our heritage from the early years of our national history. To our people of the Pacific coast the post-war decades will raise a challenge—a call for traditional American individual ingenuity, foresight, adventure, energy, courage, and good will in developing the possibilities which Northwest America's remaining unpopulated frontier, a territory one-third as large as the combined areas of all our States, and the rising peoples across the Pacific offer us.

The Montgomery Ward Case—Rights of Private Enterprise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. LEE O'DANIEL

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD copy of a radio address I made in Dallas, Tex., May 4, 1944, about the seizure of Montgomery Ward private property, and to which I am giving the title "The Crucifixion of American Private Enterprise on the Brazen Cross of the C. I. O. by Decree of a Modern Pontius Pilate."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CRUCIFIXION OF AMERICAN PRIVATE ENTERPRISE ON THE BRAZEN CROSS OF THE C. I. O. BY DECREE OF A MODERN PONTIUS PILATE

How do you do ladies and gentlemen, and hello there boys and girls. This is your United States Senator W. LEE O'DANIEL, of Texas speaking from Dallas. Last week we witnessed in this Nation one of the most disgraceful events in the long history of America. It was the sorry sight of a businessman being bodily carried out of his store and dumped outside by armed soldiers acting on orders from higher-ups. It was so drastic that it rocked and shocked the Nation. When this Montgomery Ward seizure took place I promptly denounced the action on the floor of the United States Senate, and then caught the next train for Texas so that I might speak to you folks here at home, both by radio and face to face, about this tragic Chicago event, and the things that layed the foundation for this event. I wanted to talk to my friends here in Texas because I am personally acquainted with so many of you who own little stores, cafes, filling stations, barber shops, factories, banks, and other kinds of business both small and large which you have built by hard work and thrift throughout the years. I wanted to warn you that if a store in Chicago could be seized, your places of business for which you hold a deed and a key, may also be subject to seizure, and you may be the person who will be next carried out by our soldiers at the point of a bayonet, unless you do something promptly to stop this high-handed onslaught against private business enterprise by the Washington Dynasty which is controlled by the labor leader racketeers of this Nation.

I am very much concerned about the future of this great Nation and the future of our Democratic form of government. I believe with all my heart that the year 1944 will be a milestone in the history of this great Nation. During 1944 we will either make some definite progress toward returning to that form of government which was set up by our forefathers—a true and tried democracy—or we will most certainly drift further into the mire of socialism where the bureaucrat rules by directive and the executive by Executive order; we will drift further into a government of men and further away from a government of law.

No man is wise enough to foresee the future because no one knows when the great rank and file of the American people are going to wake up and realize the situation into which the domestic affairs of this Nation have been steadily drifting during the period of the last 10 or 11 years. The mothers and fathers whose sons are today on foreign battlefields, willingly giving their lives that America and the free institutions of America may live, have a right to be proud of the kind of men who compose our fighting forces. The Nation today stands as a unit behind the President as Commander in Chief of the armed forces, to carry this battle to a successful conclusion. A demonstration of this was given a few days ago when the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed a bill to appropriate more money for the further extension of the United States Navy than had ever been passed before in any appropriation bill by this or by any other nation. And as I have observed the Congress of the United States on other measures, I have found practically 100 percent support from both Republicans and Democrats for any and all legislation designed to carry this war to a successful conclusion. I have been proud to have an opportunity to give support to such measures and I shall continue to give undivided support to doing all of those things necessary to win the war as quickly as possible and bring the youth of America back home.

But, my friends, you and I who have stayed at home, have another obligation and that is, to bring the youth back to a free America and not to an America where we have allowed the labor racketeers, the Communists, and the Socialists and all others who believe in all of the foreign "isms" to destroy our whole domestic economy. We have a responsibility to see that when our youth return to America, they shall return to a nation of law and not to a nation where one man governs the domestic affairs by edict and Executive order like the edict or Executive order which caused the seizure of the retail store in Chicago. As already stated, just before I left Washington I discussed this matter on the floor of the United States Senate. Time will not permit me to quote the Senate speech now, but I will be glad to send a copy of it, also a copy of this radio speech, to all who write me. Address Senator W. LEE O'DANIEL, Washington, D. C., or in care of this station.

Now, my friends, this incident of the Federal Government moving in and taking over a system of retail stores simply because these stores would not bow their heads and get down on their knees to the labor-union racketeers who have lived and grown fat under the New Deal, proves to the American people without question of doubt the grave situation which we now face. I want to say to you that it is my considered judgment that this Nation cannot continue to exist as a democracy unless we repeal some of the laws which have been written on the statute books of this Nation which have made possible the establishment of the reign of the bureaucrat and the dominating power of the labor-union racketeer.

For 10 years the Congress of the United States has performed like trained seals to write in the form of law all of the legislation which we now have on our statute books which virtually takes away from management the power to own and to operate its own business. The Congress of the United States passed this National Labor Relations Act which places in the hands of the labor-union racketeers power to extract dues from American citizens for their God-given right to work and these racketeers have built up great slush funds in the treasuries of their labor organizations and they are now seeking to use this power which the Congress by its votes has given them.

I repeat those words—please ponder them well:

"These labor-union racketeers are now seeking to use this power which the Congress by its votes has given them."

No man can read the National Labor Relations Act and come to the conclusion that it was ever even designed to be fair to the employer. No one can read this act and come to the conclusion that it was ever designed to protect the rights of the laboring man. It is a piece of legislation which was conceived in the minds of the politicians who wanted to satisfy the labor racketeers, who carried the "slush" funds in their pockets, and who promised that they also controlled the votes.

Today we are witnessing the results of this kind of legislation that the Congress has been passing for the past 11 years. We see the power of the United States Government, including an arm of the United States Army, brought into force to take away from a retail merchant the right to own and to operate his business, not because he was not complying with the law, not because he was not paying good wages, not because of any dispute as to the working conditions or hours of labor, but simply because he refused to give the labor unions an absolute monopoly on the jobs in his establishment, and the right to lock out honest American laboring men and women who do not belong to certain unions, and because he refuses to become a dues-collecting agency for the labor unions. The labor union racketeers demanded of those public officials whom they helped elect to office that something be done about it and something was done about it.

No one, of course, denies or for a minute questions the right of the United States Government, through proper agencies, to take over and operate any business establishment where it is essential that it be done to carry forward the war effort, but I think America resents the attempt to use the war effort as a camouflage to pay off political debts to a bunch of labor union racketeers.

On the 8th of January 1942, when the O. P. A. bill was before the Senate, I spoke against it and called it an anti-agriculture bill. When it was being pushed through Congress by all the bureaucratic power that Washington could command, I predicted then that if we followed the lead of these New Deal Democrats and set up the O. P. A. to reign over the people and direct the activities of the people, the result would be a complete dislocation of the markets and that where legitimate trade now existed, black markets would take their place. I stated then that if we listened to the voice of those who were pleading for this legislation and gave them the right to control a few commodities, it would not be long before they would be forced to control all commodities. I said then that it was inevitable if this country was to avoid a food shortage, the limitations which existed on the production of foodstuffs would have to be lifted. I said then that to my way of thinking it was absolutely foolish to talk about controlling the price of foods which did not exist, that we faced essentially a problem of production and I urged then that the Government not wait but that it remove the artificial barriers which were then preventing this Nation from producing food and from producing feed for our livestock. I said then that it was foolish to talk about a surplus of cotton and forget that cottonseed was the chief source of protein feeds for the cattle throughout the South.

I urged then that we embark upon a program of preventing inflation by removing all artificial curbs against production and at the same time levying a 100 percent excess profits tax on profits which were shown to be excessive when measured by a standard of a 3 or 4 year period prior to the time we entered the World War. I warned the Members of the Senate then that if we passed this Price Control Act, it was inevitable that it would result in so impoverishing our farmers that the Government would in desperation in order to secure production be forced to resort to the payment of subsidies in order that the Nation might be supplied with food.

I have lived now long enough to see every single one of these predictions come true. I have witnessed the spectacle of seeing cottonseed meal shipped from Texas to feed Illinois cows and soybeans shipped from Illinois to feed Texas cows. I have seen these smart-alec bureaucrats in Washington beg the farmers to produce more poultry and then fix the price of poultry below the cost of production. I have seen the subsidy checks begin to roll out of Washington. It is not difficult to figure out what the Washington dynasty is going to do. Almost everthing they plan or do is based on how it will affect the coming election. Several weeks ago I told my friends to watch the Washington dynasty remove rationing restrictions as we came closer to election day. Your newspapers since then have been full of reports of articles being released from rationing. Rationing will be practically abandoned and subsidy checks will be flooding the countryside by election day. But if the New Deal gang wins the election, look out for more and more rationing, and fewer and fewer subsidy checks after election day.

Of course, you know 1944 is election year. It is necessary for the Washington dynasty to hold the cost of living down in the cities in order to get the votes of the consumers and it is also necessary to send subsidy checks to the farmers in order to get their votes. It is necessary to use the power of the Federal Government to go out here and take over a retail business establishment in order to satisfy the longings of the big labor union racketeers who if they cannot secure members for the union by persuasion, want to secure them by force of the power of the Government itself. And still this chain of weird events "marches on".

My friends, it is going to continue to do this marching on so long as we have government by directive of the bureaucrats in our domestic affairs. If these things which I have mentioned to you stood alone, they would not be so alarming; if these things which I have mentioned had grown up only during the war effort, they would not be so alarming, but, my friends, that is not the case. During a period of 11 years the Congress of the United States has passed law after law creating these boards and bureaus that rule the whole domestic economy of this Nation by orders and directives issued out of the city of Washington. They did not wait until we got into war to start passing these laws. The worst laws we have had their foundation laid long before we ever entered the war, and collectively the Members of the present Congress of the United States are the ones who are responsible for this situation.

Yes, I know that many of these same Congressman and Senators who voted for these laws to build these great bureaucratic departments in Washington are today, as election day draws nigh, howling loud and long against the rule of the bureaucrats. My friends, the people of this Nation have become aroused against the fact that day by day their liberties and their right to carry on their own business has been destroyed. The people have become aroused because of the fact that the Congress has, through legislation passed during the last 11 years, built up in this country a dictatorship of labor racketeers which is today greater than the power of government itself. The people have commenced to ask why this situation exists, and Members of the Congress, in both the House and in the Senate, are seeking a plausible excuse. They are seeking an alibi for laws which they themselves passed, and so today you hear them from every housetop screaming about their support of the fundamental principles of the Constitution. But just go back, if you will, and get the record and see how they voted on the laws passed during the past 11 years which created this situation.

And when you get the record, I think you will agree with me that the only remedy for the situation which now exists is a thorough housecleaning in Washington from the cellar to the attic. I believe you will be inclined to agree with the principles laid down in the constitutional amendment which I proposed in the United States Senate which provides that no man can serve in the office of President, or Vice President, for a period of more than 6 years. It also provides that no man can serve in the House of Representatives or in the United States Senate for a period of more than 6 years. I believe you will agree with me that after 6 years these public officials should be permitted to go back home and try to make an honest living under the laws they, themselves, have passed.

I believe you will agree with me that the situation has got so bad that the time has come for the American people to stand up and fight for their rights. I think you will agree with me that the time to begin fighting is right now and the place to begin is at the place where you vote, in the 1944 election.

If the people of this Nation will get behind the movement to conduct a thorough housecleaning in Washington this year and then write in the Constitution a complete inhibition against any man serving in Washington more than 6 years, it will break up the rule of these bureaucrats—it will destroy this stranglehold control which has been established by the labor racketeers in Washington. Let us turn the Government back to the American people. Not long ago the President of the United States complained that legislation was being influenced too much in the cocktail lounges and bars around Washington. Well now folks, if you want to know how to break up the control of these groups who live in Washington always, and who make it their business to see that the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate vote as they are told, I will tell you exactly how you can accomplish this, and that is, adopt a constitutional rule of letting the boys stay up there just 6 years, and no longer. That will definitely and completely break up their club and ruin their game. If you will do this, they won't have time to become so well acquainted with the members of the "third" house that operates in the cocktail lounges and Washington's bars. They won't be so chummy then with the big labor racketeers who claim they control volumes of votes because they won't need their votes—they won't be running for reelection—there will be no reelection. When a man knows he has one term, and only one, he will not perform like a trained seal and begin to hedge and dodge every time one of these big labor bosses or one of the big industrial bosses shows up and tells him how to vote.

Now, of course, I know that whenever you talk about having a thorough housecleaning in Washington you will incur the opposition of a good many folks who have some Senator in the United States Senate or who have some Representative in the House who serves as office boy or chore boy for them. In other words, you will find throughout the country some men who will agree with the housecleaning plan which I am suggesting, as a matter of principle—they will agree that the representatives of the people should be changed often if they are to really and truly represent the people, but they will have some pet trained sealed serving in either the House or the Senate they want to keep up there because they want him to perform for them. They want to retire all the Senators and Congressmen except their own pet seal upon whom they have spend considerable time and money in training him to lie down and roll over every time they say "flop."

So if the plan which I am talking about is ever made effective in this country, it is going to have to be made effective by the great rank and file of the people—it is going to have to be made effective by the people who do not have any special axe to grind in Washington—it is going to have to be made effective by the people who want just one thing out of Government and that is, honest, fair treatment.

I am very much concerned today about the future of agriculture when this war is over. If we have to endure about 4 years more of what we have endured in the last 11 years, we will, I think, complete the process of making peasants out of the American farmers. I think agriculture, as you and I have known it, with independent ownership, independent control, will be at end. It will be "gone but not forgotten"—dead. I think that unless there is a change, 10 years from now American agriculture will be organized on about the same basis that agriculture is now organized in Soviet Russia.

I am also very much concerned about the average workman, the man who wants a job, the man who wants to do an honest day's work for a fair day's pay. Freedom of employment, freedom of opportunity cannot continue to exist for the man who toils in this country if he is made the slave of a few labor union bosses. I am very much concerned to know whether or not the great rank and file of the people will realize this soon enough to avoid the calamity. We are already perched on the edge of the precipice poised for the crash.

I am very much concerned about the whole future of private industry in this country, our system of free private enterprise. One thing I am certain of: These Communists, fellow-travelers, and New Dealers who moved into Washington about 11 years ago who, day by day, have placed themselves in key positions, have no intention of moving out. They plan to go right ahead when the war is over and complete their plans for 100-percent Government ownership, Government operation and control of every line of business and every individual citizen. The only hope which America has is that in 1944 the people of this country will fill the office of Chief Executive of this Nation and fill the offices of Congressmen and Senators with new men—men who really believe in the Constitution of the United States—men who do not look upon the Constitution as something that grew up in the horse-and-buggy age and should be buried with the horses and buggies—men who seek methods to live by the Constitution and not methods to evade the plain meaning of the Constitution.

You people who are listening to me, and especially do I appeal to the great rank and file of the people who do not have much of this world's goods, but who, after all, have always been the very foundation of the greatness of this Nation, I appeal to you to remember that when your boys return from the service or when those children who today are playing around the fireside, go out into the world to meet life's obligations, you will probably not be able to give them much money. But I tell you there is one thing that you can do, you can see to it that a democratic government is maintained in this country, and that free enterprise is maintained. You can see that the road of opportunity is kept open. You can see to it that a government is preserved which will guarantee that every boy and girl in America will have an opportunity to advance in proportion to his or her diligence, ability, and willingness to work. After all, that is what has made America great.

And I say to you that in a nation built on a system which destroys free enterprise, which makes of our people dependent slaves, is a system which will sound the death knell of our future progress and will close forever the door of opportunity to the youth of this land.

What under the name of high heaven is it going to take to arouse the people of this Nation to action? When the soldiers with guns or bayonets, on orders, march into your store and carry you out bodily and throw you in the street or gutter, what more will it take to arouse you to action to protect your freedom and liberty? It matters not whether it is in accordance with law, so far as you are concerned. If it is according to law, is it not time to retire those who made such laws? If it is not according to law, is it not time to be aroused and alarmed? I am old-fashioned enough to believe explicitly in our form of government as outlined in the Constitution. I have no new theories or new philosophies to expound. I want to cling to the original. I want our Government to truly be a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people. I want the people to recover their own government by the peaceful and constitutional methods of honest elections.

I wish I could make all of you people who are listening to me realize just how serious I am in what I have been saying to you. I have no personal ambition in this matter. I am subjecting myself to the bitter tirades and all of the persecution that this New Deal gestapo can invent. I am doing this for one purpose and for one purpose only, and that is to warn the people how serious I think the situation is in our domestic affairs—to warn the people how determined I believe these fellow travelers, bureaucrats, and the whole New Deal gang are to convert our democracy and our private-enterprise system into a completely communized governmental set-up. I believe as firmly as I believe anything that the freedom of the average workingman will within the next 10 years be a thing of the past unless the people of America act now to upset the plans which for 11 years these fellow travelers have so carefully laid. I am deadly serious when I say that I think within 10 years American agriculture will be reduced to the status of the peasants of Europe and regimented as it is in Soviet Russia unless the people act now to stop this tendency. I believe with all my heart that private enterprise, consisting of little shops and stores, small business, and large industries will come to an end in America in the near future unless we act now to bring about a change.

You ask me, what can we do? My answer is that prior to 11 years ago when they established the reign of the New Deal in Washington, we had a government by law according to the Constitution. The men whom you elected to the Congress of the United States, both in the House and in the Senate, have, during the past 11 years, changed all that. They have filled our statute books with laws written by the bureaucrats, and sent to the Congress by the Executive Department with an order that they must be passed. Now when you ask me what we can do, I tell you very frankly I am afraid to risk this Government during the post-war period in the hands of the Members of Congress who traded the birthright of the American people for a mess of New Deal pottage long before we ever entered the war.

I say to you that the situation is too critical to risk the welfare of America during the period of post-war adjustment in the hands of men who as Members of Congress in the past have performed like trained seals and voted for everything they were ordered to vote for. Oh, yes, there may be a few good ones in the bunch; as a matter of fact, I think there are. But let me warn you people to check the record and see how these who say they are good now, voted. If during this 11-year period they voted for all these New Deal laws that have wrecked the whole economy of the country, then do not pay any attention to their loud pre-election promises now about their love for constitutional government. Some of these Congressmen and Senators now are waking up to the fact that the American people have found out what they have done and many of these trained seals are today parading around over the country howling like a bunch of coyotes as they cuss the bureaucrats which they themselves voted to create.

So far as I personally am concerned, I am not worried about whether the Washington housecleaning results in eleminating Republicans or Democrats; what I am concerned about is the type and character of men who succeed those who are eliminated. I want to see a Congress and I want to see the office of President of the United States filled with new men who believe in the fundamental principles upon which this Government was founded and who will act accordingly. I want to see men elected who do not look upon the Constitution as something to be relegated to the dark ages and spoken of as belonging to the horse-and-buggy era. I want to see Congress composed of men fresh from the people who know the trials and tribulations, also the aspirations and desires of the people. And I want to see the Constitution so amended as to guarantee that in the years to come we will always have this type of men fresh from the ranks to represent "We, the people," in the Congress of the United States.

To Almighty God I lift my humble voice asking that He guide all of us so that our united actions may forever retain in America a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Jefferson Day Dinner Address by Hon. Samuel D. Jackson, of Indiana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. JACKSON] at the Jefferson Day dinner held in Pittsburgh, Pa., May 17, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Chairman Hannegan, Senator GUFFEY, and my fellow Democrats of Allegheny County, it is indeed an honor to be asked to share the speaking honors on this pleasurable occasion with the distinguished chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Robert E. Hannegan. In his short tenure he has demonstrated an organizational ability unsurpassed by anyone in our generation and a leadership which will carry us on to certain victory next November.

The pleasure I have in coming here is doubled at the thought that I have an opportunity to speak in the home city of one of the most eminent Members of the United States Senate, the Honorable JOSEPH F. GUFFEY. No one ever has to ask JOE GUFFEY twice where he stands on a controversial question. He needs no encomium from me. He has worked a lifetime for the Democratic Party. At every turn in the road he has stood by his administration on the floor of the Senate. All he needs is a new colleague. This you can give him and at the same time make him a senior Senator if you will send Francis J. Myers to Washington.

This is a Jefferson Day occasion and I respond to the toast, "Thomas Jefferson." I stood within the Jefferson Memorial at Washington. Every Democrat, who can, should stand there on that hallowed spot. I looked up at the great figure of Thomas Jefferson. Around him were his words:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident; Almighty God hath created the mind free; God who gave us life gave us liberty; I am not an advocate for frequent changes in laws and constitutions. But laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind * * *. With the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also to keep pace with the times."

I could feel the power of the Father of the Democrat Party. The sculptor and the architect wrought with such perfection that I had a sense of the presence of the great President.

I know there are men today who delight to distinguish between Jeffersonian Democrats and New Deal Democrats. That has been much overdone.

The language patterns used in this new experiment in free government we call America are not the same now as then. At their political leisure, I have no objection to Democrats exploring these differences. But in a campaign year, I always look for a motive when I hear a man who ought to be a Democrat say, "Im a Jeffersonian Democrat, but—". But what? A man is a Democrat or he isnt a Democrat. I hope tonight I address an audience comprised of men and women who are patriotic American citizens, joined by the ancient ties of the party of Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt. Again I take my place beside the great figure of Jefferson as he looks northward beyond the Tidal Basin, right at the White House, the Washington Monument at his right, the Lincoln Memorial at his left. I. seems to me he understands all this idle talk about different kinds of Democrats, and as he looks there to the White House, it seems I can hear him say, "There lives the greatest Jeffersonian Democrat of them all."

We are in an election year, sad and disturbing as that fact may be. But such things are necessary and of the very essence of the democracy for which we wage war, and as Jefferson would have it.

Jefferson said: "I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man, who in some great emergency should be deemed most capable of serving the public."

Some there are, like Job, who lament the fact that the present emergency and Roosevelt meet on the threshold of a fourth term instead of that of a first or second, but of such unexpected combinations of fact is the grim business of history.

The campaign is to be pitched on the plane of this great need of America and to the tone of the American faith that the Atlantic Charter is a monument to liberty, the "four freedoms" a vehicle of human hope. We walk humbly before the people, remembering that America's greatest crisis is at hand during this year, this campaign, and at this election.

Our adversaries seek to draw us to the level of the hustings of peacetime. They wail, "How long should we keep the Democratic Party in Washington?" There is an answer to that question.

How long? Until the escutcheons of this Government shall have been cleansed of the debauchery of the administration of Warren G. Harding.

How long? Until the economic and financial structures of this Republic shall have been healed of the rampant and unchecked pirating during the do-nothing administration of Calvin Coolidge.

How long? Until the last farmer, businessman, and worker shall have been made whole of the devastation wrought by the unfortunate and unsung administration of the great engineer.

How long? Until that permanent peace promised to the heroes of World War No. 1 shall have been kept in spirit and in truth.

How long? Until all these high ends can be reached or until the people have lost their faith in the possibility of their accomplishment, for there is not a mustard seed of hope for their achievement in the capacities of Mr. Dewey. Not even with the aid of his mentor and sponsor, Herbert Hoover.

One of the most spectacular events ever to occur on the floor of the Senate was Senator BARKLEY's now famous address. He played a single dramatic role with the United States Congress as his theater, the whole civilized world as his audience. This was a part of nothing more than a political incident, concluded in a few hours. Yet, within that time, this event, because its implications were adverse to the Executive, sky-rocketed Axis morale.

If this passing occurrence could accomplish that result, it is frightening to speculate the damage to the Allied effort if the party in power should be removed completely and with finality now in the midst of the conflict. No political speculation can escape this overwhelming factor.

They say a change of administration would not impair the war effort, but already we have a forecast of the tragic cost involved in changing the wartime administration.

We were impressed with Mr. Willkie's spectacular withdrawal from the Presidential contest. The results of the Wisconsin primary have been construed, at least by a part of the press, as a repudiation of Mr. Willkie's firm international policies, and a victory for the tenets of isolationism. Within 10 days, encouraged by this turn of political events, G. O. P. isolationist leaders urged a general slackening of the European war effort, and most flagrant of all, a Representative from our own State, Congressman EARL WILSON, openly advocated the abandonment of the war against the Axis. On the floor of the House of Representatives he said:

"Yes, today it is becoming clearer and clearer that our war is in the Pacific, and unless the objectives of the European war can be clarified in the minds of our people we can expect little more progress than is being made at Cassino, and, therefore, unless or until a better understanding is brought about we had better pull out of Europe and fight our battle in the Pacific."

Think of it! What do you think that does to the mercury in the Nazi morale thermometer?

Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, before the annual banquet of the American Society of Newspaper Editors in Washington recently discussing a growing disposition to set apart the Army and Navy from those in civilian life, stressed the fact that such an attitude of mind, such an illusion, is all wrong and that in disunion lies the only possibility of our ultimate defeat. Secretary Stimson said: "From the very beginning they (meaning the Axis propagandists) have continuously and consistently preached to their armed forces and to their people that the United States was too soft, too self-interested, too divided to wage war on the gigantic scale which they would force upon us. They (still referring to the Axis leaders) believe it now. They have staked their future on it."

Yes, a change would play into the hands of the Nazi propagandists with deadly result.

That the Axis Powers despair of survival is assured. They are fighting through 1944 in the hope that there will be a political upset in te United States next November, sufficient to remove the present administration from power. The Nazis hope they may get something less than unconditional surrender from some other administration.

A change would mean, at least, interruption. It would mean, inevitably, some change of plan—perhaps in the grand strategy itself. It would mean a change of surgeons in the midst of the operation. The sharp scalpel, the delicate hemostat, the deadly anesthesia, would pass from trained hands and cool heads to—what hands and what heads, no one knows. Who would select the successors to General "Ike" Eisenhower, General Douglas MacArthur, and Admiral Nimitz, and on what basis?

If I may quote from a new campaign song published by the Democratic National Committee written by Paul Porter:

"Don't change horses in the middle of the stream if you want to keep your britches dry.
My wise old pappy done told me, "Don't ever change your bet.
You know what ya got when ya got it, but you don't know what you're gonna get."

This war is not being fought by the members of any one political party. When a Jap sniper draws a bead on a marine in an island jungle he can't see a campaign button. War and partisan politics cannot mix.

Recognizing this fact, President Roosevelt gave many of the most important war posts to prominent Republicans. Mr. Henry Stimson, Secretary of State under President Hoover and Secretary of War under President Taft, was made Secretary of War. The late Col. Frank Knox, who had been the Republican candidate for Vice President in 1936, was made Secretary of the Navy. Judge Robert Patterson, a Republican, was made Under Secretary of War and placed in charge of the entire procurement program for the Army, and a long list of Republican industrialists and businessmen have been placed in key war positions, clothed with ample powers.

From a pacific nation in 1940 we have become the strongest military power on earth in 1944. The United States of America has accomplished more in 3½ years than the combined military and naval achievements of the Japs in half a century and the Nazis in a decade.

This is the result of Democrats and Republicans having peeled off their partisan coats, and going to work in their American shirt sleeves. But it has been achieved under Democratic leadership. If the American electorate is to act upon the principal that a political party is to be regarded for its leadership, then no justification appears to support a change in 1944.

What about the writing of the peace? At the peace table Churchill, Stalin, and Chang Kai-shek will be grasping each for his own post-war advantage, and justifiably so. The people want our representative to have an equal chance, to be big enough to hold his own. In Franklin D. Roosevelt is to be found a combination of knowledge and fervor rising to the heights of the growing soul of America, and matching the sublimity of the people's prayers for a just and durable peace. He knows the men with whom we shall have to deal. He knows the forces which will be brought into play. He has an enthusiasm for the field. The welfare of the United States—and in fact the welfare of the world—are at stake in the planning of the peace, and the best is none too good for the United States of America.

One thing is sure—the people of the United States do not want Gerald L. K. Smith—or anybody like him, representing us at the peace table when this war is over. They don't even want Herbert Hoover.

Shortly after the Wisconsin primary, Gov. Thomas E. Dewey surprised the United States by venturing into the press with a sage pronouncement on peace and post-war adjustments. He used language indicating that as to basis principles and main objectives, he has imitated the foreign policy of the President. Mr. Dewey spoke of durable cohesion and solid relations, among the United States Great Britain, Russia, and China.

He urged "prompt measures to establish a system of general international cooperation" and "conditions calculated to promote world-wide economic stability."

In 1940 when the President was imploring the Nation to follow him in preparation for war, Governor Dewey was demanding a foreign policy which would, to use his own words, "keep completely out of the affairs of Europe," calling the recognition of Russia a "fuzzy-minded departure from sound policy"; attacking Lease-Lend as threatening, to quote him again, "an end to free government in the United States." Now he suggests that Uncle Sam is, quoting him again, "a benevolent but slightly senile gentleman who seeks to purchase the goodwill of his poor relations by distributing among them the dwindling remains of his youthful years."

The Chicago Sun, in commenting upon Mr. Dewey's statement of international peace policy, characterized it as giving the isolationist Republicans a swift kick—and the followers of Wendell Willkie an olive branch—saying that he had divorced himself so completely from the reactionaries who killed off Mr. Willkie's candidacy that he cannot retreat into isolationism henceforth and stay honest.

The Chicago Tribune, in commenting upon this address, said "Mr. Dewey read a speech that the English press has hailed as the picking up by Mr. Dewey of the mantle that Mr. Willkie dropped when he fled," and added in its editorial comment, "there is a good deal in the speech to justify this interpretation."

But this is not Chicago. This is Pittsburgh. Here we would say this hopeful promise for a just and durable Christian peace is "sounding brass and tinkling cymbal"—a tale told by a candidate full of sound and fury seeking nothing. Man asks for a fish and Mr. Dewey gives him a stone. "Durable cohesion," he says. It if were not so pathetic it would be amusing.

While mankind the world around continues to "expunge itself," "to sing hymns," to "build bombing airplanes," to "convert again into explosives, the bewildered ammonia and the distracted cellulose" and to "convert into putrescent matter the hopeful bodies of the young," Mr. Dewey proposes to this mad and suffering race of men that we hold the world together with a few strips of adhesive tape.

If he would pluck some feathers from the wings of his imagination and stick them into the tail of his reason, this Walt Disney candidate for President would fly a course much nearer to the beam.

Let us recall clear historical proof to the effect that a change of administration may affect the peace prospects.

The election of 1918 went against President Wilson following his request for a Democratic Congress. This was the first and irretrievable step in the defeat of the Treaty, the ratification of which, through the League of Nations, had potentialities sufficient to have prevented World War No. 2.

The change of world outlook and policy effected by the psychological ultimates of that simple political fact ruined the peace prospects in 1920. Isolationism is not dead. It is not even dormant. It is simply lying back behind its natural camouflage preparing in a wily manner to strike at the earliest safe opportunity. If we change administrations, we change policy, and we may expect to see our dreams come tumbling down upon us, the wreckage of what might have been the cathedral of a just and durable peace.

Sitting in the Senate Chamber, I sometimes realize I can look down upon the very spot where the best prospects for peace this old world ever had was killed. There are the blood stains from the sacrifice. It was a sacrifice to the gods of partisan greed; and that by unhallowed hands. One can feel the chill of the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, riding out of nowhere, and dashing again back through the dark recesses of that same chamber, screaming like frustrated vampires, in search of a soul, which, found, would give them liberation and rest.

Unprinted in the Senate record, but none the less real, are the voices from Flanders fields, moaning that the torch they threw their statesmen was doused in the filthy vats of party hate. The Lodges of Massachusetts, the Watsons of Indiana, and the Boise Penroses of Pennsylvania, were not above striking down peace hopes to their partisan gain. Their modern prototypes, the backers of Thomas E. Dewey, many in Pennsylvania, are not above the same murderous blow for the same unholy cause.

I pray the United States Senate may be redeemed of this assassination, and that right early, that from that sepulchre where she now lies slain, Peace may rise, resurrected in the sunrise of man's new day, that they who lingered longest in her defense be the first to greet her on the morn.

We shall win in 1944 because the peculiar circumstances of the case compel it. But let me hasten to warn that no Democrat must seek in these circumstances any narrow partisan gratification. This year we fight for America, not for party. Every worker should be touched with the livid fire of high conviction that Franklin D. Roosevelt is the most valuable individual public servant in the world today, and that to retain his party in power until the job is done is a noble cause, and the greatest service to the memory of Thomas Jefferson.

Health Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Health Insurance," from the Washington Post of May 19, 1944. I should particularly like to urge the distinguished chairman and members of the Finance Committee to read the arguments advanced in this editorial for early consideration of the bill S. 1161 which the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] and I have introduced to amend and revise the Social Security Act. I should like to quote the two last paragraphs of this fine editorial:

The medical and hospital insurance features of the bill have been violently attacked by officials of the American Medical Association. They have contributed very little to sober consideration of the measure on its merits by referring to it as socialized medicine. If this is socialism, then so is the public school system. Good health, like good education, is one of the cornerstones of a democratic society. Under our present system of private medical practice, great portions of our population are compelled to go without adequate medical care, either because they cannot afford to pay for it and will not ask for charity, or because they live in rural areas to which doctors are not attracted. Under the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, workers would be able to pay, through insurance, for their own medical and hospital care, and doctors would be able, in general, to earn better incomes.

The various aspects of the proposed insurance program require, of course, the most careful study and consideration. We do not suggest any slapdash validation of them. But it is by no means too early, in our opinion, for Congress to start work on a program of this sort. The need is beyond denial. A genuine and comprehensive system of social security is the best possible foundation on which to build our post-war hopes.

If we are to have a sound social-security system in operation to meet the human problems of the reconversion and post-war period, we must start congressional consideration of this entire matter now—before the war is over.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEALTH INSURANCE

Nearly a year ago Senator WAGNER introduced, for himself and Senator MURRAY, a bill "to amend and extend the provisions of the Social Security Act." Representative DINGELL introduced it in the House. It was an exceedingly complex bill, 90 pages in length, designated not only to bring within the Social Security System great segments of our population not now protected by it but also to make the protection itself much more comprehensive—chiefly through establishment of a Federal system of medical and hospitalization benefits. The bill was referred to the Senate Committee on Finance, and there it has languished ever since, ignored if not entirely forgotten.

The Post had, and still has, certain misgivings about this bill. We said in our initial comment upon it that it seemed to us "unwise to launch a new program of social insurance in wartime requiring additional contributions of $5,000,000,000 annually from employers and employees." As a piece of concrete, practical postwar planing there is, on the other hand, much to be said for it.

We are inclined to agree with a defense of the measure offered in a speech last month by Senator MURRAY: "If we are to assure an orderly demobilization from wartime to peacetime conditions of full employment, we shall need a strong national unemployment insurance program and a national employment service. Our bill, if enacted soon enough, will carry unemployed workers and their families through the weeks or months while industry is reconverting. It will enable older workers to retire after the extra years of service they have given during the war. It will help returning service men and women to make the reajustment to civilian life. It will give all of us the security of knowing that we can have adequate medical care for ourselves and our families when it is needed and a continuing family income in case of sickness or disability.

The medical and hospital insurance features of the bill have been violently attacked by officials of the American Medical Association. They have contributed very little to sober consideration of the measure on its merits by referring to it as "socialized medicine." If this is socialism, then so is the public school system. Good health, like good education, is one of the cornerstones of a democratic society. Under our present system of private medical practice, great portions of our population are compelled to go without adequate medical care, either because they cannot afford to pay for it and will not ask for charity, or because they live in rural areas to which doctors are not attracted. Under the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, workers would be able to pay, through insurance, for their own medical and hospital care, and doctors would be able, in general, to earn better incomes.

The various aspects of the proposed insurance program require, of course, the most careful study and consideration. We do not suggest any slapdash validation of them. But it is by no means too early, in our opinion, for Congress to start work on a program of this sort. The need is beyond denial. A genuine and comprehensive system of social security is the best possible foundation on which to build our post-war hopes.

The Constitutional Issue in the Anti-Poll-Tax Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM CONNALLY

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Scuttling the Constitution," published in the Standard-Times of New Bedford, Mass., of May 12, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was orderd to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCUTTLING THE CONSTITUTION

The vital issue involved in the anti-poll-tax bill, now before the Senate, is whether the Constitution of the United States is to be nullified, or whether it is to be upheld.

In certain States of the South a citizen, in order to qualify as a voter, must have paid a poll tax. This newspaper does not approve that qualification, and has urged that it be abolished. But the fact is that no power to abolish it resides in the Congress. The Constitution makes that perfectly clear in providing that Representatives and Senators in Congress shall be elected by the people, and that the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the must numerous branch of the State legislature. The States alone have the power, limited only by the Constitution, to determine the qualifications of voters. Congress certainly does not have it.

For political purposes, and presumably as a bid for the Negro vote, some Republican Senators are teaming up with the New Deal Democrats to pass the anti-poll-tax bill, which already has been approved by the House. Many of them have been severe critics of the administration on the ground that to accomplish its ends, it has been willing to violate the Constitution. Some of them fought the Federal soldier ballot bill on that ground. Yet now they are themselves showing a willingness to scuttle the Constitution by supporting a clearly unconstitutional law.

By so doing they are guilty of the same evil practice for which they have condemned, and rightly condemned, the New Deal, and are throwing away one of the most important issues on which to appeal to the American people for support in the coming election.

Negroes who are victims of the poll-tax laws of the South, although by no means the only victims, naturally want to see them repealed. But they will lose much more than they can hope to gain through enactment, by Congress, of a law which definitely undermines the Constitution. If that charter of liberties can be breached in the passage of the anti-poll-tax law, it can be breached in other ways, and soon we shall have no Constitution, and the rights of the people which it now protects will be at the mercy of any majority in the National Legislature.

Effect of Taxation Upon Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT W. HAWKES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Shock Absorber," written by Maurice R. Franks, editor of the Railroad Workers Journal, and published in the issue of that periodical for April 1944. Mr. Franks is an intelligent and enlightened labor leader, and I believe his editorial will prove to be interesting to everyone who reads it.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SHOCK ABSORBER

Day by day our industrial highway is becoming more rough and at the pace we are traveling on this highway it will not be long until it becomes bumpy. Up to the present time little has been done to offset this condition. Speaking in plain language, our industrial condition today is nothing short of chaos, and simply because good business acumen is not being applied to offset an unnecessary shock which we will all face when this war is ended.

Industries, large and small, are being forced to operate on a basis absolutely contrary to good business tactics, through a system of taxation based on fabulous war time production. Few industries are able to lay aside enough surplus to take care of a sudden emergency, such as the abrupt ending of this war. The ending of this war means the immediate reconversion of industries, and under the present system of taxation these industries face an inevitable crash.

It seems to this writer that our Government would do well to establish a plan whereby all business, large and small, would be allowed to set aside a reasonable amount of their profits to guarantee no stoppage of employment during the reconversion period. Or safer yet, allow all business enough surplus to guarantee stability. Some people believe 5 percent of the gross would be an adequate amount. This may or may not be correct. For gigantic industries this would invariably be in excess of the requirement, and yet for small industries this amount may prove inadequate. This plar should be drafted to take care of conditions without making "fish of one or flesh of the other."

Under our system of free enterprise we must accept the slogan of "what helps business helps you," and by this same token we must recognize the fact also that what hurts business hurts you. Therefore it is important to all of us, whether we be workers, labor leaders, or the general public, to see to it that all legitimate industry be kept profitable, because unless it is, we are headed for another depression, which means unemployment and its natural effect—destitution for millions of workers.

To tax industry to the point of jeopardy is to place it at the mercy of tax collectors, bureaucrats, and politicians who have little, if any, knowledge of how to operate business. This is a very serious problem and warrants attention right now—not after the war, or after the next election. That would be too late to save our industrial structure. We must act now.

With the ending of the war will come the ending of war contracts and the resumption of competitive business which has been the backbone of our American system of free enterprise. Unless all business is permitted, through sufficient surplus, to enter into this competition it will mean that business in general is going to go for a very rough ride over our industrial highway. And those who cannot stand the shocks are going to be shocked to death. Therefore, it is obvious that a reasonable amount of current profits set aside to surplus would be the shock absorber.

Frankly yours,

MAURICE R. FRANKS, Editor.

Deliverence and Independence of Jewish People—Appeal by Hebrew Committee of National Liberation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement entitled "A Call by the Hebrew Nation for Help in Its Mortal Struggle for Life and Liberation," issued by the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CALL BY THE HEBREW NATION FOR HELP IN ITS MORTAL STRUGGLE FOR LIFE AND LIBERATION

We Hebrews, descendants of the ancient Hebrew nation, surviving today on God's earth amidst the dreadful catastrophe of torture and death that has befallen our people, have joined together in the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation to dedicate ourselves and our lives to secure the deliverance and independence of the remaining millions of our desperate people, struggling for life itself in the vast hell of German-occupied Europe.

What has happened to the Jews of Europe was not sudden. It is the culmination of centuries of oppression and persecution, centuries of ghettos and pogroms, economic strangulation, and endless humiliation and insult.

In this war this cumulative attack has resulted in the staggering climax of 3,000,000 innocent men, women, and children deliberately massacred.

In the face of such disaster, the bitter status quo of the Jews in Europe must give way to a new, bold, and total attempt at salvation.

These Jews today have no effective protection of citizenship from any nation. They can no longer be considered Rumanians, Hungarians, Poles, Germans. Certainly they are not Axis nationals. They are the first and bitterest enemies of the Axis. They belong to no nation and have no nation of their own. That is why the murder of 3,000,000 Jews—a number as large as the total population of many a European nation—has been possible.

Common disaster brings them together, even as death has hunted them together.

We therefore proclaim to the people of this land, and through them to all civilized men the world over, that the dry and tormented bones of the Jews in European lands have now been united, that the blood of our 3,000,000 dead has done more than fertilize the earth of the people who have murdered them. It has molded the survivors into a single living entity. It has brought forth a renascent Hebrew nation.

The Jews who live today in the hell of Europe, together with the Jews of Palestine, constitute the Hebrew nation.

There is no other nation to whom they owe allegiance but the Hebrew nation.

It is as a part of these millions that we exercise the rights of self-determination; that we proclaim the existence of the Hebrew nation and its determination to speak for itself and its elementary right to be represented by its own sons.

We confidently believe that the present-day heirs of the American Revolution will understand, recognize, and support us in this mortal struggle for our life and liberation.

It is proper that we have chosen Washington as the site for this historic rededication of the Hebrew nation as a democracy—Washington, eternal symbol of democracy and of the greatness of the human spirit and of its revolutionary demand for justice, decency, and freedom.

Let it be clearly understood that the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation does not attempt to speak for the Jews of the United States. They are an integral part of the American Nation; an integral part of a nation made up of people of every descent.

These Jews are Americans of Hebrew descent. They do not belong to Palestine and thereby to the renascent Hebrew nation any more than Justice Frank Murphy "belongs" to the Irish Nation, or General William Knudsen "belongs" to the Danish Nation; though both certainly are proud of their ancestry.

And let there be no confusion because the vast majority of Americans of Hebrew descent are faithful adherents of the Jewish religion.

Hebrews and Jews are not synonymous terms. Religion and state are separate. The common adherence of members of the American Nation and of the Hebrew nation to the Jewish religion is no different than the common adherence of Americans and Germans to the Protestant religion; or the common adherence of Americans and Italians to the Catholic religion. Everywhere in the world people share religions without sharing nationhood. The people of the Hebrew nation, and Americans of Hebrew descent, whose religion is the same, are no different from the others. They still are members of different states.

We proclaim that Palestine, in its historic boundaries, is the territory of the Hebrew Nation by the will of God as was set forth in the Bible. In our own time this was politically ratified by 52 nations who, in 1922, "recognized the historic connection between the Hebrew people and Palestine."

Although it is the national territory of the Hebrews, Palestine is to be a free state in which the present Arab and other non-Hebrew residents of the land will share full equality and privileges of citizenship and government—will be full partners in the upbuilding of a free country and a democratic civilization.

In the present condition of our Nation we are dedicated primarily to only one task—the rescue of our people. We, therefore, proclaim that the Hebrew Nation postpones the settlement of the political and boundary problem of Palestine until after victory, when, as one of the United Nations, we hope to partake in the post-war settlement of political territorial problems. Until that time we shall cooperate and assist Great Britain as the mandatory for Palestine.

We do, however, insist, in the name of humanity, that the right and the ability of all Hebrews in Europe to find shelter in Palestine be facilitated by the mandatory power, lest it be guilty of sacrificing them to their ruthless German murderers.

We proclaim the Hebrew Nation a cobelligerent in the United Nations' war against Axis tyranny. Our dead, who have bloodied the steps of civilization, can no longer be considered useless victims of insane massacre. They are honored casualties in the United Nations' common war for freedom. Our surviving 4,000,000 people in Europe are prisoners of war, and the International Red Cross should do everything it can to succor them even as it deals with all other prisoners of war.

But not all of our people have been victims.

We have contributed more fighters to the common struggle than most of the United Nations. Thousands of our men have fought and are daily fighting the enemy—whether as Hebrew guerrilla units harassing the enemy's lines in Poland and Yugoslavia—whether in the numerous underground sabotage groups, or as regular fighters and commandos as part of the 30,000 Hebrews who are serving in the Palestinian regiments and in other units of the Middle Eastern British Army. They have fought and died all the way from El Alamein to Cassino and from Syria to Addis Abbaba.

Because we are, in fact, a cobelligerent against the Axis, we consider ourselves one of the United Nations and seek recognition as such, and as the nation against which more atrocities have been committed than against all the other United Nations combined we surely should be represented on the Inter Allied Commission on War Crimes.

We also seek a seat on the Board of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration and all other United Nations councils in which the interests of our nationals are involved.

In addition, the tens of thousands of Hebrew fighting men should now be given the elementary right to fight the Nazis under their own banner and in their own name—as the Hebrew army—with a status comparable to that of the armies of the other nations which have been overrun by the Nazis.

These are the minimum needs of our nation at a time when the very existence of its people is at stake. Their denial by the United Nations would be contradictory to the very aims for which the war is being fought; would be a defeat of justice now and in the future; would be an endless threat to peace in the world of tomorrow. For in ignoring the principle for which the war is being fought, we can cheat no one but ourselves and our children.

The Hebrew Nation can no longer endure the status quo. An intolerable whirlpool of death and disaster has shattered this status quo. There is a limit to the blood and suffering any people can endure.

It is in this spirit of desperation, and with humility and reverence that we of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation have undertaken to be the servants and spokesmen of the Hebrew Nation, until such time as our nation shall be free to elect its own spokesmen and representatives in a democratic form. We solemnly swear to serve our nation with all our energies and might, and not to falter if we should need sacrifice life itself, so help us God.

Recent Developments in Petroleum Products by the Petroleum Administrator for War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. OREN HARRIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. HARRIS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Ralph K. Davies, Deputy Petroleum Administrator for War, before the oil subcommittee of the House—Lea—Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, May 17, 1944:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it has been about 6 months since I last appeared before your committee so I appreciate this opportunity to tell you of some of the more recent developments in the Petroleum Administration.

When we last met I was able to report that the critical domestic transportation situation had been greatly improved. At that time overland facilities had been developed sufficiently to permit us to place all sections of the country on a basis of parity as to the supply of such petroleum products as were available after satisfying military requirements.

ONE-HUNDRED OCTANE AVIATION FUEL

Today, I can report to you on another accomplishment—one that is providing the fighting fuel for our Army and Navy air men from the South Pacific to the Straits of Dover in their relentless destruction of the enemy. As of this date we are producing 100-octane aviation fuel at a rate in excess of 400,000 barrels per day. For comparison, in December of 1941 we produced in the United States alone some 45,000 barrels per day of this aviation fuel, and in a normal peacetime year our needs were amply satisfied with only 5,000 barrels per day.

You will be interested in how the huge increase was achieved in the United States during the first 2 years of the war.

1. Through new plants and facilities: Under a program sponsored by the Petroleum Administration for War the total cost of all new aviation fuel facilities will be in the neighborhood of $900,000,000. Eighty-five percent of that program is complete; $760,000,000 of that program will be spent for plants in this country. Some 41 major units have been completed from the first shovelful of earth to the fitting of the last high pressure valve. As you will see from the chart attached, these plants have added 35½ percent of the increased output of this fuel.

2. Through conversion of existing refinery units to production of aviation fuel: Seventy-two small units were converted from making motor gasoline blending stock to turning out 100-octane ingredients. Fourteen catalytic cracking plants, similarly employed on motor gasoline, were changed over to production of base stock for aviation fuel. We gained 14 percent of our increase from mechanical improvements and 13.8 percent by conversion.

3. Through new blending agents: American technical skill and ingenuity found for us chemical substances such as cumene and codimer to step up the quality of available base stock to 100-octane level, accounting for 31.9 percent of the increase. The addition of more tetraethyl lead, use of toluene, and other blending agents account for the balance.

The meteoric increase in actual output by the United Nations from Pearl Harbor to the present is shown on the second chart herewith.

More than 450 refineries and natural gasoline plants over the United States are linked to some phase of the 100-octane program. All of the principal refining districts in the country have contributed to the program and the general location of most of the plants is shown on the map which is chart No. 3.

As to finance, probably no other major war industry will have so small a proportion of Government participation. Of the $760,000,000 domestic program, $550,000,000 is private capital and the balance, through Defense Supplies Corporation, is Government investment, largely used to aid smaller refineries in the program.

I have stressed the volume of present output and the fourth chart presents a compelling reason as to why it takes so much aviation fuel to keep our bombers over Europe. This is the impact of distance on our supply problem. To get 1,000 barrels a month into the bomber's tanks, we must always have 3,000 barrels in reserve behind the lines in the war theater itself, and 2,000 barrels in manufacture and in transit.

Though the current world production of something over 400,000 barrels per day of 100 octane must be increased even further to meet our ultimate goal, I think we may be justifiably proud of the progress made in the supply of this No. 1 petroleum war product.

IMPACT ON CIVILIAN GASOLINE SUPPLIES

In peacetime a 42-gallon barrel of crude yielded some 18 gallons of automotive gasoline and one-half gallon of aviation fuel. Today that 18 is reduced to 11½ gallons of automitive gasoline to make way for aviation gasoline, toluene, TNT, butadiene, and increased amounts of fuel oil for heat and power. The difference between 18 and 11½, or 6½, are the gallons that have gone to war, as is clearly shown in chart No. 5. In spite of this decreased yield, however, we must continue to meet our essential farm, industrial, bus, truck, and passenger-car needs.

CRUDE PRODUCTION

The fountainhead of our supply is, of course, crude production, and today we are drawing from American wells 4,700,000 barrels daily of crude oil and other petroleum liquids—an increase of half a million barrels per day over May of last year. As a result, we are nearly at our limit of maximum efficient capacity in all areas. In addition, we are now importing 100,000 barrels per day to the east coast and hope to increase this substantially by the end of the year.

TRANSPORTATION

Victory in modern war is vitally dependent on the movement of troops, planes, tanks, ammunition, and supplies. The somber phrase "too little and too late," coined early in the war, decried the tragic inability to move supplies at home to battle fronts abroad. Transportation is no less significant in oil, and each new project completed has meant another battle won in our civilian campaign to meet Army and Navy demands for the right product at the right time and place.

In the last several months our transportation system has been further augmented by the completion of important additional facilities. These include the completion of the Government-owned 1,475-mile 20-inch products pipe line all the way to the eastern seaboard; Sinclair's 243-mile products pipe line from East Chicago, Ind., to Toledo, Ohio; the Stanolind's 385-mile crude pipe line from west Texas to Drumright, Okla.; and Magnolia's 381-mile crude pipe line from west Texas to Corsicana, Tex.

All told the total mileage of new pipe-line construction, reversals, and conversions completed up to April 1 of this year is 11,388 miles. The projects remaining to be completed in the next few months will add another 600 miles.

Today, 1,700,000 barrels per day are flowing to the eastern seaboard through pipe line, tank car, barge, and lake tanker, as against 1,369,000 barrels per day a year ago.

Present overland petroleum movements to the east coast are even higher than movements pre-war when ocean tankers were carrying 95 percent of the oil to the eastern seaboard. The magnitude of this changeover is clearly shown in chart No. 6, illustrating the four transportation media and the proportion of the total carried by each. You will note the dwindling tanker load and the sharply increased tank car and pipe line volumes.

This achievement in wartime transportation sponsored by the P. A. W. has made it possible for us to meet, barrel for barrel, the huge demands of the Army and Navy.

REFINING

Crude runs to refineries are programed at 4,468,000 barrels per day, or more than three-quarters of a million barrels per day over May of last year.

The committee has indicated its interest in the problem of the division of crude oil among refineries as among the different areas of the country and as among refineries within the same areas. I should like to report to you on this situation.

The Petroleum Administration for War has been charged with the responsibility of insuring production of the petroleum products that are necessary to meet military and essential civilian requirements. To accomplish this objective available crude oil supplies and available transportation must be provided first for those plants that manufacture critical war products; whatever is left is divided among other refineries. However, it should be understood that normal distribution channels are disturbed or restrictive measures taken only when a real need arises, and that such measures are terminated at the earliest possible time and they are confined to the smallest possible area.

As you know, shortly after Pearl Harbor it became necessary for the armed forces to withdraw most of the tankers which then were supplying crude oil to refineries on the east coast (Petroleum Administration for War's district 1). This withdrawal created a severe emergency in refinery operations in this area, and endangered production of critical war products, such as aviation gasoline and toluene for TNT. To insure maximum production of war products in this area nearest to the European and African war theaters and to insure that plant capacity would not remain unused, a plan was worked out to divide the available crude oil in such a manner as to provide a minimum crude supply to all plants for maximum production of war products. Any crude above that required for the manufacture of war products was divided among the war and nonwar plants according to their relative throughput of crude during a certain pre-war base period. This general plan was put into effect as early as May 1942 and has been continued in a somewhat modified form up to the present. Improvement in transportation, as exemplified by the Big Inch war emergency crude oil pipe line and the 20-inch war emergency refined products pipe line has allowed crude runs to be increased as the demands of war plants have increased. The actual crude runs in the district have increased from somewhat less than half a million barrels a day in May 1942 to more than three-quarters of a million barrels a day. Approximately 95 percent of this crude is used in production of critical war products.

The situation on the Gulf coast (Petroleum Administration for War's district 3) has been the converse of the situation in district 1. In district 3 there has been adequate production of crude oil, but transportation has been the limiting factor. In normal times much of the volume of products refined had been transported by tanker. The production of critical war products, such as aviation gasoline, toluene, and components used in the synthetic-rubber program, was seriously endangered. The Petroleum Administration for War recognized the danger and took remedial action.

Transportation required by war plants was determined, and available transportation in excess of this amount was divided among the refineries so that maximum war products were made with no plant being reduced below 70.5 percent of its crude run during the last 6 months of 1941. The yield of motor gasoline was reduced to increase the yield of fuel oil, which was needed by the railroads. Subsequently refinery programs have been developed so that minimum crude runs for all war plants have been continually corrected to correspond with the ability of various plants to produce war products, and the remaining available transportation has been divided so that all war and nonwar plants share equitably.

With increased efficiency of tank-car movements, the construction of the 24-inch crude line, and of the 20-inch products line, crude runs could be increased. Conditions had improved to such an extent by the summer of 1943 that the Petroleum Administration for War was able to remove the restrictions cited above.

The effect of the war period on the mid-continent area, known to the Petroleum Administration for War as district 2, has been due in large part to the declining productivity of the oil fields in this area. Also, transportation facilities such as pipe lines were available to bring crude from district 2 to war plants on the east coast and, therefore, these inventories were used in meeting the military demands made on such refiners. A directive was issued on November 19, 1942, in which crude runs in district 2 were reduced by approximately 5 percent and not over 10 percent in order to supply emergency requirements on the east coast. However, the directive was later modified in January of 1943 to increase the production of much-needed residual fuel oil, and by May 8, 1943, steps had to be taken to balance the operations of refineries in district 2. On that date a directive was issued by the Petroleum Administration for War which provided for a general adjustment in refinery runs in district 2 to approximately 85 percent of normal capacity. (Normal capacity being defined at that time as operations of the last half of 1941.) By these adjusted runs, applicable except in cases involving maximum production of critical war products, additional crude oil was made available to refineries whose inventories had been depleted below minimum working-stock levels. Also, plans were worked out whereby excess crude carried in storage by certain companies was divided among refineries, large or small, so that the industry could be kept in a balanced condition that would permit maximum operation under existing conditions. Since the summer of 1943, additional crude has been made available to refineries in district 2 and, therefore, such restrictive measures have been modified.

INCREASING DISTRICT 2 SUPPLIES

It has been a real problem to increase the availability of crude supplies to district 2 and we have taken full advantage of such means as were at our disposal. For one thing, the great crude-oil reserves of west Texas were opened to district 2 refiners by the construction of the Stanolind 385-mile crude pipe line from west Texas to Drumright, Okla., with a daily capacity of 65,000 barrels. In addition, transportation-compensation arrangements have been worked out so that west Texas crude can be moved to district 2 refiners by tank car.

More recently steps have been taken to encourage increased barge shipments of Gulf Coast crudes and tank-car shipments of crudes from the Wyoming area through compensatory arrangements that cover the added transportation costs for these movements.

It is a matter of interest that, despite the fact there is still some additional refining capacity available in district 2, the crude runs in this district were at the very high level of 1,153,000 barrels a day in April of this year, which is 283,000 barrels a day above the average peacetime runs of 1939.

UTILIZING SMALL PLANTS

At this point you may be interested to know what the general effect of Petroleum Administration for War regulations has been on small refineries. Studies which have been made indicate that fewer refineries are idle now than during peacetime, that the average throughout of refineries of less than 5,000 barrels a day rated capacity has increased and that more small refiners have been able to increase plant capacity than was the case in the period from 1936 to 1941.

It has been the policy of the Petroleum Administration for War to encourage all refineries, and especially the smaller refineries, to produce critical war products. A few examples will be cited.

One small Texas refinery with capacity of 3,000 barrels a day, was in a position to produce components of aviation gasoline and was interested in installing equipment for the manufacture of still others. With the aid of the Petroleum Administration for War the company proceeded with the installation of equipment for cumene production and completed the construction by the first of 1943. Thereupon the crude runs of the company were increased sufficiently to allow for maximum production of this critical war product.

A small refinery in Oklahoma could not meet the Petroleum Administration for War's directives as to product output. However, it was found that the plant was refining a crude which would produce base stock for 100-octane aviation gasoline. With priorities arranged for by the Petroleum Administration for War, equipment was installed so that the base stock could be fractionated, and from December 1943 up to the present time, between 175 and 280 barrels a day of this essential material has been produced by the company. Further, a polymer plant owned by the company was converted to produce maximum yields of another very important component of aviation gasoline. This production of critical war products has entitled the company to even more than normal crude runs.

Again, a refinery in the east Texas area, had been shut down and idle for several years because of the competitive nature of the gasoline sales in that area. In answer to the Petroleum Administration for War's request for maximum production of all aviation gasoline, especially 87-octane, the company submitted a proposal for the reconditioning of its plant so as to make 73 or 87-octane aviation gasolines and butane-butylene fraction needed for the production of alkylate or synthetic rubber. The Petroleum Administration for War approved the proposal, aided the company in obtaining the necessary priorities and made the necessary crude available for the maximum production of war products.

Our prime objective always has been to secure the maximum production of the petroleum products most urgently needed by the armed forces, and to assure an adequate supply of products essential to war industry and to the civilian economy. We have heard it said that crude runs were restricted arbitrarily. However, the facts indicate that all possible information and advice has been obtained previous to the taking of action, and that the measures it has been necessary to take, such as the restricting of crude runs in district 2, have been rescinded just as soon as possible in keeping with our overall program. It has been necessary to adopt different policies in different areas of the country, reflecting variations in the situations of each. But, looking back over the last 3 years, we feel it justifiable to say that the war program has benefited by the utilization of the crude supplies, transportation facilities, and refining capacity which have been made available, and that the measures taken, while necessarily worded in restrictive terms, have actually resulted in higher crude runs than could have prevailed otherwise.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRODUCTS

Now as to the problem of the distribution of petroleum products to distributors, as between the different areas of the country, and as between units of the industry within the same areas, in which the Committee has indicated its interest.

Inasmuch as the east coast (Petroleum Administration for War's District 1) was hit the earliest and hardest because of the tanker diversions it might be well to comment first on the steps which had to be taken to apportion the drastically curtailed supply in such manner as to satisfy the current rationed needs of all consumers within the district. This has been accomplished throught the issuance of three Petroleum Administration for War regulations—directive 59 and Petroleum Administrative Orders 1 and 5. Together these regulations constitute the basis for a comprehensive supply and distribution program designed to make available to district 1 the maximum amount of petroleum products from all available facilities.

Directive 59, issued in September 1942, divides district 1 into six zones. The current rationed needs of consumers in each zone are determined by the Petroleum Administration for War each month and supplies are directed to meet these requirements.

Experience under the directive proved that adjustments in supply had to be made from time to time in order to meet unexpected variances in demand between suppliers doing business in the same trade area.

Consequently in December of 1943, directive 59 was amended to provide a method by which any supplier whose available products were insufficient to meet the current rationed needs of its customers could secure a reassignment of additional supplies to make up this deficiency. This redistribution provision thus provides that consumers receive products according to rationed demands.

The administration of Directive 59 is very complicated, but with the suggestions and assistance of two representative industry committees (the supply and transportation committee and the marketing and distribution committee), the directive is proving itself a successful device for attaining the Petroleum Administration for War's fundamental objectives of bringing the maximum amount of petroleum products into district 1 and of distributing these products fairly and equitably among suppliers. These industry committees are established by the Petroleum Administration for War and function under the direct control and supervision of the Petroleum Administration for War.

The great bulk of all petroleum products shipped into district 1 is scheduled under directive 69; however, there are some additional shipments which are not covered by directive 59 but which must be controlled, if the total east-coast supply is to be distributed in accordance with consumer requirements.

Upon the delivery of petroleum products to suppliers in district 1 under directive 59 and Petroleum Administrative Order No. 1, the Petroleum Administrator for War has two obligations to fulfill, namely:

1. To assure the military forces and to farmers for nonhighway uses all products which they require.

2. To distribute remaining supplies among all units of the industry so that each unit, whether it be primary supplier, secondary supplier, distributor, jobber, or dealer, receives its current rationed demand.

In order to carry out these obligations, the Petroleum Administration for War issued in December 1942, Petroleum Administrative Order No. 1. This regulation provides that the military forces and farm nonhighway uses have first call on all petroleum supplies. It further provides that after these preferred uses have been satisfied each supplier in distributing the supplies remaining must serve every one of its 1942 customers, and supply all customers to the extent of their current rationed requirements.

In view of the increasing quantities of products being taken for military use from other districts, and the resulting increase in the problem of meeting essential civilian requirements in such districts, the Petroleum Administration for War is now considering, in consultation with industry, a revision and extension of Petroleum Administrative Order No. 1, to be effective in any district where its need is indicated.

MAINTAINING ESSENTIAL CIVILIAN ACTIVITIES

The Petroleum Administration for War in cooperation with the several agencies which present civilian claims to the Petroleum Requirements Committee: namely, War Food Administration, Office of Defense Transportation, Office of Civilian Requirements, Office of War Utilities, and Office of Operations Vice Chairman of the War Production Board, has made every possible effort to determine as nearly as possible the quantities of petroleum products required to maintain essential civilian activities throughout the country. When available supplies are insufficient to meet all requests, the most equitable distribution of the supply available is determined through consultation with the claimant agencies and the quantities available to each agency are then certified to these agencies which in turn ask the Office of Price Administration to effect the distribution through its Petroleum Rationing Branch. In no instance has the Petroleum Administration for War failed to make available at least the quantities certified by it to the Office of Price Administration.

The main point to remember is we are supplying from continental United States to the military almost 1,000,000 barrels a day more than we were called upon to supply in 1941. This great increase has been met while the over-all supply of petroleum products to the civilian and industrial economy has been reduced only 12½ percent. At the same time the gasoline demand for essential trucks and busses and for nonhighway use, the demand for kerosene, the industrial use of distillate and residual oils, are all greater than they were in 1941. Thus, the reduction has been only in gasoline for passenger cars as shown in chart No. 7 and in the civilian use of distillate and residual.

Some uninformed individuals, possibly misled by supply figures, have made statements to the effect that there is no further need for restricting civilians' use of gasoline and other petroleum products. Statements of this kind are as unfortunate as they are misleading.

Although substantial gains have been made in the production and refining of petroleum and by the material contribution by the public in the reduction of its use of petroleum products, they have been more than offset by these enormous military requirements. Any deficiency has been made up from previously accumulated inventories of crude oil and petroleum products, with the result that present inventories are far below normal.

A glance at the attached chart showing comparative stocks of civilian grade motor gasoline in the United States for 1941 and 1944 will show the extent to which the draft on stocks of this product has been necessary. At the end of 1941 inventories stood at 79,095,000 barrels, and on the last day of April this year they were at the relatively low figure of 50,491,000 barrels.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize again that to meet the current total military and essential civilian demand, which today is substantially greater than the last normal pre-war year—1941—has taxed our productive capacities and in addition has required a heavy draft upon above-ground working inventories of crude oil and all petroleum products to the extent that inventories are far below normal. In the face of current abnormal demand they, therefore, cannot by any stretch of the imagination be characterized as surplus.

Wishful thinking or uninformed or irresponsible statements cannot alter the facts; we are on the eve of military events the precise effect of which no one can foretell. The outcome of these vast pending military operations must determine what supplies of petroleum products can be made available for civilians. I think we shall do well to meet the Nation's essential wartime petroleum requirements until the war is won.

Mother's Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, Mother's Day, the second Sunday in May, has been authorized by act of Congress since 1914, as a day on which to memorialize the deepest, most abiding devotion known in the world. It emphasizes to us each year, the perennial mother-love that speaks a universal language, regardless of race, color or creed. It is understood in all lands, in all ages, from the cradle to the grave, for it is constant through riches or poverty, in sickness and health, success or failure.

The love of home, family, country—our very spiritual life itself, is but the lengthened shadow of some mother-love, yours, mine, everybody's. We all remember with answering hearts Kipling's immortal poem:

If I were hanged on the highest hill,
Mother o' mine,
I know whose love would follow me still,
Mother o' mine, O Mother o' mine.
If I were drowned in the deepest sea,
Mother o' mine,
I know whose tears would come down to me,
Mother o' mine, O Mother o' mine.
If I were damned of body and soul,
Mother o' mine.
I know whose prayers would make me whole,
Mother o' mine, O Mother o' mine.

Our mother taught us our first prayers; we listened to her lullaby till sweet sleep came to us in her loving arms.

God give us more and more worthy mothers who will produce the stalwart children this Nation so greatly needs, to maintain its honesty, its integrity, its responsibility, and its high endeavors.

The mother of the founder of Mother's Day began her community work in a Sunday School of which she was superintendent for 25 years. Her endeavor was known as mother's work—working for better mothers, better homes, better children, better men and women.

As a very young woman, she attended a public meeting called in the town square of Philippi at the very beginning of the Civil War. This town was on the border line of the North and South. The presiding officer called for a volunteer prayer to bless the meeting. No one would come forward because "the first man to make a move might be shot," writes a person there at the time. With courage, devotion, and calmness, Mrs. Anna Reeves Jarvis came forward and asked God to bless that meeting and their soldiers.

After the Civil War, when enmity still divided the families in Grafton, W. Va., where the family had established a home, this same mother of the founder of Mothers' Day sent out invitations for a mothers' picnic. From all over the county the mothers responded and brought their sons with them. Ere the day was over, under the spell of mother love and the gladness to be home, the soldiers forgot their bitterness, extended their hands to one another, and decided to be friends again. And so—

As one lamp lights another, nor grows less,
So nobleness enkindles nobleness.

When Mrs. Anna Reeves Jarvis died, her daughter, Anna M. Jarvis, began her Herculean task to establish Mothers' Day as a loving tribute to all mothers, planning to have the day permanently authorized in every State, with national and international recognition. On the second Sunday in May 1907 the first Mothers' Day was sponsored in the city of Grafton, W. Va., to honor her mother there. The day was to honor not only her mother, but all mothers who had worked with her, and all mothers who had given their best, their all, to build the eternal principles of right and righteousness into the life and fabric of their community.

The second celebration, in 1908, was held not only in Grafton, but in Philadelphia, as well, for the family had moved to Philadelphia after the father's death. To this meeting, in Grafton, Miss Anna Jarvis sent 1,000 white carnations from Philadelphia, to be given to the mothers of Grafton. The white carnation, her mother's favorite flower, has since been made the official emblem of Mothers' Day. Miss Jarvis repeated this generous gesture for more than 10 years.

Little did she think, but deeply did Miss Jarvis hope, that Mother's Day would so soon become world-wide in its acceptance, for by the third celebration, in 1909, 45 States, Puerto Rico,

Canada, and Mexico joined in its observance. This year, 35 years later, by proxy, Miss Jarvis recently made contact with the representative of Mexico, in Mexico City.

In 1913 Miss Anna M. Jarvis was sent as a delegate to the World Sunday School Convention held in Zurich, Switzerland. While abroad, she continued to internationalize Mother's Day. And today, besides those nations already mentioned, Mother's Day is observed in Australia, Sweden, Latvia, Brazil, Italy, Egypt, New Zealand, India, France, Great Britain, Switzerland, Russia, China, Alaska, and the Hawaiian Islands.

Miss Jarvis said some time ago that the happiest day of her life was the day on which President Woodrow Wilson signed the congressional resolution calling for the display of the flag on Mother's Day. That day was May 8, 1914. The joint resolution to honor mothers and the flag simultaneously reads as follows: "For displaying the American flag, and for the public expression of our love and reverence for the mothers of the country." After President Wilson signed the resolution, he graciously presented the pen he had used to Miss Anna Jarvis. It is one of her treasures. She reminded us that this resolution was the second time that congressional legislation had ever referred to the flag.

Recently, Miss Jarvis presented a United States flag to Admiral Richard E. Byrd, to take with him on his latest trip to Antarctica. This flag was to signify that a mother's love, as well as the loyalty to the flag, reaches to the uttermost parts of the earth. Admiral Byrd generously returned it from Antarctica, thoughtfully timing its arrival so that Miss Jarvis would receive it about the time of Mother's Day. This flag she has added to her famous flag collection connected with Mother's Day.

Miss Jarvis' correspondence on Mother's Day has been voluminous and deeply interesting. Mark Twain, Theodore Roosevelt, David Lloyd George, and John Wanamaker were among the writers. General Pershing himself sent the following letter to all his commanding officers in the First World War:

> I wish that every officer and soldier of the American Expeditionary Forces would write a letter home on Mother's Day. This is a little thing for each one of us to do, but these letters carry back our courage and affection to the patriotic women whose love and prayers inspire us to victory.

This year, in tribute to Miss Jarvis, who is ill and totally blind, her friends constituting the Anna M. Jarvis committee urge, as never before, that mothers shall say to our enemies, through their beloved sons, "You shall not pass"; and that sons will echo the immortal testimonial of Lincoln, the great savior of his country, "All I am or all I hope to be, I owe to my angel mother." And they hope as well that these sons in the armed services may truthfully repeat the testimonial of Washington, the Father of his Country, who said of his mother, "If I have been of any service to the United States of America, the credit all belongs to my wonderful mother."

The committee in charge is grateful to all the 38 Governors who have responded so far with proclamations for Mother's Day.

We quote from four proclamations sent with letters from Governors: Gov. Chauncey Sparks of Alabama says they are "honoring particularly those mothers who are so courageously carrying on while their sons and daughters are in the service of our country."

Governor Ray Smith of Indiana mentioned "mothers whose sons are defending the Nation's sovereignty, integrity, honor, freedoms, and traditions."

Governor Homer Adkins of Arkansas says in his proclamation:

> Whereas in the midst of an unholy and unnatural war the fortitude and the faith of the mothers of this Nation is an inspiration to the world; and
> Whereas it is but fitting that we should on this day venerate the love and affection of mothers who have shown themselves worthy of the love and respect of sons and daughters who are supporting this Nation in its hour of trial.

Governor Edward Martin, Pennsylvania's great wartime Governor, says:

> Closer to the human heart than any other influence is that of mother love. Here the hopes and aspirations of men find their highest and most beautiful expression.
>
> Today the mothers of our land, called upon to bear the greatest share of war's anxieties, are facing the ordeal with heroism and sacrifice, true to the tradition of pioneer mothers who braved the perils of the wilderness to make our Nation great.
>
> Mother's Day, which will be observed Sunday, May 14, has deeper significance in these troubled times. It is a day on which we manifest our highest admiration, our warmest love, and most sincere veneration to our mothers and pledge ourselves anew to be worthy of the love by which we are blessed.
> I therefore urge the citizens of Pennsylvania to join in the celebration of Mother's Day and to participate in Mother's Day ceremonies in the schools and churches and other public ceremonies throughout the Commonwealth.

May God bless Mother's Day in 1944, and may it be observed on land and sea, uniting us all in the challenge to render tireless devotion and loving service to our country, thus fittingly honoring our mothers who gave us love, loyalty, and the inspiration to be worthy of those from whom we received the blessed privilege of life.

G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. D. EMMERT BRUMBAUGH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation on the splendid formulation of the G. I. bill of rights, an over-all veterans' benefits measure, passed by the House of Representatives May 18.

Being a veteran of World War No. 1, I know how much the opportunities contained in the provisions of this bill will mean to the veteran of Warld War No. 2. When we veterans of the last war returned after serving many months overseas we were faced with extreme hardship in our effort to rehabilitate ourselves and secure a job in order to keep body and soul together. Our bonus was $60, a sum so small and insignificant that it was of very little assistance in our efforts to take up where we left off in 1917.

The G. I. bill of rights provides for 26 weeks of unemployment compensation at $20 weekly; additional hospitals for veterans, through new construction and exchanges between the Veterans' Administration and the services; the right to attend schools of their own choice for a maximum of 4 years at Government expense provided tuition and other fees do not exceed $500 annually; qualified veterans without dependents would receive $50 monthly for subsistence while in school, with $75 for those with dependents; however, veterans who were over 24 at the time of entrance into service would be required to show that war service had interfered with their schooling or that they were in need of a refresher course. The veteran would be allowed to attend a college, trade school, or vocational school of his own choice, provided it was approved by State educational authorities or the Veterans' Administration.

This legislation has been drawn up and passed in the American way, and bills such as this one provide the continuance of private enterprise and the continuance of our constitutional form of government. Our boys want rehabilitation—not charity. They want to be independent and self-sustaining. You cannot pay for patriotism with dollars and cents, but you can pay to educate a man and place him in a position where he can depend on his own efforts. Under this bill a soldier can borrow the money in his own home town at any loaning agency he chooses and at the lowest rate of interest available. It is my belief that most of the returning soldiers will borrow from their local banks at a lower rate of interest than the Government agencies charge at this time.

Many of the Members of Congress today are veterans of World War No. 1 and are determined that the boys who return after this conflict will receive the rights and privileges which they so justly deserve. The various veteran organizations who worked unceasingly to perfect this legislation deserve much of the credit and the highest tribute that can be paid them for their interest at all times in our boys who are fighting today on the far-flung battle fronts of the world so that we may continue to refer to our beloved America as "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

O. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me, I desire to include in the RECORD a letter written me by Mr. Don E. Huddleston, a member of the Malone (N. Y.) War Price and Rationing Board, in reply to a letter written me by Mr. Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration:

MALONE, N. Y., May 17, 1944.

Hon. CLARENCE E. KILBURN,
Member, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KILBURN: Enclosed is Mr. Bowles' letter of April 26, which I am glad to have had an opportunity to read.

I would go along with Mr. Bowles in his argument that there should be some basic regulations, but it seems to me that present regulations have gone considerably beyond this stage. It would appear that the national office might well determine what goods and services are most essential to the war effort and their relative importance. Also, it would seem that the national office might well determine the quantity of rationed goods available and supervise their distribution to the various parts of the country. However, to set up by regulation the eligibility of a specific user seems to be going too far. I believe local boards are in a much better position to determine individual eligibility within a necessary industry than is anyone in Washington. Under present conditions, boards are sometimes forced to refuse a worthy applicant because of regulations.

Mr. Bowles apparently feels that regulations are necessary in order to insure uniformity. I do not entirely agree with this point of view. Uniformity throughout the country is not necessarily needed because the importance of any particular industry varies greatly in various parts of the country. Here again I think local boards are in a much better position to determine who, in their area, can make the greatest contribution to the war effort.

Mr. Bowles does not need to worry about boards allotting gas for fishing trips while other essential users are being denied. Local public criticism will take care of this stiuation adequately.

I would also be willing to go along with Mr. Bowles by saying that the problem I have brought out here could be very greatly reduced if we had a State office staff in whom we had complete confidence and who had indicated to us that their major concern was service to the public. However, after such things as Mr. Herzog's memo and the political and religious survey, any confidence I ever had in the present staff has been destroyed.

With regard to the chief clerk, I feel that the confusion still exists. Mr. Bowles implies that approval of the chief clerk must be made by the district director in order to prevent favoritism on the part of the local board and in order to obtain a high-grade clerical employee. Evidently, he does not trust our ability or fairness, but he expects us to trust and have complete confidence in his district director who has indicated that he intends to consider politics and religion. Here again the problem could be reduced to the minimum if we had a district office staff who had the ability to create complete confidence on the part of board members. Lacking this confidence, I constantly have the feeling that the district director may be trying to do just what Mr. Bowles says he is trying to prevent.

I do not agree with Mr. Bowles that the Board members are now elected democratically. You will notice that the local war council only recommends. The appointment is actually made by the district director. It is too easy to find an excuse for not appointing a particular individual. Therefore, I do not consider the present system democratic when final approval is based upon the decision of one individual, and particularly when that individual has already done things to create suspicion.

With regard to my last complaint, Mr. Bowles has entirely evaded the issue. The questions were:

1. Who instructed Mr. Herzog to issue a memorandum demanding that board members resign whenever they felt it desirable to criticize the O. P. A.?

2. Who instructed the district office to make a political and religious survey of present board members?

I might also add this question: Is this practice going to continue or can we expect a little more cooperative and sympathetic attitude from the district office?

Sincerely yours,

DON E. HUDDLESTON.

Extension of Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD J. McMURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. McMURRAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from the board of directors of the Midland Cooperative Wholesale with resolutions adopted by them on the reenactment of the price-control law. This letter was addressed to my distinguished colleague the Honorable THOMAS E. SCANLON:

MIDLAND COOPERATIVE WHOLESALE,
Minneapolis, Minn., April 15, 1944.

Hon. THOMAS E. SCANLON,
Chairman, Congressional Committee for the Protection of Consumers, Room 422, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Midland board of directors today adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the Price Control Act has thus far done much to check an extreme rise in prices and prevent an inflation which would be disastrous to our war effort; and

"Whereas such an act is absolutely essential to the winning of the war, even though it subjects some special interest groups to temporary inconveniences and annoyances; and

"Whereas it may be necessary and desirable for the benefits of the Price Control Act to be extended for some time yet in order to hold and expand the gains so far made in the battle against inflation; and

"Whereas it may be necessary and desirable for the Price Control Act to remain effective for some time after the war in order to prevent a post-war economic runaway of prices and spending: It is hereby

"Resolved by the board of directors of Midland Cooperative Wholesale, in behalf of some 180,000 member-patrons of Midland and affiliated retail cooperatives in the Central Northwest, That extension of the Price Control Act as of June 30 is highly desirable and is urgently recommended.

"BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
"MIDLAND COOPERATIVE WHOLESALE."

We are sending this resolution to Mr. John Carson of the Cooperative League of the United States of America for transmittal to the Conference to Save the Price Control Act.

Yours sincerely,

A. J. SMABY,
General Manager.

International Economic and Currency Stabilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES S. DEWEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. DEWEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Wall Street Journal of May 18, 1944:

REVIEW AND OUTLOOK

WHAT HAVE WE PROMISED?

More or less in the public eye are three global financial proposals for the post-war era. One would set up a so-called stabilization fund. Another calls for a world-wide reconstruction finance corporation. These two are sponsored by the Treasury, and have been the subject of negotiations between American experts and those of other nations. The third proposal has been offered by Representative CHARLES S. DEWEY, of Illinois. Under the Dewey proposal the United States would set up a $500,000,000 fund to be used in cooperation with other nations.

On Tuesday Harry D. White, whose name is attached to the Treasury plans, testified before a congressional committee adversely to the Dewey plan.

Favorable action on the Dewey plan, Mr. White said, would disappoint those working with the Treasury, and "to experts the world over there would be a let-down with passage of this bill." The reason for this anticipated disappointment is the limited scope of Mr. DEWEY's bill.

It seems to us that instead of condemning the Dewey bill, Mr. White revealed something about his own work, and that the revelation deserves further congressional investigation immediately.

Mr. DEWEY proposes to make Government loans to other nations. He proposes that those loans be 50 percent American money with the other 50 percent contributed from other sources. The lenders would carefully supervise expenditures of the money to see that it was applied as agreed.

Mr. White says that any such procedure would cause "disappointment." It must be assumed then, that a great deal more than this has been impliedly promised by the American negotiators. What more? And what grounds are there for believing that promises which have been implied will be fulfilled by the only competent body, which is Congress?

This newspaper has more than once expressed the opinion that one of the weaknesses of the Treasury operations is that they are of the character Mr. White intimates; that they are implying the ability to do things which Congress will not permit. If that is so they are piling up trouble because nations which will receive help far less in amount and on far less open-handed terms than they have been led to expect will be resentful.

We do not wish to be understood as endorsing Mr. DEWEY'S proposal, or any other proposal to lend money of this Government to other governments. However, the Dewey plan has one advantage over Mr. White's. Its meaning is clear and its limits are defined. Mr. White's testimony has not lessened the unpleasant impression that the Treasury proposals are purposely vague.

Commando Sgt. Charles E. Kelly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. SCANLON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. SCANLON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein an address which I gave at the public testimonial to Commando Sgt. Charles E. Kelly at West Park, North Side, Pittsburgh, Pa., on April 26, 1944, and to include also the proclamation of the Honorable Cornelius D. Scully, mayor of the city of Pittsburgh, and an editorial which appeared in the Pittsburgh Press:

ADDRESS OF HON. THOMAS E. SCANLON OF PENNSYLVANIA

Commando Kelly, Mrs. Kelly, honored guests, ladies and gentlemen, in the name of my fellow Congressmen from Allegheny County and on behalf of the entire House of Representatives, I want to express the deep gratitude which all Americans feel toward Commando Kelly.

This brave soldier has brought great glory not only to Pittsburgh and Allegheny County, but to the United States Army and to the Nation. Words are poor tools to express properly our gratitude. They are too easily forgotten.

Yes; we owe much more to Commando Kelly, and the millions of our sons and daughters who are daily risking their lives, than speeches or any public celebration could signify. Our debt is eternal.

We cannot pay off that debt with bronze memorials or with pensions, bonuses, and other cash payments. These are all well earned and justified, but you simply cannot buy the brave deeds of Commando Kelly and his buddies with money either today or tomorrow.

The leaders of industry and labor, public officials, the responsible citizens of this Nation, all of us, must begin at once to prepare to properly discharge the debt we owe to the men and women of our armed services.

We must give our returning heroes what every man desires most of all—a right and the opportunity to earn a living, to reunite or establish a family, to buy a home, to educate his children, to enjoy life in the full and accepted American way.

Those who return unable to work at their former occupations must be taken care of; must be fully rehabilitated not in the spirit of charity but in the spirit of gratitude, because they were incapacitated fighting for you and for me.

An editorial writer for the Pittsburgh Press rightly asked, "After the parade, what?" That's my answer, and I believe it's the answer of every person here and throughout the Nation, including the editorial writer.

PROCLAMATION OF HON. CORNELIUS D. SCULLY, MAYOR OF PITTSBURGH

Whereas Sgt. Charles E. Kelly, a resident of Pittsburgh, by his heroic exploits against the enemy in Italy, has again proven that out of this great arsenal of democracy comes the finest fighting man of any nation; and

Whereas in recognition of Sergeant Kelly's prowess and conspicuous gallantry above and beyond the call of duty a grateful Nation has awarded this Pittsburgh boy its highest military honor—the Congressional Medal of Honor; and

Whereas Sergeant Kelly's heroic deeds have reflected glory upon the city of his birth and education, again definitely establishing that valor, self-sacrifice, and American patriotism are not mere catchwords and platform phrases in Pittsburgh; and

Whereas this typical Pittsburgh boy, better known to his buddies in the war-torn villages of southern Italy as Commando Kelly, is honoring his native city by returning today to visit his aged mother, two younger brothers and those of six additional brothers who are or may be granted furloughs from the armed forces;

Now, therefore, do I, Cornelius D. Scully, mayor of Pittsburgh and Federal coordinator of civilian defense for western Pennsylvania, on behalf of the citizens of Pittsburgh and in official recognition that Sergeant Kelly brought great and distinguished honor to himself, his family, and the citizenry, herewith proclaim this day as Commando Kelly Day.

And further, I urge that every conceivable tribute be paid to this valiant son of Pittsburgh and that there be full attendance at the formal function to be held in Commando Kelly's honor tonight at West Park, Northside; and that our citizens turn out en masse for the military and civic parade which will immediately precede the Northside celebration, traversing the downtown and Northside business areas;

All to the end that none of us ever diminish in any degree our war effort on the home front, mindful of the fact that millions of American boys daily offer their lives to the proposition that America shall endure a free and democratic nation.

Done this day, April 26, 1944 A. D., at the office of the mayor in witness whereof I hereunto set my signature and cause the great seal of the city to be affixed.

[From the Pittsburgh Press]

AFTER THE PARADE—

There are some people among us homefronters who, perhaps because of a slightly extended sense of humor, seem to be getting a certain kind of pleasure out of the discomfiture which Commando Kelly's mysterious absence has imposed on the officials who have been arranging a great welcome-home celebration.

Perhaps, although Sergeant Kelly apparently hasn't been consulted about these plans, the parade and other civic demonstrations in observance of the sergeant's well-earned furlough are a fitting manner of doing honor to a soldier of his distinguished achievements.

But while the public leaders are fretting about the sergeant's whereabouts, there is another matter to which they and the community at large might well be giving serious thought.

What happens when the parade is over?

The parade and other festivities are likely to prove more embarrassing than anything else to a hero like Sergeant Kelly. And while he, or others like him, may be impressed with the community's eagerness to emblazon its appreciation of his fighting qualities, it would not be extraordinary if the sergeant, all the while, were giving an inquiring thought to what opportunities will become available to him when the war is won.

Sergeant Kelly, as an individual, has shown an exceptional capacity for taking care of himself. But, as a symbol of all of America's fighting men, will he have a real chance in the post-war era to reestablish himself in civilian life?

Will those who now prepare to celebrate his conspicuous bravery be as enthusiastic in the future to do him honor by giving him a fair opportunity to a constructive existence? To occupational training, to a job, to rehabilitation, if necessary?

Five years or ten years hence, will the community's leaders—without benefit of publicity—be as concerned about the war hero's welfare?

Today's applause will lose its glitter of sincerity unless those questions, now and later, are answered in the affirmative.

[War Department release]

TECHNICAL SGT. CHARLES E. KELLY

Technical Sgt. Charles E. Kelly, 23-year-old Infantryman who won the Congressional Medal of Honor, has returned to the United States from Italy under the Army's rotation policy. The medal was presented to him on March 11 in the north African theater of operations for a series of voluntary exploits against the enemy on September 13 and 14, 1943, following Kelly's landing with Fifth Army forces at Salerno, Italy.

The medal, awarded by direction of the President and in the name of Congress, was the first of its kind to be won in fighting on the Italian mainland. At the time of his exploits, Sergeant Kelly was a private first class. At the time the citation for his award was prepared, he was a corporal. The citation follows:

"For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity at risk of life above and beyond the call of duty.

"On September 13, 1943, near Altavilla, Italy, Corporal Kelly voluntarily joined a patrol which located and neutralized enemy machine-gun positions. After this hazardous duty, he volunteered to establish contact with a battalion of United States Infantry which was believed to be located on Hill 315, a mile distant. He traveled over a route commanded by enemy observation and under sniper, mortar, and artillery fire; and later he returned with the correct information that the enemy occupied Hill 315 in organized positions.

"Immediately thereafter Corporal Kelly, again a volunteer patrol member, assisted materially in the destruction of two enemy machine-gun nests under conditions requiring great skill and courage. Having effectively fired his weapon until all the ammunition was exhausted, he secured permission to obtain more at an ammunition dump. Arriving at the dump which was located near a storehouse on the extreme flank of his regiment's position, Corporal Kelly found that the Germans were attacking ferociously at this point. He obtained his ammunition and was given the mission of protecting the rear of the storehouse. He held his position throughout the night.

"The following morning the enemy attack was resumed. Corporal Kelly took a position at an open window of the storehouse. One machine gunner had been killed at this position and several other soldiers wounded. Corporal Kelly delivered continuous aimed and effective fire upon the enemy with his automatic rifle until the weapon locked from overheating. Finding another automatic rifle, he again directed effective fire upon the enemy until this weapon also locked. At this critical point, with the enemy threatening to overrun the position, Corporal Kelly picked up 60-millimeter mortar shells, pulled the safety pins, and used the shells as grenades killing at least 5 of the enemy.

"When it became imperative that the house be evacuated, Corporation Kelly, despite his sergeant's injunctions, volunteered to hold the position until the remainder of the detachment could withdraw. As the detachment moved out, Corporal Kelley was observed deliberately loading and firing a rocket launcher from the window. He was successful in covering the withdrawal of the unit, and later, in joining his own organization.

"Corporal Kelly's fighting determination and intrepidity in battle exemplify the highest traditions of the armed forces of the United States."

Kelly's comrades later learned that after he had fired the last bazooka shells he slipped out of the storehouse, made his way down a hill, and came upon an abandoned 37 mm. antitank gun. While the ammunition supply lasted he fired it against the oncoming enemy.

One of the few men to escape injury in earning the Medal of Honor, Sergeant Kelly volunteered for each of the missions for which he was cited, just as he volunteered for military service at Pittsburgh May 26, 1942.

In some 70 days of active combat, Sergeant Kelly has become something of a legendary figure to his fighting buddies of the Thirty-sixth Division, who have nicknamed him "Commando."

He has a reputation for being in the right place at the right time, and it has become an axiom that "where there's a tough battle, there's Kelly." Yet he has come through the bloody Salerno, San Pietro, Rapido River, and Cassino operations with injuries no more serious than a scraped nose and tiny lacerations on his hands, inflicted by shell fragments. Against this, he is officially credited with killing 40 of the enemy.

During the struggle for the heights around San Pietro, Kelly fought as a squad corporal and then section sergeant.

In the Rapido River "battle of guts" he crossed the stream three times as a platoon sergeant, but was forced to withdraw each time because of overwhelming enemy strength. He was one of the few noncommissioned officers in his outfit to come back unscathed after that struggle, and for a while served as acting first sergeant of his company.

Born at Pittsburgh, September 23, 1920, Sergeant Kelly is one of seven sons of Mrs. Irene Kelly, 332 Shawano Street, Pittsburgh, all of whom are in the fighting forces. One brother is stationed in England, another in the South Pacific, another in the merchant marine somewhere, and the others are in this country.

He received his elementary education at East Park Grade School in Pittsburgh and attended North Side Lattimer High School there until he suspended his studies to contribute to the support of his widowed mother, who has been deaf for several years. He was employed by a bottling concern prior to enlisting in the Army.

What Will the Repeal of Land Grant Railroad Rates Cost the Taxpayer?

REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT J. ENGEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 17, 1944

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the railroad companies are putting on a tremendous drive to repeal land-grant railroad rates. In this drive they have apparently enlisted the help of the organized railroad workers as well as the chambers of commerce and business organizations throughout the United States. I opposed the repeal of this law some time ago because of the amount that the Government would have to pay in increased railroad rates. Personally, I am sympathetic with the railroads. We have to have railroads. Railroads have to have earnings or the investment is gone. However, I cannot support a bill which would add from three hundred million to five hundred million dollars a year tax burden on the taxpaying public. I am informed that the railroads admitted in the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee that the repeal of the railroad land-grant rates would cost the Government $240,000,000 a year.

The War Department Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee is now holding hearings on a $50,000,000,000 War Department appropriation bill. Major General Gross, Chief of the Transportation Division of the United States Army, testified before our committee yesterday. He testified in effect that he was conversant with the terms of the Boren bill which would repeal land-grant-railroad rates. He testified in answer to my question that this $50,000,000,000 War Department appropriation bill is based upon the assumption that the present land-grant rates are continued; that if the Boren bill is passed and the land-grant act is repealed, the War Department would have to come before our committee and before Congress for an additional appropriation of approximately $200,000,000 for the coming fiscal year to pay the additional freight rates levied by the railroad companies by reason of the repeal of this law. In addition to this amount, the Navy Department, the Maritime Commission, Lend-Lease, in fact every department of government would have to come before our committee for additional funds to meet the difference between the rates levied under the land-grant act and those levied or applied if the land-grant act is repealed. There is no question in my mind but that the additional cost to the taxpayers for additional rates would run anywhere from three hundred and fifty to five hundred million dollars a year during wartime. To hand over to the railroad companies of the Nation this vast sum of money at a time when they are making more money than they have ever made in their history and when a large part of the freight is being paid by the taxpayers of the country, seems to me to be very unwise, to say the least.

Some time ago I obtained a breakdown from the Internal Revenue Department as to the amount of taxes that will be paid this year by each income group in the United States of America. I was told that 21,600,000 income recipients will receive this year—1944—$19,200,000,000 in incomes of $1,000 or less, or an average of approximately $900 each. Of this group, 9,270,000 are heads of families. The Labor Department states that the average family consists of four people, a man, his wife, a child of 13 and a child of 8. We therefore find that 9,270,000 individuals are trying to support approximately 37,000,000 people in family groups of four on an average income of $900 per year. This entire group of 21,600,000 individuals with incomes of $1,000 or less will pay this year $500,000,000 in taxes, one of the reasons being the fact that Congress has reduced the income-tax exemption as low as $500. As far as I am individually concerned, I am not going to take that $500,000,000 from these 21,600,000 individuals and turn it over to the railroad companies of the United States in additional freight rates by repeal of the land-grant rates at a time when these railroad companies are making more money than they ever did in the history of the Nation.

I shall be glad to give consideration to the repeal of the land-grant rates after the war is over and when the Government has gone back to peacetime shipments. Nothing I say here should be interpreted as being antirailroad. I believe in the railroads. I believe they are doing a splendid job, and I believe they are entitled to the support of the public, but I cannot justify a repeal of the land-grant rates in view of the above facts.

Support the Hawkes Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, nearly one-fifth of all evaluated property in the State of New Jersey is tax exempt. A sizeable portion of this is Federal property acquired for wartime purposes. The New Jersey Senate has memorialized Congress "to provide municipalities with compensation in lieu of taxes lost by reason of Federal Government acquisition of property," and the United States conference of mayors has urged the Congress to enact legislation for Federal payment to local tax districts in amounts "equal to tax paid by privately owned property."

The distinguished Senator from New Jersey, Senator HAWKES, has introduced a bill, S. 1737, to alleviate the burdens now being imposed on the States and their political subdivisions for loss of revenues occasioned by the acquisition of real property by the United States for military purposes, and I present today an editorial appearing in the Passaic (N. J.) Herald-News endorsing this timely measure. I am sure the House will realize its merits and do its part in the enactment of legislation:

SUPPORT THE HAWKES BILL

Pointing out that the costs of the war should be borne by all citizens of the Nation, and that local taxpayers should not be forced to pay increased levies because of tax exemptions due to Federal acquisition of properties in their municipalities for military installations and industrial purposes, New Jersey Taxpayers Association today is asking all county and municipal governing bodies to urge support of Senate bill No. 1737, introduced in the upper House of the Congress by Senator ALBERT W. HAWKES, of New Jersey.

The Hawkes bill would require the Government to make annual payments to the municipalities to the full amount of taxes lost on properties that have been acquired for war purposes since the declaration of the emergency on September 8, 1939, that otherwise would be bearing their share of local government costs, but now pay nothing, with the result that other taxpayers have to make up the difference in higher taxes.

Last August our State senate memorialized the Congress to enact legislation "to provide municipalities with compensation in lieu of taxes lost by reason of Federal Government acquisition of property," and like action was taken at a recent Nation-wide conference of mayors.

It seems the only fair and just thing for the Government to do. One-fifth of all evaluated property in this State is now tax exempt, and a large part of this total is represented in Government acquisitions. When such exemptions occur in any municipality all the others in the county are affected through a decrease in the ratables and the resulting rise in tax rates.

The same situation obtains in all the States, but the burden is heaviest in those where there is the greatest concentration of war activities. It is a cost that should be borne, not by some taxpayers in some districts alone, but by all taxpayers everywhere throughout the Nation.

Hon. Charles A. Eaton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial, I am given the opportunity to pay tribute to one of the cultured and distinguished leaders of the House of Representatives, and my privilege is enriched with especial pride because he is also the dean of the New Jersey delegation.

"Doc" EATON, as he is affectionately known by all of us, is one of those blessed souls who delights in living in harmony with all sorts and conditions of men. Saturated in patriotism and with inspired vision, tempered by the wisdom of experience, he "looks up, not down; out, not in; forward, not backward; and lends a hand." In a word, he is an inspiration, which, interpreted by Webster, is a creative influence of genius.

This editorial appearing in the Daily Home News, of New Brunswick, N. J., on May 17, is well captioned "Congressman EATON speaks for millions of Americans":

CONGRESSMAN EATON SPEAKS FOR MILLIONS OF AMERICANS

Representative CHARLES A. EATON, veteran New Jersey legislator and one of the most respected Members of Congress, traces with incisive clarity the steps which the United States must take when the war ends.

The foundation of our post-war economy, as he sees it, will rest upon profitable, permanent employment for our fighters as soon as they are mustered out of the service. War contracts must be terminated in such a way as to do full justice to industry which has contributed so much to the war effort. Government-owned war plants must be absorbed by private industry. Currency must be stabilized and an annual national income of $125,000,000,000 must be insured. The enormous need for new housing must be fulfilled, and the agricultural economy of the Nation must be maintained on a just basis.

After these prime economic needs, EATON finds political problems which must be solved. He urges an end to what he characterizes as the "legalized warfare" between employer and employee, promoted by the New Deal. Endorsing the care of the aged and the unfortunate, he strikes out against foreign ideologies and states the need for a government by law rather than a government by men, which, he says, is "hateful and odious" and has been fastened upon America by the New Deal. Striking out against usurpation of power, he urges returning power now taken over by the Executive to Congress, freeing the judicial system from political control and giving back to the States authority seized by the Federal Government. Finally, says EATON, "We must free the individual citizen from Federal bureaucratic dictatorship so that all Americans may once more live as freemen under a free government of their own making."

As dean of New Jersey's congressional delegation and as one of the Nation's leading statesmen, Congressman EATON is a man whose opinions are entitled to consideration and respect. His indictment of the New Deal reflects the opinion of millions of Americans and his statement of the problems which America faces now and will face in increasing measure in the future is a challenge to every thinking American.

Soldiers See It! Do We?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD J. McMURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. McMURRAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of Wednesday, April 19, 1944:

SOLDIERS SEE IT! DO WE?

From the shell-torn Anzio beach head, an Associated Press correspondent writes of the Nazi effort to break the morale of Allied soldiers in that most uncomfortable spot.

The Nazi pamphlets dropped on our beach head area "try to pit one ally against another * * * by telling one that the other has failed to support it. There are also subtle suggestions that whichever Allied Nation is in command on a given sector of the front is safeguarding its own men at the expense of the others."

Could there be a more accurate parallel to and summary of the utterances of the isolationist press, the hate Roosevelt more than we hate Hitler crowd in Congress, the fascist pamphleteers, and the rest of the suspicion mongers on the home front?

The Associated Press correspondent in Italy says the Nazi propaganda doesn't produce the hoped for reaction. That is an assurance for which we can all be thankful. Can we assure our men on the battle fronts that we, back here, are just as determined not to be deceived by the same kind of propaganda on the home front?

Price Ceiling Regulations of O. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement by me in support of an amendment submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and an editorial from the Buffalo Evening News in connection with the statement.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I favor the continuance of O. P. A. for the protection of our economy. I voted for it on every occasion in the past.

The present Director, Mr. Bowles, has improved the administration of O. P. A. However, there is still room for improvement, especially in the Meat Section.

One of the most vexing problems that your Small Business Committee has had to deal with in the past 2 years is the squeeze put on independent and small businesses in many trades and industries as a result of O. P. A. price ceiling regulations which do not permit a fair and equitable operating margin. The Senate Small Business Committee, through many conferences and public hearings, has been successful in assisting the Price Administrator in adjusting such price ceilings so as to permit equitable and just margins under which the independent small-business men of the country may continue to operate.

One such industry has, however, continued to operate under a terrific handicap. I speak particularly of the meat-packing industry, especially those slaughterers who are set up primarily for the slaughtering of beef, veal, and lamb. The condition among those slaughterers has now reached a critical stage where some have been forced into liquidation, many others have been forced to curtail their operations, and some are wholly shut down. All are threatened in a greater or less degree with bankruptcy if a remedy is not found.

Normal remedies lie in the Emergency Price Control Act and in the hands of the Price Administrator and his deputies who have it within their power to make the necessary adjustments. Those officials, however, within the Meat Section of the Office of Price Administration have stubbornly resisted adjustments in price ceilings in the face of the fact, (1) that the law says price ceilings shall be such as to provide generally fair and equitable operating margins; (2) these same Meat Section officials admit over and over again that the independent slaughterers of beef, veal, and lamb must lose money under the present O. P. A. price ceiling; and (3) that in the case of one major city, Buffalo, where 28 local meat packers have been closed for more than 6 weeks, it has been shown O. P. A. officials that through use of subsidies and a readjustment of 1½ cents per pound between packer and retailer ceiling, these Buffalo packers can open for operation without loss to themselves and without an increase in the ceiling price to the consumer.

Under these conditions, the administration of the Meat Section of O. P. A. is placed under a shadow of grave doubt as to whether the meat industry, as far as O. P. A. is concerned, is being administered in the public interest or for the benefit of the monopolistic interests in the meat-packing industry. I am told some employees of the Meat Section were formerly with one or the other of the big packers. The principal executive in the Meat Section of O. P. A. comes from one of the major packers, Armour & Co. He has been the key man in the Meat Section of O. P. A. from the very beginning. And from the very beginning, the 600 or more independent meat packers of the country have complained of unfairness toward them in the rules and regulations of the O. P. A. Meat Section and of advance leaks on rules and regulations to the big monopolistic packers.

A word of explanation is here necessary in order to understand the true economic function of the independent beef, veal, and lamb slaughterer, and why through the years he has successfully stayed in business in the face of the all-powerful monopolistic forces of the major packers. The reason the independent packer has been able to do this is because he is a local packer, he slaughters locally, and he puts out his meat in the form desired in the local area. His meat is fresher when it reaches the consumer through the local independent butcher shops. For these reasons there has always existed a price differential which the local retailer has been willing to pay to the local slaughterer. This historical differential is in the neighborhood of a cent and a half per pound. This cent-and-a-half-per-pound differential is a very important matter. It is the difference between profit and loss for the local independent packer. If we put this in another light, we have a clearer understanding of the present O. P. A. meat-pricing difficulties. In order for the big packer to ship his beef into a local trading area from some far-distant point, he has found that he must undersell the local packer if he is to sell any beef locally.

The history of the industry, therefore, shows that the major packers have been accustomed over the years to taking a loss on their beef. They can only do this because they are also big meat processors; they enjoy a large volume in specially prepared and packaged meats and meat products of all kinds. They sell tremendous quantities of other types of commodities, especially in the dairy-products field. From all of these varied lines they make enough profit to absorb their losses on unprocessed beef.

Now comes O. P. A. and its Meat Division, under the unchallenged say-so of an employee of a major meat packer. This man, through his control of O. P. A. price ceiling regulations, has destroyed this old historical preferential premium which the local independent packer has received for years. He has done this by requiring price ceilings for the local packer to be the same as the big packer who has used these particular meat products as a loss leader in times past.

In the case of the Buffalo meat packers, which I have mentioned, they have repeatedly sought and been refused the restoration of this historical margin of a cent-and-a-half premium for locally slaughtered beef, veal, and lamb.

The Small Business Committee of the Senate, headed by Senator MURRAY, of Montana, is charged with the responsibility of safeguarding the interests of small, independent business. We realize there will be casualties, all too many of them, in the field of small business.

The blighting results of these losses will affect adversely the system we are endeavoring to preserve in this land of opportunity. We realize the vital need for price control, but within that favored province we must defend little business and prevent its destruction wherever possible.

[From the Buffalo Evening News of May 10, 1944]

CONSUMERS IN MIDDLE

Buffalo consumers are caught in the middle of the conflict that has developed between the closed-down Buffalo meat packers and the Washington O. P. A. over price ceilings and meat subsidies. The Washington authorities have issued conflicting statements about the local meat supply situation and, after making some concessions to the packers' demands for a fair-profit margin, have announced that they will go no further.

The tacit admission of the O. P. A. Meat Division that Buffalo's supply of meat was only 30 percent of normal was contradicted by O. P. A. Administrator Chester Bowles, who wrote in a letter to Senator JAMES M. MEAD that the O. P. A.'s latest report is that there is no critical meat shortage here. Unless Mr. Bowles included the black market—which is expanding rapidly as a result of the shortage of legally slaughtered and legally priced meat—in his calculations, any Buffalo housewife or retail butcher can offer first-hand evidence to dispute them. The removal of rationing restrictions on most meats has proved a farce in Buffalo, in view of empty meat shelves.

Briefly the situation is this: 35 local meat packers in 28 plants have been closed down for 2 months, protesting that if they observe the ceiling prices fixed by the O. P. A. in their sales to retail meat stores, they will lose money. They claim only the right to maintain a traditional charge of 1.5 cents a pound dressed weight over the amount now allowed—a charge which has always been absorbed by the retailers and would not affect the ceiling price paid by consumers. Their contention that their profit margin would be more than wiped out if they follow the strict O. P. A. regulations is generally supported by local O. P. A. authorities and by those familiar with the local situation.

The Washington O. P. A. has granted a partial concession—admitting tacitly that the packers have not received a fair deal in the past—by shifting Buffalo to a higher-price zone and granting a subsidy of 80 percent of freight to offset shrinkage losses on cattle shipped here from the West. Altogether, this amounts to about three-quarters of a cent a pound in the additional price allowed. It would seem that there is some basis here for a compromise between the stand of the O. P. A. and that of the packers, but both sides are adamant against further concessions. Meanwhile black-market operations are on the increase throughout western New York. Uninspected and poorer grades of meat are sold at top-grade ceiling prices or at black-market prices, and the average Buffalo consumer is drawing no benefit from the national surplus of meat.

In taking a hard-and-fast stand on the matter, the Washington O. P. A. office is making no contribution to the relief of the shortage here. It is another example of bureaucratic procedure, without benefit of any adequate investigation of the local situation. Whether or not the packers are right in their contention, such an investigation, followed by prompt action to rectify any mistakes, is in order.

The Blind Do War Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, few realize what the blind have been doing on the home front in connection with the prosecution of the war. An outstanding example can be found at the Mines Equipment Co., of St. Louis, Mo. This company has been doing a great deal of work for the Government, especially the Signal Corps and the Air Corps of both the Army and Navy. The president of this concern, J. E. Miller, is an outstanding patriotic citizen of St. Louis. At his own expense he increased the facilities of his plant so that he could be of more assistance to the Government during the war period. He has likewise spent a great deal of money in research, perfecting equipment that has proved to be very beneficial.

What the blind have accomplished at the Mines Equipment Co. can be accomplished in other branches of industry.

Mr. Miller has written an article which appeared in the St. Louis Commerce under date of May 17, 1944, and under the permission granted me I include it as part of my remarks. It follows:

WASTED MANPOWER

(By J. E. Miller, plant manager, Mines Equipment Co.)

St. Louis industry has, in the blind men and women of this community, a great source of potential manpower which in many cases is being completely overlooked.

Employers for many years have had an inherent prejudice against using blind workers in industry. They ask, "What can a blind person do? How can they get to work? Won't they get in the way?" It has been this attitude of refusing to recognize that a blind person might be a capable worker that has brought about this situation of wasted manpower.

At Mines Equipment Co. we have found that the blind are perfectly able workers and have found in them part of the answer to current manpower shortage problems. We have 23 blind workers employed in our plants, working on all types of jobs and at all rates. And every one of them is doing his job efficiently and on equal terms with our normal employes.

Here are some of the positions which are being filled by blind workers in our plants; storeroom clerk, drill press operator, inspector, assembly worker, press operator, and box packer.

This is abundant proof that blind people can do important and necessary work in industrial plants. A simple rule of thumb that can be used to determine what jobs can be done by blind workers in your plant is this: Just close your eyes and visualize what jobs in your plant can be done without the use of eyes. The answer is as simple as that.

Using this rule as a measuring stick, you can see that there are a number of job families into which blind workers fit very easily. For example, they can be used effectively in such positions as these: stringing beads for insulation, drilling on a drill press, gauging with plug gauges, gauging with thread gauges, answering telephones, packing boxes, inspecting, sorting bolts, nuts, and screws, and doing simple assembly work.

Blind people have a sense of touch that is equalled by none. Their fingers are to them what eyes are to a sighted person. Their sensitive hands are an asset to any employer who can find a use for this specialized ability where sight is not necessary.

Our experience has shown that blind workers have no more transportation difficulties that do ordinary employees. They can ride street cars without danger, and they are always helped across the street. They'll get there and they'll be on time every day, too.

In addition to being a capable worker, the blind employee is a good morale builder. He inspires his fellow workers to better production. He is dependable, accurate, and consistent.

The theory which we use at Mines Equipment Co. is that if a blind person can do the job, it relieves an able-bodied worker for another job. If in each State 500 or 600 blind were hired by industrial concerns, which, in Missouri as in most States would mean less than 1 or 2 workers per plant, you would find a total of about 28,000 jobs in the United States that could be filled by blind people. This amoun would almost take care of the employable blind available for war jobs, and would release the same number of normal workers for other jobs.

There are a number of companies in St. Louis who have hired blind people for various types of work and are glad of it. Many others could follow their example.

The United States Employment Service office can give any employer all necessary information on the use of blind workers in industry and can supply such workers on request.

Interscholastic Conference at Phillips Exeter Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER E. MERROW

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 19, 1944

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the Exeter News-Letter, Exeter, N. H., on Thursday, May 18, 1944. This was written by Henry Phillips, Jr., a political columnist for that paper. The subject of this column should be of interest to all who are concerned that the young people of our country should consider seriously their responsibilities as citizens:

Over the last week end the Herodotan Society of the academy was host to a keen group of delegates who came here to talk about politics and government. They came from public and private schools in four New England States. The number included both boys and girls.

The idea for the conference sprang from the interest in the subject developed by students in the academy who, as members of the host society, have been considering the national political scene. They got to wondering what other schools were doing along the same line and began writing letters to find out. When the replies began coming in and it was apparent that interest had been aroused, one thing led to another and in a few weeks almost 50 delegates from 23 schools were on hand in Exeter.

Two discussion meetings were held Saturday afternoon. The first, led by Prof. Benjamin F. Wright, professor of government in Harvard, concerned the responsibilities of citizens toward government service as a career or as a part-time interest, and some of the opportunities open in such service. Dr. Wright emphasized the continuing need for men and women of broad general education in administrative positions in government. Technical training without a background of liberal education, he said, does not fit a person to solve the human equation which is involved in every occupation.

Led next by Mark F. Emerson, instructor in political science in St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., the delegates discussed practical ways and means of furthering interest in public service. An inclusive list of common barriers to wider interest in Government service was drawn up, e. g., general aversion to politics on the part of many young people of good education; the insecurity of elective positions, the low pay of others.

Between the afternoon gatherings and the dinner meeting a half hour summary of the conference was broadcast over Station WLAW of Lawrence, Mass. The program originated at the Exeter Inn and was presided over by E. Hartwell Daley, C. B. S. announcer. A feature of this program was an informal discussion among some of the delegates of the accomplishments of the conference.

The dinner meeting was as distinguished an occasion as Exeter has seen in many years. Most prominent of the guests was Acting Secretary of the Navy Forrestal and Mrs. Forrestal who had come on a brief visit to their son, a member of the Herodotan Society. Accompanying Secretary and Mrs. Forrestal were United States Senator Joseph H. Ball, of Minnesota, and Mrs. Ball. The conference was honored also by the presence of Gov. Robert O. Blood, of New Hampshire, who spoke on the radio program and was one of the after dinner speakers. Another guest prominent in the business and political life of the State was John D. Langmuir, of Nashua, executive director of the State Federation of Taxpayers Associations.

Dr. Lewis Perry, principal of the academy, welcomed the delegates and guests among whom was John Lary, chairman of the Exeter Board of Selectmen.

Mr. Langmuir, first of the evening speakers to be introduced by President Leonard S. Zartman, Jr., of the society, asserted that there is no reason to be ashamed of politicians. He defined politics as "diplomacy, tact, and getting things done amicably instead of by a fight."

Governor Blood urged the delegates and their hosts seriously to consider entering public life and "to do a real job in it." "There is no field," the Governor stated, "in which you can contribute more to your community or State than in public life."

Secretary Forrestal, in introducing Senator BALL, remarked briefly that because of the too prevalent belief that democracy is automatic and for that reason cannot fail, there is a tendency for the vast majority of people to refrain from participating in it, and to let the Government handle all their problems. He said that the only way to prove to other nations the value of democracy is to make it work here.

Senator BALL'S topic was World Peace. He warned against the danger of state socialism if we are required again to join an armaments race with other nations. Unless we can enter upon some form of international organization, based on those democratic principles under which our Republic was organized and thrives today, the Senator said, we shall have to keep up our armaments, introduce peacetime military service and get ready for another world war. He stated that a post-war trend toward nationalism or isolationism is very likely, going on to assert that: "There will be a tremendous challenge facing you delegates to provide the type of leadership that will reverse that trend, and steer the Nation's course toward peace and stability and away from war and chaos."

At a short final session of the conference held Sunday morning delegates voted to make the organization permanent under the title "The Interscholastic Association for Politics and Government." As chairman of the association the group unanimously elected Michael V. Forrestal. An executive committee of five was also chosen to act as a committee of correspondence and to arrange for a second conference next year. The committee will use every means possible to stimulate further the awakened interest in politics and government among high schools and preparatory school students.

Farm Price and Farm Income Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE M. REED

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, May 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very timely letter from Mr. Herman Hurst, of Oswego, Kans., who discusses the farm price and farm income situation. Mr. Hurst is a fine citizen who has given much thought and study to the question of an adequate income for the farm and farm family.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OSWEGO, KANS., May 11, 1944.

Hon. CLYDE M. REED,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. REED: I have received two letters of your addresses you sent me and would say that I agree with you and hope you will keep up the fight for the farmer.

Being a farmer, I don't see how anyone can say that the farmer is a profiteer and gets abnormally high prices for his produce. I have read articles accusing him of being unfair to the consumer and I wonder if anyone knows that the farmer has nothing to say about the prices he receives for his produce. In the matter of livestock he has no more to say what his cattle, hogs, or sheep will bring than the stock being sold. If he goes to market early, he is told that they haven't gotten the market yet, which is set in the large centers, and when it comes the farmer has not been consulted about what it costs to produce said animals, but on a price set by a processor, who figures cost of processing and a profit. I believe the processors are so organized that they set the buying price on livestock and also set the price on the processed meat.

It is the same with grain. The farmer takes his wheat to the elevator and he has no more to say what he gets for it than the tractor that was used in the production. He has nothing to say about the tests, nor does he see it weighed. He is paid a price that the processor can feel he will not take any loss. Of course, the processor does not always make the profit he had expected to, but he had the privilege to try. This is absolutely denied the farmer.

A good crop in some foreign country often brings down the price of grain in the United States. A rain in the fall and winter often brings the price of wheat down 6 months before harvest. A rain in the summer and the papers say it was a million-dollar rain for the corn month before the corn is ripe for harvest. The papers often state that the farmers' income for certain years have been so many billions of dollars, but they fail to figure on the cost of making those billions and that this amount must be divided between more than 6,000,000 farmers. Farm implements and machinery are maintained at an even price the year around, yet the grain produced by using said machinery fluctuates between 10 to 30 percent in 1 year. You might buy an implement for 200 bushels of wheat now, but next year it may take 300 bushels to buy the same machine. The Government asks the farmers to produce more meat to win the war. I believe the annual average pig crop is about 40,000,000 to 45,000,000, but the 1943 crop was 121,000,874, so they cut about $2 per hundred off the price, with a threatened other reduction of $1.25 per 100 for the crop of 1944. I don't believe the consumer gets the benefit he should by the reduced cost. The Government asked the farmer to produce more chickens, which he did. Now they are cheaper. A month ago eggs were 42 cents, but a few weeks of warm weather and they said there was a surplus of eggs, so took off 11 cents per dozen. I do not believe there are many farmers, with the help of wife and children working, getting more than one-half as much as railroad people and miners are getting—that is, after the cost has been taken out of production. The papers in reporting the price received by the farmers for livestock stress the top prices paid. I do not believe over one-half of the receipts bring over one-half of the top quotation. There are several organizations trying to help the farmer to produce more, but I believe we could produce enough to feed the United States without any county farm agents. There is too much spread between the producer and the consumer. If anyone needs a subsidy, it is the man who produces and has to contend with the chinchbugs, grasshoppers, droughts and floods, and the processor.

Very truly,

HERMAN HURST.

Pay Readjustment Act of 1942—Vote in the House of Representatives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, May 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD showing the final vote in the House of Representatives on Senate bill 2025, to readjust the pay and allowances of personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Congressional Record of May 13, 1942]

VOTE ON INCREASING PAY OF SOLDIERS

PAY READJUSTMENT BILL OF 1942

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2025) to readjust the pay and allowances of personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service.

The motion was agreed to.

* * * * *

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 359, nays 1, not voting 71, as follows:

[Roll No. 56]

The Meaning of Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Dr. Willard H. Dow at the Biltmore Hotel, New York, May 13, 1944, on receiving the gold medal award of the American Institute of Chemists:

Everyone everywhere is trying to look into the future. The world about us is being torn into shreds, and we do not know how or by whom it may be reshaped. Countless millions are longing for what they call security and seem willing to pay any price for any package labeled security. The sands of man's belief in himself as a being created in the image of God are running out. Men and women are trying to escape today by dreaming of tomorrow. Tonight I shall not talk about post-war planning or post-war hoping. Instead I am going to ask you to explore with me the simple elements on which we of America have founded our lives, to the end of discovering whether or not, in much of our planning, we have not overlooked that one element without which our plans will be futile. I am going to ask you to consider freedom and what it means. And I am also going to suggest to those who think in such terms that freedom also has a cash value. But let us think in terms of the dignity of man and not of messes of pottage.

Let us be highbrow in order to see if in being lowbrow—call it practical—we are not in danger of missing the very thing that we are trying to get. To be concrete. How many of us are really willing to accept the challenge of individual responsibility and make our own futures?

How many of us, I wonder, are watching for a chance to break out of the lockstep of thought in which we as a people are now maching and to do a little walking at our own gait? And how many of us are just watchfully waiting for the line to break of itself, or, better yet, to be broken by someone we elect or select for that purpose? In other words, how many of us have the burning passion to step out for freedom? And how many of us are beginning to think of freedom as something we would very much like to have given to us? There is a whale of a difference between the two approaches.

Freedom is not a condition of life. It is the absence of a condition of life. The moment we think of it as a condition, we recognize—no matter what we may say to the contrary—a super power which can tell us not only what is and what is not freedom, but also just how and why we must like it. I am reminded of that marshal of Napoleon's who, entering a captured town, summoned the citizens to the market place. "My friends," he declared, "I bring you the perfect freedom. But be prudent. I shall shoot the first man who stirs."

Take the slogan "Free enterprise." Everyone seems to have gone overboard for free enterprise. But it appears that the securing of free enterprise is a very complicated matter, and I should hate to be given the task of reducing some of the prescriptions I read to an algebraic formula. "Free enterprise," if it is to be anything but a name, is not a permitted way of business. It arises out of an absence of a permitted way of business.

We seem to be forgetting that a government cannot grant freedom of religion or of speech or of enterprise. When we speak of granting or receiving freedom, we exactly reverse the processes of thought that moved those great men, the founding fathers, to evolve for themselves and their posterity—that is, for us—the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. We of America never wrung a Magna Carta from a king. Our forefathers fought and gained the right to think and act for themselves. The Declaration of Independence was a living, fighting thing and not just a nice resolution casually adopted at a convention. We did not derive our freedom from any government. On the contrary, we set up a government and lodged with it only such small parts of our freedom as we thought necessary for the preservation of a reasonable order. Our wise fathers were so fearful that even these little trusteeships of freedom might be abused that they delegated supreme power to no man and to no group of men, in the fervent hope that no government could ever be established as a thing of itself and apart from the people.

We today, without thought of our words, speak of the Government or of Washington as a ruling power, and there are many who would propitiate that power in much the way that the courtiers of old are said to have fawned on their monarchs. Our forefathers simply would not have known how to do that sort of thing. They did not depend upon a government. The Government depended on them.

They derived their freedom to worship, to speak, and to carry on from Almighty God and not from anything fashioned by man.

The utter reversal that has come about in our manner of thinking—a reversal which holds much evil and no good, is being driven in by a parade of authorities through committee rooms, through lecture halls, and even through pulpits, solemnly warning us and exhorting us not to be hasty in getting rid of our wartime controls so as not to lapse into another dreadful era of tooth and claw. We are being warned against the dangers of freedom. We are being openly counseled to follow the cultures and even the diets of nations that never knew freedom. In the twenties, foreign missions were inspecting us to see how and why we managed so well. Now in the forties we are being taught that whatever we did in the past as a people was crude and quite wrong and that our future lies in being something other than American.

All of which, to me, is rot, for I do not happen to be one of those who believe that the United States is a failure. And although we have a lot to learn, and, if we keep our balance, we shall always have a lot to learn. I think that what we have to learn from abroad is in the way of what not to do and not in the way of what to do. For if the cultures of Europe and Asia have brought them to their present pass, we have nothing to learn from them. So I am thinking and I would ask you to think about the moral basis on which this country is going to operate after the war. We hear a great deal about post-war planning, full production, and full employment. These questions are all materialistic. But what about the individual? Where is he going to get off? Or has he vanished entirely?

We are in an era of controlled economy. It is said, and for the purposes of this evening I will grant, that these controls are needed for the war. We are being told that controls are not in the American spirit, but that we must ease out of them and that chaos would follow their sudden ending. Some of those who advise us to go slowly have records of achievement in business and finance and therefore would seem to speak out of experience.

But by the very nature of our present controls we cannot ease out of them. We can only ease into permanent control and the kind of society in which the individual never has a chance to express himself. For one control breeds another. We have already seen how quickly price control leads to subsidy. And also we are witnessing how price control brings artificial gluts and shortages. Every housewife is becoming a ration-coupon speculator and in a measurable time we shall have to eat on a fixed-quantity schedule. The next step must be forced labor, for in a controlled society it is out of the question for the individual to determine either the kind or the amount of labor he will contribute. Then we shall have exactly the same sort of freedom from want and from fear that the lifer enjoys in his cell.

For, although control is not a harsh word, economic control by its very nature must be harsh, because really it means the substituting of bureaucratic discretion and in the end the individual must be deprived of his responsibility and his dignity. We shall have to decide whether we want to be Americans and have government of our own choosing or be something else. There is no half-way point in human dignity and responsibility. It either is or is not.

The control mania—I cannot use a nicer word—has struck the sciences. Every few years a group of sincere and good men, as in a cycle, comes out with the recommendation that all advancement should be in the control of a single group of scientists.

The decisions recommended by them would govern our future development. Chemistry and physics offer possibly greater opportunity for the expression of new ideas than any of the other sciences. Each scientific brain has an approach or a way of looking at things that is entirely its own. Using this brain power can bring about greater results than could possibly be achieved by a wiser Solomon than has ever yet appeared.

Can you conceive what would happen if any group of scientists—now matter how able—were made the masters of research and discovery—if their composite experience were to make all the decisions? We discard the very thought as nonsense.

An idea, no matter how weird, may grow into a constructive thought and enlarge to a new approach. Then a new industry is aborning. Experience, ideas, research—all accumulate and produce a new approach or a new product or a new thought. Each borning is cherished by the one seeing the vision and is often communicated to others, but these visions are things coming only to those who have prepared themselves to accept them.

My own experience in research is such that I would dread the day when the bright spark of the young man who is searching the infinite might find himself in a thought prison with a keeper—no matter how well-intentioned and sympathetic that keeper might be. You all know that the best known and ablest of our authorities turned down the making of the cyclotron as useless. My company is making bromine from sea water, but, before finally getting under way, it was conclusively demonstrated, not only once but three times, that it could not be done. And lest I seem to be taking on airs, I will tell you that some years ago I maturely decided that, although the future of magnesium was unlimited, it would always be a specialty metal. But even at our present prices it is by volume among the cheapest of metals. We have learned that if a research laboratory is to produce results, the men must be allowed the freedom to be a bit crazy. If we were to control closely, we would miss the great idea that is found only by those with the courage to be crazy.

Chemistry and physics stand out nobly in the modern world of science. They are ever ready to give much and to accept little in return—which is the reverse of the modern world where the tendency is to receive all and give little. We are now in a terrible war—a war of complete destruction or maybe even elimination. Have we, as scientists, failed in our effort to humanity and permitted the operation of forces to work against instead of for civilization? Have we listened to the wrong teachers, to pedagogs of a wrong theology? Have we not been inspired by wrong thinking and gotten our quanta of energy confused with the molecules? Have we forgotten the only being worth remembering—the individual human being?

This is briefly what we have done. We have permitted the fostering of ideas our intelligence says are wrong. By pretending a knowledge we do not have, we have duped ourselves into false security. There is only one security and that grows out of the individual thinking for himself and that honestly and sincerely. This we know. But we are discarding all of our experience, traditions, or past prosperity and our entire knowledge of success with individualism. We are, in short, discarding Americanism and all it stands for. That means we are discarding our moral basis.

There is much loose talk these days about after-the-war planning. In typical propaganda style, industry is held up as having the sole responsibility for taking care of all employment after the war is over. I, for one, do not believe this is possible and think it is just another scheme to dodge responsibility. For industry is always a servant and never a master. The responsibility is yours and mine. We must all make our contribution and resolve that there shall not be unemployment after the war. But we shall need to define what we mean by "employment" and by "unemployment." Everyone can be employed. But everyone cannot be employed at exactly the kind of job under exactly the conditions of wages and hours that he or she may want. And "full employment" comes perilously near to "directed" employment. There is no "right to work" but there is a responsibility to work. We need to do some hard thinking about rights and responsibilities, for there cannot be a right without a responsibility nor a responsibility without a right. And that gets us right back to the individual.

In writing the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, the fathers of our country were moved by the unalterable purpose to free themselves and their posterity from the oppression of the Old World and elevate the individual to sovereign dignity. They believed that thus they were fulfilling the will of God. They builded with imperishable stone.

The elemental situation has not changed from their day to ours. Instead of a country of a few million people, we have a country of 130,000,000 people. That means more and not less opportunity. The world around us is much greater than theirs because, where their frontiers were limited by the map, our frontiers are unmapped, for they are far off somewhere in the great new world of physical discovery. Nothing has happened to make necessary a change in our concept of individualism.

The upheaval which has come about in our manner of thinking is, I feel, due to two causes. One is the influence upon our basic thinking by European systems of thought generated by failure and the other is our neglect to cherish and foster the great freedom—the freedom of the ordinary, everyday American.

It is not easy for a nation to keep its freedom and history teaches us that many have failed. But there never was a freedom born like the American. Our job is to prepare and to guard that freedom so that the way to greater accomplishments may be opened. Our successes are small in contrast to that which will eventually be accomplished. Our efforts are good and bad building stones of the future. There is always much room out in front—room for all without crowding—and work for generations to come. Let us now dedicate ourselves to avoiding the stumbling blocks and the unnecessary delays on this road of progress.

We must once again take up the belief that the only divine power is within man himself—he is the creation of God. If the American system has failed, it is because we, as individuals, have failed. In man alone can we find hope for a future. Whatever may be the seeming dangers of throwing off our controls and once more being Americans, they are as nothing in contrast to the dangers of being merely a tended herd. It all depends on whether we have what it takes. I think we have.

National Maritime Day

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 22, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the sailing of the Savannah for Liverpool, a voyage which consumed 29 days and 11 hours, has been set apart by Congress and proclaimed by the President as National Maritime Day. Today we pay tribute to our great merchant fleet and its valiant personnel.

The United States of America in the span of a little more than 2 years has become the greatest maritime power in the history of the world. Our ships manned by our citizens circle the globe. The American merchant marine has covered the stretches of the sea carrying food, clothing, armaments to our armed forces wherever they may be. Millions of our boys and girls have been transported in safety on vessels flying the Stars and Stripes.

The bridge of ships constructed by and under the direction of the United States Maritime Commission is one of the miracles of mankind. The maintenance of this magnificent fleet under the supervision of the War Shipping Administration is a proud accomplishment of our national ingenuity and industry. We are grateful for the contribution these outstanding Government officers and all those serving under them have made in carrying on this war which in extent and fury eclipses the imagination and dulls the significance of our successes.
